Koovalhl woke up on one of the mattresses. He was thinking about coming out and enjoy what was left of the day. It was such a passionless wonder that he wondered who might throw himself out of the way. He had survived a fall and woke up falling on the strangest place that could contain him yet. Thinking upon it this way, he had lost every kind of wonder he had in the past, about being jealous or of wanting women, or trying to blush or contemplating about jumping in the wall of spikes.

He tried pointing at the sunwall inside his room. He failed to do so. Near a counter there was a block-cointainer filled with small legs, fully grown, baby-girth in small fur-cointained eye-oblongs. In one of the drawers there was a small human who curled into a ball. A miniature eye-glimmer pushed him to spread about and multiply until he had become eight of them. All of them conveyed no emotion, but they seemed to jitter ever so now and again when someone came on.

Something about the way the carpets had knees coming out of them at times made him think of home. Koov hid way too many brits underneath his bed to even know it was time to behave. He considered pulling out some tea-leaves out of their lungs.

Something bumped on the door. After getting out of it, he saw it was an accident. The man who knocked the top of his door was the sailo Rod, a tin-head with nothing behind him but the anchor he carried around. Within a turn he made sure to point out that he hadn't felt any guilt at it at all.

'It's early isn't it? You should take care of your door in any case. Bad things happen when you don't.'

'But that wasn't.'

Speechlessly he followed him, trying to get forth at least a word in, no matter how little. It'd be a lot better than chiming in with coping around the lossless action he took so far. The cranial mass was in all the wrong places, right at the mask of the ship. It couldn't be taken out easily, just by the fact that there were other things being pressed against it. The point stood for the same reason we all looked at it. If anyone made too much noise, or if they took on too many wrong insignifiant turns, we would all end up in the same spot, facing the wrong people and having lost ourselves to the most unnatural looks. It was impossible to turn and accept what was going around.

Ask and it shall be delivered. It was dangerous getting close to that part of the deck. Just by looking at it, you could observe him. The wrong one who was there now, juast as he strolled and made his way past the others, you could feel his presence. You knew that there was something wrong with him.

That deranged machine carried on like a slug while pushing out a giant tongue out of its second head unit connected to the basin region. Barred and with a few extending eye-lets which rounded themselves unscrutiably, he was filled with them. It looked like a diving suit which had the helmet region broken and wide open. A small head with no sockets grinned inside. He had no arms, but appeared to have a small canon pushing out of its left shoulder. With all those gizmos which recorded something on his chest, you wouldn't even know something was wrong with him.

His deranged face only swam in that liquidless hole. Surrounding his entire suit and body were a few nails that dug in metal and in skin.

Most importantly, he bore a belt that carried over two metallic extensions which resembled arms but bore no fingers whatsoever. Those mollusk-like encasings bore smiles of their own and only made it worse for everyone around them, as all four of its faces seemed to jitter and become animated at times. All of them jerked and paced about, trying to stalk something despite having no mind on the matter. There was something excruciatingly undefinable about it. With the way in which it produced the noise around it, that creature taunted everyone on board. And yet, the derangement was yet to come. They weren't even paying enough attention to realise he was there, carefully watching not to take a sling shot around them.

It was wrong to ask, especially with the tanks he was guarding. He was pushing on with a wild array of locknuts that had been displaced around the coffin.

'Who died?'

Road was suspicious of the creature, going as far as to measure it to its size. He was morose in some way. He couldn't pull himself out of it for various reasons not even he could glance at. They were begging for a command. Thinking, least of all of boxes that weren't there. It got harder and harder to approach their conviction for as much as it could be forlorn.

'I asked you something, what are you hiding in that coffin? I know you've prepared something in there, do not make me ask again.'

No one was spared from it. At least no one who paid enough attention to the signs at large, they were vermin after all and as vermin would do they would cuddle around one another, seeling off panthomines. Determined to last.

It was just as they previously thought. Betoken befoul and hear of them now. Within their cold approach there was no reason to go on and ask for something to repay them. It wanted to waste their time. Before reaching the High Acres district which only strolled and forwarded towards the piece of land that remained untainted, as it floated a few meters off the ground. Various planic surroundings came on.

Most of the cargo as well as the ship would arrive on time. As for them, they sometimes heard messages circulating through the waves. They wanted to get through with one last time.

‘I feel like.’

Duran turned for a moment now. The monk had joined the others on the maindeck. With him, there stood thae Tongue-suit, Rod, Koov and some other deck scrubbers who were just watching. Nearing some question now.

‘I feel as if we were waiting for this moment for the longest time. I may not be able to explain it yet, but there might not be any return for us after it.’

Seemingly confused, no one said a thing. It was pointless, in actuality since most of them didn’t know one another. They were only normal after all. At the end of the day, they didn’t actually understand what was going on. With all the changes in the weathertops, there wasn’t any reason any longer to look at how life had been prior to the bark.

‘I still think about the world down there, I’m still trying to figure out what went wrong.’

It was peaceful for a while, for the longest one at all. Who was the culprit who took away all of the stars and what happened after? During times like these when people gathered, the blue turned to dusk and it looked as if we were in space again. A corossivness pushed on as we drove with the ship in an empty black sea with no light and no glimmer in it. Lies only brought you home.

Why were they headed there and why had it mattered? As much as it could be pointed at there was only one ill-defined reason to survive and thrive for. Forth they called, the journey calling, stretched upon the marks of stoppings. We were supposed to do the same. Going around the tributaries instead of wasting time, as we died now, there’s no chance we won’t fall behind.

In death we served another being, in death we found them. Though there were other people seraching desperately for it to be found, we would not allow them to cut us off. No wonder failure came at a price. You had to be there to understand feel it crossing through your veins as they read through every piece of the mind. With each strike, it had come to that. Need be return from your rest. Follow them wherever you go and make sure you get your hands on one of those blasted liver-kettles if you can. Bear us no longer and march forth. Ignario was the first to rise. He came back just as he had been, riddled with some holes which only came when needed. A failure he thought.

‘How can I still be alive?’

Why, they would spend their vile needs and think of vines. In the court of Shrine where they were met in that stony palace the others waited their turn.

‘Wait for him to be finished and only then I shall bring your back to join.’

Misery could not be obeyed for long. Not as long as there were so many pests that were making the factor. If there was something to lean, it would be lost on them.

Down there the winds still yearned for some touch.

‘From this day on, I name you my mad servant. What do you think of it?’

‘Swell, that’s swell enough for me to follow you through the gates of incest and make it for the grant fates of putrefaction.’

‘That’s where we shall go then. Towards the Fates of putrefaction I say, that’s the next step on our grand journey. Let it be known that there’s nothing that’s ever going to stop us from getting to them.’

Armed to their teeth, they jumped on the ostriches and started advancing towards the Prude. He stooped low as he was misunderstood by the others. It felt like he could be lost, at any point. His eight legs were already stretched and resting. Beyond every kind of release, he could find no peace of the mind because his eyes were not blind enough.

‘What do you want from me?’

‘Join us, Prude, I hear your legs are fast enough that you could race us on our ostriches.’

‘And who told you that, young man? I suppose you came here to mock me thinking I would make an easy target to begotten on the back. Patted as I wouldn’t say it, look behind.’

He saw at that, past the mild sand-mist, there was a large zone filled with the smallest pebbles that the eye could see. Nothing grew, other than some lost sand dunes that weren’t even real upon coming further in.

‘As I said, would you do me the honor then? Would you step in closer and do me the pleasure?’

‘Prude, I only want to ask of you this, allow us to race you for old times sake. If we can keep up with you, why not join us in our quest?’

‘What do you seek?’

Chivalry looked at Prude. He didn’t get it yet, nor had he cared for what he stood. Corner to corner and even farther in, he wanted to see how fast he was just like in the young days when there was no one to shout him down. He understood it now. Chivalry wanted to tell him that he’s only considered pursuing his dream because of him, naught more. Slimmers or tiredness came forth, it couldn’t be believed yet, but it raised itself as the question rose. Standing there it looked like a giant tulip which wore a golden mask that should’ve stretched for a few more centimeters out of the rim of its body. For a few moments there, it waited, preparing its legs, stretching only for the show of it.

‘Are we going to race or not?’

‘So, if I understand correctly, what it is you ask of me is this, given that I’ll defeat you in a foot race, you shall leave me alone then?’

But here lay the trick he had in mind. Chivarly looked at Squire, who was unsure himself. Won’t he simply refuse to run? Will he not slow down to let us win instead of planning the run? Of course not my dear Squire, his pride wouldn’t allow him yet. I’d even go as far to say that he would chase with us instead, to the rest of the world, whence they might fill our pouries with the dult.

‘We’ll race then and do what we must. I can only hope you’ll keep the end of the bargain and race us till the sun goes down.’

‘No more and no less. I’d like to confess that I know nothing of either of near-like, I couldn’t fathom going as far as I could. If you weren’t near, I should simply consider staying here for the rest of my life. But you needn’t hear my story yet. I think I’ll simply fall behind or make sure I’ll overpower you against the force of the sun.’

Damn that thing was on his side. For as long as there were golden shades, the muscle would never decay.

Regardless of the lack of action, his boredom and the many times he refused to step in line as they listened to him ride. And thence they started, just as they said, as soon as the sun reach the dead point instead of trying to set forward on a run never meant to be. It was decided then, they’d run.

‘Go ahead, now!’

‘Careful Squire, we’re supposed to keep in line, don’t cross him and don’t fall behind.’

Chivalry said, as he charged through. It got discarded and put back. He couldn’t fathom losing this before it started. But Prude as he may had already gone into a flight as they barely kept on his track. Galloping on many legs, there wasn’t a way of pushing throngs of spoken for, lost miasma, plenty of the daft. Sand was thrown against them during drops of less obscure manners, the rains would be spare and in-between as the race had gone for hours. There was no way of knowing how this race might end. Instead they only tried getting out of the way and pushing back in just so they could prevent themselves from getting ahead at times when he started slowing down. It could be done in only a few minutes as they spared no word. Nothing at all, then it started. Leaping over crevices that opened in the shattered stone, below them up until the hot cones that appeared, they had been overcome.

‘Wait, don’t step out there, it’s dangerous, way too dangerous for a man to pass.’

Prude leaped on and stopped both of the ostriches in time before they could fall off the invisible cliff. They hanged on as if wrapped against his lightly colored purple legs. Before even getting the chance to pull of hairs from inside their mouths, it was obvious that they didn’t like that.

‘You could’ve warned us you big useless cactuts.’

‘I was only trying to save both of you from falling in. Can’t you feel the drop?’

‘Why, I see nothing.’

The Squire looked mightily compelled by his own statement, to the point of thinking about it yet. The arrogance they showed was too much. It had been a wild ride out there, especially since they ended it prematurely. And there hadn't been any victor between them, other than the ploy. Abhorrent as it looked, they got over themselves and walked.

'It will take a while for to reach them. I do hope you don't have any thoughts about joining us.'

'We barely started on it.'

It was incontestable, without proper provision and any preparation whatsoever, this was only going to end up being a failure. And no one spoke of it yet. Sleep was a factor that affected all of them, including their ostriches. A failure after a failure of conditioning emerged. They slept under the sand carps for the night. Feathers blushed their cheeks as they scuffled through the dream before there was even an idea of a morning sun.

Why they spent the next day racing all the way around the dale. Fancying themselves exited over the lanes, they stopped at a solid riddling sop. It was a sore sight for everyone involved.

'Worthless, all you are worthless.'

A voice sang. It was a perilous thing they hadn't taken into account.'

They were not invested into the argument, though they turned. Blocking the sand-point where the cypress came along was dangerous on its own. A few slaps on his belly and he turned.

'That man was arguing with himself.'

'Get away from him, I think he's diseased, get as far away from him as possible.'

His body was producing a combination of immaterial gases that started hardening as his body grew. His chest encompassed his legs and arms, the face being torn apart, all from an impossible to control rage. They could see the wildly thrown apart teeth that only came out of the boar-like trance that sparked out of him. He wanted to charge but it came in vein.

'Let's split up, they said. They told me I should make it past that rock and hide there before it could reach and eat my ostrich.'

They knew what to be aware off and how to counter, how to spare and when to get away. Squire, instead of going by his business felt abandoned, as a tiny conglomerate would. While there was a balcony of flurid heat, he could only face himself going ahead as a tormented Inuit should. Taking his time, he spoke to the winds and listened.

'Careful now Squire, he's just about to charge at the stone.'

'Better get out of the way now before they get you, before they get you, before.'

He even identified the source of the wind, he lost a bet with the wind. It pushed through him, for a yadda-more. An engulfance of rusty black metal turned to gas as the sky turned into it at last. Everything seemed encompassed by this malignant sight of ember-blues. A twilight that had taken over the sun, a settlement of blue pushing through, but what now, what could he do now if not for the winds? He listened and asked them for a way, there had to be something he could do to disobey them. It was simple, he would have to give in to him now. He only wanted to perch his thirst with his forehead shattered against a rock. Though it was decided that he couldn't get away, the wind said.

'Don't lose your temper, or your life shall follow after.'

Slaps of doors made out of azuromistirith, came upon the closed holes of sand-matter thrown to prey.'

'Listen now, don't make too much of a languid movement or you may be shaken off the brow. I see the brothel of desire, there's nothing if you'll love to lose but we'll acquire.

Blood and the spoils, coming from your thrones that never got felt, care for that pet of yours, or we shall get you yet.'

Winds never treated him as unfairly as they had now, as they cherrised every moment pushing forth, out of there, now he walked. Seen and unseen as the others made it past themselves, it couldn't be believed any longer, why was it his lain side, the other ones who abided this distress? Wild and arrogant, the boar-like thing marched toward Prude and Chivarly, only to open his backs, many of them being coffin-shaped helped a lot for what was worth. It couldn't be beleived any longer, for the worth. They were throwing nets, which Chivarly carried along. Though Prude couldn't actually catch bit since he bore no hands, and this whole place got lighted only by his head, I could see the shadowy region behind me press on. I could be lost in there as in a cave, never to be met up again by them if I let go. For that reason, I turned both I and my ostrich and followed.

'Wait me for this, I know of some way. Don't bother with them in this reasonless hunt you muffle stinger and look at me, as you would in other times.'

Good lad, he would distract this thing just for us to get in its general direction. With that at least, we could tame the beast and make it so it won't walk again. For the wordlessness it showed in speech cannot be preached nor put to use. He needs to be taken down before we lose another man to the sounds. Waves were cast and you could see the swollen plants of sand-valleys falling on the dome. As that umbilicat thing spread its ray of missaligned light, terorr began as they fell upside down, onto it, yet less aware that they didn't fall on its ceiling but even worse.

In the middle there was an invisible floor that turned the sky and the floor of earth into the horizon. They couldn't make it out with the help of navigatorial delights, but thought about it now.

'How here, how near, how might we find our way? If this be permanent how might we make the line.'

Set aside from the other questions, for now getting out alive was the only important thing they could hope for. And each piece of the invisible force moved like the piece of some solid puzzle, revealing through transparency, as the variously thrown objects went away. As if they never existed in the first place.

'I see, now it opens. Look at it and you'll understand what we're dealing with now.'

It wasn't going to be heart felt just yet. Not while they were still standing and dashing from one another in fear of the retaliation that might come. For once they didn't bother to look for a way out; instead they drew near without even drawing breathe, trying to corner as fast as they could. It was impossible to try going at its neck for obvious reasons. Whatever it had done, however if had engulfed itself in those unnatural corpses, it had managed to shield itself from whatever we threw at it. No net would touch no rock, no pebble and definitely nothing of our own. Even those who appeared on its back had something against us as they began pushing us off, daring to come in as the least desirable creatures that could be. They who looked as if they basked in agony cheered the beast. From his every coffin at lease ten more of them started drawing out and pushing out of their dark sphere which came into us.

‘This land itself is breaking apart. Open your eyes and see what’s going on.’

For this was not something they could safely think of. They were the pests, the strangers and the outsiders who didn't belong in there. And for the same unnatural reason they drew on. Eating each other inside as they tried coming back to their senses, otherwise they couldn't do it. Not since the transparency, the invisible cloak, the substance which had carried all over peeled itself off. As soon as it happened, the meat-like factory revealed itself, as the twists and the looks, the distortion itself was caused by nothing else but the vine-like grappling long horns it wrapped around them.

They couldn't let go.

‘We have to push along and carry on as if nothing happened.’

Prude seemed to know of something the others weren't even vaguely aware of. If that were how it was supposed to be, so be it. There was little they could do about it either way. Faith could only be given to him, who promised them it knew what had to come their way. Then he started shaking and as soon as he had come to it, finally he released all that fibrous necrosis he hid inside his body for this long. As a cold or a pile of pain that dropped on a hare's entire body, it spread. Unnaturally vicious, it started gnawing at the mass, creating an intense pain factor that couldn't be accounted for long. It was thoroughly quiet, after the bang. It popped off without us even realizing what happened or what dragged it out of the way. It was not clear yet. What happened in the span of a few meaningless seconds? It burst out like a timeless mass, that wretched itself as it drew on.

As soon as they landed, they split off and made again for the nearest rocks they could hide behind, this time mostly instinctively, without a hint of animal hesitation coming from them or their masters. It was lost on them, as son as it could be pinned on. They sharked their way through the sand and landed just right on time.

‘Whizzes out there in the distance, what have you done? My poor creation now rests with the rivers of undesired. Why, is this what I deserve? To many my toys brought to a break because you terrible alienated things would not allow me to retreat?’

Ap hoe, ap hoe, I need to set sail forth.'

To each point, he took a strike of one of the poor souls that were caught on his back. It was undeserved but at this point it didn't matter at all. Not their pain and certainly not their lack of celerity. While there was a clueless satisfaction on his face, this, whatever else it was couldn't be any of their concerned at all. It was a vastly superior lack of mindedness which made him acquired the blood spurted on the ground.

His predominant features finally showed.

As his open maw carried forth, we all saw the atrocity it held. Just as Prude shone the light on its head, judge for less and think not for the ones that follow. For each death that came in, they would become shallower. He had too many incisors crafted, made, as prototypes would remain, for the sole reason of suckling on marrow, of drawing inside of it as many liquids as it could holster it. With this prude being overly indulging itself in the inflated ego it showed, there was nothing to do. Not alone.

It sucked the moisture from air and grew the bodies on the back. From those pseudo-coffins, those archetypes there were only his surprise. A demise coming from inside, because of him, he had been responsible for it.

'But where do you think you're going. My servants and my extensions, my arms, you cannot betray me here.'

They said less and carried on to eat the tray of the guts that had been spilled once the other toy had been broken apart, thing that got conveyed by their enormous bodies that expanded, inflated and drew on. It was unnecessary to think that it was them who looked like they were morbid. In reality they were the wretches of man, humanity out of its den, hiding while the separation emerged, and dark coming out of it no longer.

'The sky is returning back to the way it'd be. Can we go ahead now and run as far as our feet will allow us to?

Would be impossible to draw the line and stay aside?'

Squire thought for himself better, not to leave their side alone. Whatever reason be more abhorrent, he couldn't explain it pass the stroll, the ages calling, never longer than he should pass on. He was caught off the lance, carrying the dust dance, the mites that were in his hair floating like lice that wouldn't know how to pull away. And it could not be waited on. Lying still they waited for it to finish the battlement of ardor.

Wellington walkers had become completely paranoid. The noise stopped.

Some of the villagers had it just enough.

'We won't work the fields unless you stop and listen to our demands.'

The land-informer stopped recycling his bonds. He chewed through most of them by now. Every day spent as far away from the lanes, the black forests grew. Within the trees, the branches spewed black sinew. Bones would animate masses of skinless tones which crushed the land in defiance.

‘I cannot help it, you know that. Somewhere, out there, they’re looking for me. I’m planet beneath one of the trees. You may not like it now but I feel like I don’t belong here any longer. Neither of us do.’

As they gathered around the man, they patted him on the back. While doing so, they sang the wild tunes of the forests in hope that they could somehow get through, with the addition of a single new comer.

Ereth, who looked behind us. We were here with him but also there, split on both sides, trying to take shots at the black forests before it could approach.

Chivarly ended up not so far, coming up into this place, trying to guess the stars in wonderment. He crossed the valley he had been in amidst his wild charge and got into the crowd.

‘But what have we here? Why have I not been called to this yet? I’ve been mistakenly searching for a falling land, though only they could tell me of the right direction.

Where’s my Squire, where had Prude gone?’

‘Settle down, dreary knight, you need to rest and think of us yet. Mean thine be but this can’t be. The sink of thoughts clearly bothers thee.’

‘Please do not waste my time yet. I wish to cross through life with no regret. At least, at least you could spend the night with us while we’re in sorrow.’

‘What for, excuse me men, my ladies, but if you would be so inclined to do as I say, know that I am bothered by everything and I, I should help them.

That is indeed what I’m after. I have to help Squire and Prude, they’re being hunted.’

‘But wait a minute sir, and help us with the feud.’

Therefore, they sat him down momentarily and told him everything that happened there. How this mad creature who called himself the landlord of their entire land came out of nowhere and forced them to work with their bloody hands down. A servant, he called himself, of some distant cosmic sound contractor bearing the standard and the name of Mal’Kerth. Spoken as it were, they made him be aware of it yet. It was necessary, said by their words to agree that there was nothing else to be looked after. It had to be this way. They had to break out of his chains and free their village, yet instead.

Once or thrice they pointed at the vileness which grasped the plots and fields where the lanes of crops grew upon. From there, the conondrum was attained. Despair could not be regained as the dreary man said he would help. As long as he could think of it yet, he knew destiny would throw the two companions back to him in order to prevent the forest from growing. For a forest it was not. Instead, it looked like a growing pluck, an ancient root canal which spread the blueish hairs, the grim repairs crops that weren’t even aware of what they’ve been through. It was no desired any longer for simple reasons, that may be.

And now for the strike of force, where the blow of Prude and those of the Squire met, they could not even bother themselves to prevent pushing through the blindspots of the beast. And with every blow from rock or calf that pushed forth over his head, another corpse was left behind. With every loss of a body, the creature shrunk about a good chunk of its original size, until he would not be able to take it anymore. A trail of gore was left behind, leading to a blindspot behind the carcass. While both of them were distracted, it took the opportunity to cut ahead and make it before they could get to him. Instead of a march, they froze and lack the summer-lash. Swollen and perturbed they decided that this was the opportunity they looked for before they could corner it. And then and there it escaped, without leaving a trace or any kind of remains.

‘Where is it?’

It was here a moment ago. I could see its figure hiding behind this morsel.’

Squire turned to Prude. Both of them could barely think of the encounter and even less for what came after it. From one of the protruding holes, in which they hid their counterfit food and joy, there sprouted one of valley springs, pure distilled water coming from within it. There was no question, no bother asking. They suffered this loss, moving while suffering abuse, which was met at every twist and turn. To describe the dread they felt that day, giant invisible seeds appeared just about everywhere. And as they came on top of their faces, their bodies, the ostrict and the land, even the morsels, on top of the plains, they would feel their own emptiness seeping out and that of the terrain. It could not be accepted any longer because this pain was anything but normal. It discouraged them from trying to fit. Tracing Chivarly was already hard, but added to this, they could barely stand on their feet.

Yet the heir of the world had come at last. He couldn’t be seen in the contrast but be guessed at. He spoke with an inflicted accent, point at the sky. Despite not being seen today, his voice could still be heard as it conveyed the slightest hint of truth. It was what they looked for in the first place, hence the mysterious journey and how they found themselves standing here.

‘Go now and ignore the pain. Do not get overwhelmed by it, I say. You are to set out for a search and find it, one of the greatest artifacts in existence.’

As ominous as it was, it was perfect. Perfectly mad, especially since they went ahead and waddled in. Not only did they want to follow through but they couldn’t stop thinking of it any longer, for what was worth, they came up front and said.

‘We shall look and find it, regardless where it is. Don’t underestimate us just ye, because if there’s someone who might do it that would be.’

A small break from everything, just from where they stood, they looked at the mess around them, shook off some of the dust and had tea. It was a busy time of time but neither of them even considered who might join them. Peculiar thing, that he was, he walked slowly from the distance and barely stood by himself. Well cut around the head, someone they could trust somehow despite not even being aware of his name. He looked vaguely sick and many armed, though most of them could barely be shaken off since they were midly flailing as he approached.

This creature, though there was nothing even going so far as to allude to what kind of creature he was simply came along.

‘It’s been a long trip. It took me a while to get there, wouldn’t you say?’

‘Why would we say that? We don’t even know you.’

‘Then allow me to introduce myself, well not before. Wouldn’t care to invite me to a cup of tea as from a stranger to another?’

‘Will you join us then?’

Thought Prude for a moment, as he considered his pick, while balancing a cup on his hairs, he was doing his best not to prick a tail. Or say too much and wallow after dust. He wanted this as much as the others could be brought to it.

‘Listen, I’m searching for someone. It’s more than important for me.’

‘What a coincidence, we’re looking for someone as well.’

‘That’s not what’s I’m trying to say.’

‘But who are you exctly. Oh I beg your pardon, this is mightily rude, I’m Squire and that many legged giant masked friend of mine is Prude.’

‘I am Ogoth, though I suppose such names would mean nothing to you in any case. My name appears more likely to be lost to some, especially since time strikes to show me just how wrong I am.’

‘Why would that be sir?’

‘It’s because of what I am.’

Though there was no possible explanation either of them could understand. He was simply out of their league, a completely foul-marked humanoid, hardened, or perhaps stronger. He hid something. They could sense it but they didn’t say about it there. Mostly because it was rude if anything, that could be hardly approached. And even from what could be said, he had a part of his personality leeching off them.

As soon as he was done with his cup, he took one of theirs and started gobbling it up. Not even the porcelain cup had been spared from him. He got on their nerves quickly enough, which brought them back on their feet as they looked at the ostrich for consolidation.

‘What are we going to do now? I don’t think I like this man. He doesn’t look the type that would be aim to be heroic.’

‘Did you mention something about being a hedonist? Because, if you have, in that case I’ve got no other chance but to admit that I am to your claim, that I am one. Without delay, I wouldn’t question your decision if you chose to send me back.’

I know this much. You want to ruelly get rid of me as fast as possible before something even stands to happen in my presence, which is understandable. I know so much, I got that effect on others, especially on my worshippers.'

Ogoth had done so much harm to so many people that his will had evolved into something unconquerable. Destiny smiled upon him today.

Lifted by his own magnificence, after having drowned himself in blotty tea, he said.

'Let it be known now that I shall make no distinction between myself and my new.'

He waited for an entry. It was their turn to speak.

'Friends of battle?'

They didn't resent it, but at the same time it was not only short lived but somewhat missing, from what they said. It would be fair to say more, yet he provoked them even further.

'And what are we to fight now?'

'A dogged champion, the sun itself, we need to find it out or run about.'

And thence he spoke of the artifact to him and waited no more than it was needed. He would heed even less than he cared for, and push aside everything down the sword. 'We should follow that trail, there's a forest where it ought not be.'

Thence they went forward to a throttle. It was at this point that they passed the carriages that were drawing in. Collectors were being brought from the fat never-feast. Forward from their outer doors they came connected with tubes and born-horn that kept them in line as they penetrated through their arms. And they were nastily pushing through their wooden scalpels in hope that they could write in sough. It had denegerated to a look, a sight of many which threw itself on. Reaching around the morsels they started cutting them as stakes, pushing out the coals inside their guts in order to eat them rare. It was the same type of sight they wondered at.

'Should we not stop them if we can?'

'Are we to ask the crones whichever way we should go instead of watching?'

It was obvious by the laughter that they weren't paying no credance to the dust, as they went ahead to eat.

And Ogoth took a morsel for himself and ate it raw. He couldn't fathom leaving it any longer without taking a taste for himself.

'See? It's not unlike me not to take it anymore.'

They were likely to know better than this. To follow him around and show him the peace and quiet he could only fathom if he stood in place. Something raced inside of him but nothing came. I see the thread of sand, it's coming.

'He thinks we'll help him.'

'Bring the honeycomb and make sure it will do wonders to the strong.'

Mistakes were being made, as they hopped on and slowly went their way.

‘You should meet Chivalry, I think you’ll like him.’

‘And why do you think that?’

He reminded him so much of the knight. Squire was hoping not to say a thing just yet. It was a vivid flash of lights and sparks that helped him deal with the dourness of the colored curtains of the sky. Sometimes he could look at them and see something pulling them in the distance. He was constantly day-dreaming. And that dream would never end. After knowing who he was now, he chose to spend less time in bed.

‘I think I shall join him one day, I’ll join his order and be a part of it.’

‘What’s happening, little man, are you coughing blood now?’

Ogoth found himself drawing closer to him. It saddened him to see the little man cry. Wait, I know what shall cheer him up.

‘Look at me. I have turned into a lamp.’

And it was a giant one he turned into. Not exactly, he couldn’t actually shapeshift, that was his trick. He actually pulled in another Ogoth who died and faded into inexistence as soon as he was revealed. As that’d be over, he could simply reappear and be there again.

But that’s not where they all faded or got pushed away. He couldn’t have completely faded, instead. He stood placed in front of the object he appeared to be shaped off, in a null-reality, where he couldn’t move. His body folded as the object he was actually facing. And both of them shook as they were facing one another, vibrating as if to be felt.

In Ogoth’s eyes you could see the lamp-Ogoth twice. So on and so forth, looking for the worth, it might happen that eventually it stopped. But he had his name embded, from now on there, not as his original name but the name of the object he was forced into, as it disjointed his legs and bones. That was the first part, thence came the next. As soon as he could think of it, he started elongating, adding to the rest of it. Neither him nor they could face the fact, that they were forming the continual rematerialization as they stretched ahead. And from the whole they pushed into atoms and life would be formed anew from the sacrifice they died for.

That was the race of Ogoth for, a meaningless existence which gave birth to life. After a while, it would be infantile but not for too long after.

Evil Disciples

It was a sad turn of events. It only came to him then. There were other powers at play there but they chose no to involve themselves as the funeral proceeded. Though the distant twist ended up the line of Di’Dorko, there was another one in Greece. Not so far as to forget the peace treaty being signed, between the magenta' lines, which went thicker than the wine, lousier than the sprout. And thenceforth, he came about.

A well-dressed businessman by the name of Argus bore a single well-drafted feath-pane around his neck. It remained to be seen what he would do, especially since he had no family name to begin with in the first place. He lived a solitary life and managed to live in peace and quiet. No one was there to disturb him. Just earlier that day, he met a merchant and slapped his jaw away from his face. Only by a quick recovery did he manage to calm the man down and drain the blood with a cup. He drank from it after filling it with hot-chocolate which immediately dismissed any kind of confusion the man had on his face.

'Great, it's just how I hoped this to go. I'm glad you understood what I was doing here. Otherwise, I think I may have been forced to, well. Pay you for the damage. Seeing how you're a well made man and I'm telling you that, I can take something from you.

I'll even pay you handsomely for it. Let's see what you have.'

On his long tabard which was placed on the sandy beach of Tealossolus, he held a bunch of oranges, olive oil, a bunch of pepper-shaped marble statues that were being held by Discobellus, and a single hand which had been ripped from below his moustache, where they had rightfully grown. It was clear, he wanted to shake me off. Now, now, I won't fall so easily for it, as I got the upper hand. Both of his, in my arms, as I came to disarm him, I realised he had an inwardly circular hammer which dug deep enough in his wrist. He got it from a hit and miss that happened last night. Less than twenty minutes ago, to be more precise. I always wondered why the sun was halvened like the Moon, and they they contrasted with one another as the eighteen cycles competed with each other until an endless day-blight came to notice. While

I knew this wasn't the time, I asked only for what was mine.

'A gray cup, made out of sorted pricks, that's everything I need, for now at least, but I think I'll come ever so often when I need it if you don't mind.'

I smiled in order to let him know that I meant business, this time I think I even out-did myself three more times. This time I went around the spindle and found myself leering at some tourists who couldn't mind their business.

It displeased him being there for long. Out of his time and pocket there came no reason to be bound to the place. Now now, he bore a few feet but brought himself to a ninety-degree angle just to watch them yap their mouths.

There was something he had forgot to check. As he rushed through the beach and back to the place he rented, a small abode within Tesiallorious, he spared not a single second any longer, before coming in terms with what he's done. He's killed his own concubine by accident, shame on him for knowing that it watched all along, blasted creature which appeared only when he crowded nothing from the others as soon as he was about to catch himself off guard.

It manifested from the many horned-bits that stared popping out of the floor, which constituted his chest, as soon as the other sides pushed through its intestines, which manifested out of its face. From no apparent feature, there also came the plain surrounding which encompassed it entirely, like an overly pushed and swollen cocoon. No longer would there be a plea for it to see. For each long-horned mouth that came after soon started rounding itself up until they formed a grand circle they carried on. With the least of a pleasing disease, they started climbing over and stopped contending, pushing around miniature grasping-toes that resembled fat, jointless, boneless yet jerky complete imitations of mules, all of which sang as they tried putting up with all the grease, the bitter pris that pushed out of it. For what would be worth, there was this which had to be said.

This entity wasn't completely formed. It moved on but stopped, as each independent limb floated about in place, never being domed by the cocoon which was supposed to have it worn there.

'I have brought you a message from the other side.

Your ship is lost.'

'How did it happen?'

'A man by the name of Di'Dorko had come unto it and decided that the best course of action would be to follow the wishes of an old man who wanted to have his brother dead.'

'What does that have to do with me or with my beautiful ship? I demand an answer from this incompetence, a reason, even for what happened there. It can't carry on like that.'

'Silence as I am to speak now the words needed to carry over and fix this mistake. I shall give you the password which will lead you to the meeting place where you shall meet the first and foremost Man of Everloom. And he shall take you the realm where your ship is placed.'

'Wait, I think there's something else I ought to do before recovering my peace of mind.

Tell me, just where is this Di'Dorko.'

And it spoke of the waves of Sicily and of the way back. What would happen if they were to confront one another and what it might happen after he was done with him.

'I won't abide to any trickery, and for that I'll warn you, messenger rot not. I will take this personal issue very closely to me, and bring nothing but the utmost unforgivable wave of agony any man has ever faced on this planet alone.'

Argus thought himself way too grand to wait. He turned about his room and leaped out, twenty feet resting off the ground, still waiting for his feet to set contact with the paradome floor. It was an interesting way of saying, just what happened in the world. It simply went mad, just by looking in the distant sky. Some skivvied holes, some doming throngs opened and from them came some unnatural beings that carried on as if they weren't even interested to be there. It felt alienating just being there, thinking of getting out, but that's what life had come to now.

It was twenty feet away. During the march of noon, the streets of Jupiter Tessela came on. Someone was working on them now. Large, burly-built constructors, made out of arms embded together, caught in by steel. Compared to a normal street-plaft, it was clear that the general area where cars circulated has been raised on by a few meters down the drift. Only a few hicks stood in there and the constructors were rang up for a removal. Some of the hicks had bene pale and long, their broderies were brittle. Caught in by some unnaturallness, they were slowly being drenched in limes. Just for the batterment. Argus looked at the process in admonishment. He considered inquiring about it but stepped back before he could make a regrattable thing.

It was hard to quantify who was in the right in the first place. With every tool set on him, finally our lord and dark maker of grits could feel pain.

'He's being torn apart, I see.'

For far too long had we observed this turn of the Tetrihalot's many tormented sons. Seen them as we may, all of them were eaten and taken back to a long turn of the sop when life was unchaging. Time for the return.

There was an intricate system of underground ghetto-like tunnels no one dared approach. Inside of them hid the dark-skinned prisoners and the filth non-humans of the lowest worth. There they did what they knew best and what could only be said of all of their kin. Kidnapped children were raised in there, beaten and abused. Worst of all was the fact that they would be spat upon while doing something that should not even be imagined, even as little understood. It was this illness they carried with them that could not be taken away.

And most importantly, this hatred was genuine, more so than anything ever encountered there. They were beaten in the head and upheaved. Some of them would do much worse as the children promised to grow until they would not be needed anymore. Thence they would be taken and abandoned, as their skin was too fair, divine. It was a laborious task, disgusting and disturbing and even hearing of it happen would make everyone's blood boil for the reason that they'd know. Somehow they'd be made aware of the true neature they carried in their skin. So many shades still could do nothing but carry on their inability to fit. One of those days, or night in which they hid in the dark, they dined on blue eyed child. It was loathsome how they started gnawing and spoke their gibberish tongue. A lost dialect which made it much more incomprehensible, it was a disease of the mind, the brain and theirs alone to take. A burden they could not carry alone after. It pushed on and foamed as the laughter stopped after.

What they were laughing at? None could draw away from it. Those dumb, not even human-like scum brain stumps stood there unable to decide what they could do in order to get away from the pressing ceiling. Alas, a mistake would finally take care of itself as it needed only this to get around. It could not be fathomed or dealt with any longer. And they toppled their own fingers in order to distract themselves with the other pain. While deciding what to convey, now they turned into their empty beds and waited.

First their heads popped out of the pressure coming from the ceiling, as something heavy was being transported from above the road. Terror shook them rightfully as legs and joint went hand in hand and broke ahead. It was what happened to the ones who snuck beneath the border. Most of them not only had not belonged, but they weren't to be set right around the point of being freed. It was important that they should not sweat. None the matter, they would be flattered and flattened in no time, not that it mattered for any longer now.

Arugs merely carried on his way.

Vile Nation

They started rummaging around the place, trying to distinguish any of the words from around the books.

It was more than clear that they neared the point where it didn't matter what they were doing.

Dead ends, that's what they cared about. There was no way in and no way out, even complaining was nothing to be held against them. Anger was a part of it, in fact, as it took over them, they hadn't a choice in the matter. Her statuesque form had. Let it pass as a reminder for now that she didn't object to anything we were messing around with. Instead, she very much wondered at us and peered.

They were on a short notice, thinking about it. What was life like out there? In the distance and in the woods, where their last handles carried on without them, it was as clear as the sky after all. And they could stand still for a few more hours. It was an aphrodisiac, waking up at the same moment despite not being asleep. Only someone who's constantly been a daze could understand and fully grasp that feeling without being wretched.

Wasn't that so? It was in shambles, but what was it? What exactly was it?

A knife wasn't enough to scower the surroundings. Especially since it kept a tendency of leaping abroad and taking parts of them they didn't want to give up on. For a second, seconded, but for one, in the Hjeln district in the city's enclave, one of the assassins questioned it.

'Why are we recycling bodies now? Is it not something we should keep away from?'

'Stop it, you're entering a dangerous territory now. Look away from them.'

Porr thee' be of soul. As they withhold no honor of their own either. Instead they only chose the unreasonable choice, of pushing through the unawares without the boldest plot they might enjoy yet.

Replacing those unlawful materials was the cleverest plot they ever came up with for a good reason. What they had in mind was so dreadful and vile that not even the rivers of Hyades could compete with their beguiling nature. It was only believed now that they had something further to show.

‘Brockssr, I think you’ve outdone yourself this time around. If I weren’t where during their conception, I would’ve thought these were real men trapped inside their unnatural state.’

‘Thank you my dear companion, I truly think I outdid myself too. Just take it in you for a moment and smell the ashes left under their hardened state.’

He did. Despite trying to cover as many areas as possible, the clay hadn’t completely become rock-solid as he expected. Brockssr had a mindfull thing to do about it, despite his responsibilities being somewhat luck-luster, this was his thing, this was his magnificent globe-chaster. A eraser of the dark past, a way in and out, and most importantly, a trick of the hat. With this they could get hold of the victims’ remains and do them a proper burial. Perhaps there was a reason for it, ought to be not what he expected, but his friend had something else in mind.

If only I could get the bodies for myself two nights after we transported them, then I could bake a brood of poisons for myself again. No more twarthing, not a single missed slip. I could be rich in no time. Clossor thought, as he’s been brought to an unaware station of confusion as they walked the hay during daylight. Neither of them knew of the repository of bodies everyone hid underneath the chalf. It was dark and husky but seemed like the place to be. With everything being mindful, it was that outlandish city-look to it, despite being set a few feet beneath the ground. And little remained of it after the reappropriation, as the craftsmen fought fiercely to keep it away from the thieves. It wasn’t meant to be used that way. Its blue arches only dreaded the piles of men that gathered about, even the strange strangulation motions weren’t to be found any longer. There, in the ash-trays, on top of them stood the mounds. And it was peculiar. Unable to comprehend the smell, they constantly used some sprays contorted enough to disable the smell from their nostrils as they worked down there.

Most were unaware of the body-odours that were taking care of the bodies. Deployed by the chief-poison makers themselves, these semi-transparent creatures bore their giant liquifying bodies still as they spread throughout the piles, making sure decay wasn’t getting in; the fungus and the mold, bacteria and so on.

From their weirdly ecstatic bodies sprouted a few unnatal, guttural feet that looked as if they were dragging away at time. In an unexpected look, one assassin thought he saw it, but he hadn’t. For a single sight would leave him blind. As the terror hid beneath its hindering hundreds of legs were as hardened as to carry all of its offsprings in them. And from each stick-like fat induce, child bearing legs, more of them came out, those of the young.

In its small yet solid yeat-skull, it kept most of the congitive power which guided its luqid-torso through all of the holes and possible entries that were there. So much so, that it only seemed that its hips were dragging ahead, pushing through the sludge as the bean-like torsion often looked like a small pea on top of a solid plate that was being kept afloat by all of those legs. That was the pain it bore, for having all its body-mass unattachable.

But what seemed to be more vile, what would defile its own expectations was the fact that there was something to it. A dread from within that was being followed by magus watchers. In their pox-globe, they watched as if from a screen. What they peered about was the fact that there was some debt of knowledge owed to them. It was important, here and there. Just peering ahead turned that vile slime from transparency into a purple goop that crept in the sinew of apes.

‘They’re using it, I see.’

‘The assassins went over their way to make it behave. But I see that they missed something on their way there. It’s way too unnatural, look at the movements it’s supposed to produce. That’s not what they were made for.’

Though the second head on top spoke of ill and ailment, his guest’s head seemed to bear only the slightest comprehension of the torsion its neck contained. It his something in there, though that stalk-like head holder only appeared like an eaten apple which stopped at the seeds. It knew that it was being watched, it even sneered at us.

‘Ah, but let it do so, perhaps it might understand we mean business, after all, this, this job of theirs can’t be anything other than a sham, could it?’

‘It might, it might, who’s to tell that it isn’t that?’

Of course, there were pointers and there was the slightest chance of getting in the way but one in particular desired it more than they. What was that? On the streets nearing one of the many repositories, there slowly grinned Brockssr and Clossor, both of them being slightly trapped by their unnatural gaze, they seemed to be aware of something going off. Inside their minds, inside their surroundings, they fidgeted in their spots, it was something which was not supposed to go ahead. Luck-luster and caught instead of walking paces, they seemed to have come to the entrance to the secret entrance.

‘Down there, as I told you, we simply have to leap inside, follow the path ahead, and we will get there, where the bodies are, understood?’

‘And how will be able, you know, do it now?’

For the time being, they had no clue as to how many bodies they were recycling into toxins. As a matter of fact, they only prepared two clay bodies which began shrinking because of the heat of the sun.

Brockssr only reassured him that he had done his best and that the bodies would begin growing again when moisture was applied, of course, after assuming that the places where they stored the bodies were cold to the touch. It was all too needlessly complicated for anything else to be done. And most of their tricks and pebbles had been lost up until this point. They wanted something for themselves, it would be this as well. This was their magnum act, their way of getting everyone.

‘Just enter the secret pebbles in as I told you and we’ll have entered in.’

Two red, one blue, an aquamarine one, four of green, five of purple and a golden-shaken rock-pidgeon were thrown inside one weird looking water container that was hidden and pushed deep enough to look as much as a part of the door as the hidden handle. As this, this was only what appeared to be a tribute for the repository. It knew we approached. It knew of our intentions, though it only saw it as a single way of pushing on, of drawing in and tricking everyone with false-senses that could be.

Much more so, it was important to know what the stakes were in there.

‘We were told to get as many of them as possible. And don’t worry there won’t be anything else more to add, after taking care of this injustice, my mysterious friend told me that he’ll set us on the right track.’

‘Which track? Come on, I’d like to know more about it. Please just tell me, Brockssr, I’d truly enjoy knowing.’

‘All right, since we’re here.’

And the tribute had been accepted, the gate slowly rising despite the handle not being touched, they were med by a wild array of moving corridors that switched between themselves, somehow getting through each other like illusions. Be prepared my friend, as I told you, this might get tricky and mad. It might just be that you might end up being unable to watch your side. The thoughts were arranged. For now the plan was to simply walk straight ahead and never lose focus to what they were doing, not to get side-tracked.

Some order had to be instilled.

But the plan still remained the same as they had cherished it within their hearts.

‘We’ll be on our first track to finding out the name of the Curator.’

At which Clossor’s ears grew two times wider, just at the wonderment of what that might mean for him. Just the mere contemplation brought him to a world of unknowns and wonders. Who was that Curator he had heard off? And more importantly, as they dreaded the manifestations of the lost paths, which was meant to serve as a filler for the plebians, the dreadful watchers, there they came. Never again had they wondered at it, as it wouldn’t serve them well. It was important now, peering on.

As he wondered, so he told it well.

‘Is the Curator still alive?’

Visions flashed in his mind then. Despite never seeing him, that tall looming figure stood. Through his glowing eyes, the glazing shroud of wings behind, the egg-like sacks that never died only stood forth. Terror followed once he dreaded to realise that the Curator had achieved flight. Though he couldn’t know, he couldn’t see it right, this only seemed like an alienation of the mind, this figure appeared supreme, it looked like there was nothing to it, but the slightest show of grinning dread. Below him, he showed poor Clossor a world filled with Curators. Or others that looked like him, though at the same time they were below him, somehow.

It was a city he dared not think about, even though it had been forced onto him. He wasn’t supposed to wait in the yeast of it, but carried on at his own risk. A responsibility drew near. Don’t mention this to anyone else, let this thought die alone if you have to, but don’t tell anyone you might come upon. He would suffer long after this happened, without a way of knowing what went on. Both of them were being deceived, yet it came as no surprise that a startling sound woke him up from the vision.

‘What’s this now?’

‘I see, the clay-bodies already started growing, that’s a good sign I’d say. We cannot ignore it as much as before.’

Why was it so important to know what his name was? There was no explanation to it, no wonder and no reveal. It had been poignant and pointless to find out. It would do more harm to dig up where others couldn’t. A waste of time and false approach, filled with stolen heaps. While going over their heads wasn’t enough, as a matter of fact, he didn’t want to approach them any longer. No one would do. It would be their deaths and that of others, which meant that their lives could be forged into the list of dead.

Consider this, he said to himself. What if I were to jump in the pile and avoid living, thinking even of him. Now, with every passing second, he could think of it, which instead of drawing him forth, it could only make him push onward, largely forgetting of what was going on around him. Surroundings faded as he followed and soon, he woke up, unexpected, but looked for, Clossor gave in and joined one of the many surrounding centurions, as vermin would walk along giants. This would be him. The new reality, reeling in, but beware, step away. His conscience struck him in time. A moment later and he would've been completely stepped upon, as the pile of stones which were a few feet long and barely away from where he stood. It was a release he never considered.

Being there, talked upon, not with. He feared this echo which manifested inside of him. It felt like the centurions were speaking from inside his gut, trying to get out after getting their chance on.

'Stand still, I'll make it slow, I promise you.'

'But I don't intend to die today, not this night either, not. Simply, I do not want to be ended.'

'That's a tough surrounding you put yourself in, but I'm afraid there's no way you may get past us.'

Impossibly shown, he appeared to not care at all for what I thought. Neither of them had, assuming only that I would eventually be stepped upon by one of them, now I had been completely ignored. More would come after me after sparing too much. I was being watched by some peering eyes that wanted to catch me and pull me over.

Existence was futile then. If only there was a way to convey it now. Only by leaping from place to place, only by making sure there was some way to pass through them unscathed could he escape.

'I only came here by chance. Don't provoke me you shallow beings, or I'll cut you off and carve you into pieces.'

'What do you expect from us then?'

No entry's being abrrred, not there.

He couldn't fathom being forced to thread too far.

But fare thee farther away than there and you would know what dread trully means.

I had to be removed from the world. Even here I was only but a dumped strule-mulic voice that was disjointed and had nowhere to go. Who would listen to an old foul thing as I was?

From inside the broken Cathedral-city where the praying delectors swamped through the various notes that were left unburned, disciple Kletshorkn appeared. In as much as a fearful gaze he travelled as far as he could in order to make sure that faith was still distributed on by whatever means necessary to allow its survival. The widening of his head pressed on, as an imploding octopus would, leaping on the sides as the exposed skull of a shackled jackal creature pressed on from the protruding head. Hornets popped from his every side of the body, beautifully adorning his large limbs, bearing teeth crowns amongst them, pressing past the chimes in tins. At the back of his head, yet a larger more unstable face emerged, organic looking, yet similar to a giant stretched vermin with its bubbling eyes twisting enormously out of their way. Large bars came out of him, connecting to his back as the front bore various primordial incisors that drew on. Some malformed top of the rooftops almost managed to emerge but lack the other forming features that gave them the mad appearance the disciple took forth.

Kletshorkn was the one in charge. He had to make sure that faith would go on ahead without losing its last laugh. It was infuriating, allowing him to do as he pleased. He was noted for his cruelty, just as he stepped on their graves. So many men died in there, and in all of those coffins, there was one man who might've known something about the Curator's name.

What was it? What could it be?

His name was lost to an avalanche of insignificance that lost itself past the grips and holdings of a cell. It wasn't well. Yet they wanted to now. As desperate as this sounded, it would be impetuous to say otherwise. They were filled with some ill-found desperation from which they couldn't draw away from. All the while they were making their way towards the suburbanesque areas where the bodies were placed in.

Clossor was getting to the point of being afraid. Jutting near his friend, towards the repository, that be damned, he couldn't focus on it no longer. It broke aloft before he could be crushed. He still wondered at that and asked.

'What if we found out his name? What do you think of it yet? Do you think it would change our lives by any chance? Would it somehow make us more, what's the right term?'

'It would give us an advantage over others, that much I know it to be true. Knowledge had some unseen power not even you could botch or hinder at. To think of it this way, you should understand where we are.

This grimstone wasn't placed here for no reason and that's what I'm trying to make you understand.

Foremost and almost you must consider this. Why are there no imperfections in the slabs?

Why are there tiny spots where the venture might turn on us? It's a pity you cannot see our solid reflections on them and hear what they speak off.'

He alone got curious as it did not bode as well. With every mark and scratch after every meter or so, the walls told a story of the place. It told of the two of them carrying the false-bodies forth. It told a story of betrayal which had been held aloft and said before. Time repeated itself as a tendency which wouldn't cast them in the dusk. It crept on them, as a way of speaking, after casting them inside. Yet at the same time the many tunnels combined with one another, interjecting on the story. Before Clossor could even sniff at it, he saw a different image being painted on. A trap waited for them down there, hidden underneath the corpses.

A centurion waited for them underneath the palace of corpses, trying to catch them in the unholy act. Worst than that, the distress couldn't save them yet, no matter how hard they tried. They only focused on the bodies, for that alone they were gutless and wondering. Just for a moment there. Are we truly good people now? How is that we're still assassins in any case? If what awaits us there is death, then there's no wonder that instead of trying to cut off their supplies, making sure no one died for nothing in this world, they could be overwhelmed by what waited for them on.

But of the walls, Brockssr did bring up a good point. They were nearing and extending. Clay-bodies boding with him yet, for a moment they could not be bothered to wait another second before listening to their complaints.

'Leave me here, don't listen to him. Don't look at the walls. Something dire's about to happen, he cannot be trusted with your safety. We know better, as we transplanted nothing but the best, the best.'

Shut your filthy mouths, he thought. It wasn't fair that he should listen to them now.

'Both of you are dead.'

But it wasn't so, for the sole reason that they weren't the assassins in the first place. Both Clossor and Brockssr were the clay bodies, carrying the dead assassins on their backs. Hence the problem started with their unnatural approach. It was hard to miss and hard to make sense of it.

They had been mid-washed, beaten at last. Forced to undertake the task of carrying bodies and piling them up, with the strange fornication of imagery controlling them even more. It couldn't be believed any longer for the sole reasons that there would be more work. And more of it waiting ahead, it was a tainted way of going at it. But that was the sole truth.

For when they arrived there, for the missionary sight, the reason being not delightful in the least, but the mind was lost at last. After throwing in the bodies in the pile, they were weary of the caretakers, who were busily spilling the fatness of their bodies in.

'Don't get near them and they shouldn't be able to hurt you. Trust me here, I think I know how this works. We'll act slowly now and choose two bodies from there.'

To be aware of it now, each of them picked the resin that was taken out of the bodies, claiming they were their own. As much of an illusion as it were, after wrapping them around their backs, each of them took twenty steps back. Both had read the signs they claimed to have been there. Despite the fact that they were nothing more but the clawing marks left by the victims which were taken to the repository and abandoned inside of it, they were tricked. Plain and simple, they were tools for the using of much greater, more deceiving controllers that hid themselves in the false-realities between the terminals.

For the terminals faded and appeared after dark. In the most illustrious dreams you could see them wasting as soon as the babble carried on.

On top of one of these terminals stood the complete disemboweled spy, spat on by the impaled giantly tormented oration structures, made out of the living mass. For the living mass, just like the sound-foam was made out of a mystic maleable substance akin to body fat. Harvested from it, one could either bring joy or pain through its creation.

And they stood tall, towering around him, like plots of monsters that slept together in close eternities, waiting to be woken up. From time to time they would try escaping, battling through the plain-tags that prevented them from getting out. If one single man would make it past them, if he were to wake them up, in this false reality which tempted even the blaster creators to enter it, life would take a new meaningful terror that might spread. The spy, the spy was important, he needed to be touched and felt. If it weren't for him to be taken past the rims of the hapless cretins, he could not see what waited for him ahead.

For the countless hours he repented, trying to consume as many watches for his master, he was given a pardon for what he's done wrong. The spy stood upon a spiraling, eight-coned, sun-stroked toweresque pair of pillars that went through the piles of fat surrounding it. Culminating on a platform, which seen from on top looked like a midly two-dimension representation of a sun, there stood the spy of Killois, enemy of Clot. He bore some cortex-chains that shot in every direction, aiming towards the sky and the clouds. Fromt here, he took all the information that was desired, releasing everything to them as the brought the attention.

'See? As I told you, give them too much of a consciousness and they would know too much. I see that there's something they did wrong there. They misinterpreted our signs and began thinking on their own.

Now they started searching for him, one of them even knows what he looks like.'

'I see, I see, but what of it? Why should it matter now? Unless we haven't seen a reason, unless we haven't thought of it, there's no possible way they could destroy what we've come to accomplish.
Even if they were to find him in his hiding, think of it for a moment. They're weaker than those buffoons, for the sake of argument, I say, they are made of clay. In an instant they would be either crushed or melted by their gazes.

I say don't look at it without wondering, leave it be as it is.'

'What about a wager then?'

From one bobbling body, past from the sphere of clouds, both of them dangled from one stide to another, growing themselves even farther. They were immobile but overthrowing. As a matter of fact, they could only live and think by manifesting themselves into him. The spy was unaware that Killois was a two-faced degenerate creature, bred out of hatred.

But after ascending past a certain amount of kilometers, one would be unable to distinguish the point where the clouds became him or the other way around. Parts of their body were pushed in and out, formed in gas, twisted and surrounding everything or nothing at all. Yet there was no wonder, and if he wasn't growing stronger, what was this stagnation going to get him through?

'I shall impart with him some knowledge that will be taken from our servant and placed onto him. Let him know the name of the Curator with one requirement.

He shall not be permitted to say, mutter, write or impart the name of the Curator to anyone else but himself.'

'But that would be cruel, cruel so mighty. Why would you do such a thing?'

'Because it needs be done, for this experiment of ours might give us a hint whether or not he's to be called into question. Will he be devoured by knowledge and die? Or will he accept the fact that he might be the only one knowing, that's the part which may never be called back.'

'You're not expecting this work, are you?'

'Why, I am. As a matter of fact, I know it will.

Obey your master, spy of Killois.'

At once he imparted the command without waiting a second longer before he could carry on. With the abyssal power, the stronger he pushed in, the less had he counted on it. For the longest period of time he wondered at this command, yet he had no other choice but to do as he was told. Henceforth, he was told, and he had done the boldest thing of all.

'Straughtom, that is the name of the Curator. Be it imparted with you now as if that would matter to anyone else. But you may know of it and choose to do it as you may want to.'

No one could possibly hold that thought for long. Mouths would be peached for the same reason they would be staunch and ever-pressing through the gums. Torment would force them to get around between the teeth as they'd be eaten past the rims. Outer worlds would inseminate themselves before long. The gore of sound would start again. And what might happen to him again at times like these? To the man who has betrayed his senses and chose to speak the name.

He would remain torn apart and beaten by the sound-waves travelling through his throat, bouncing violently as they tore everything inside his bitter blot of tones. Violently he would rise, pushing through the demise and ask.

'Why have I dared ask of him?

Why have I dared inquire?

Have I lost every ounce of a sense I had before? Is there no other hope I could get away from?'

Need I say more? It was less than important to accept that the assassins were of a dying breed. From their youngest and most tormented plots, they had forgotten just about everything about themselves. It was a pity none of them wanted to leave. But they were bounded thoroughly, physically and psychically. For once, Krexx wanted to leave the organization. It's what the Enclave had come to. The lowest of the low, the least likened reality, the end of an entry, they forced their higher ups in charge. For what was worth, they weren't of the same cloth, they weren't even from the same lot as the others. Ruling over them wasn't even as bastardly hard as they claimed it to be.

'Tell me again, why are we going through all of the names for the hundredth time?'

'Because this gives us yet another chance to dine on them and choose to who ought to disappear next. My dear Eurrh, I'm still just as surprised as I was before by you.'

Even after all this time, you can never find a way to satisfy my curiosity about you.

There's something I truly cannot point on you. Perhaps it's an extra-corporeal thing, do you suppose that would be right?

Do you think somewhere out there in the wilds there's some old sage who's controlling your body and tell you what to do?'

'That would be propostorous, no of course not, my body is my own and I have no intention on sharing it.'

I'm surprised this would come onto you as well.'

'Yes yes, silver lining and all, I think I hear him slouching.'

There it entered. Feet obscured, a robe made out of eights, numbers represented as well as the strange way in which its heads pushed itself out of the way. Several times, more than it could be counted, the defect showed it itself too soon. It erupted from a part of his throat and managed to push forth through the chest. Unknown to them, most of his inner organs were marked by the numbers. Some were five, eights, twelve, evens and some unknown signs but they never pushed out to zeroes. Most importantly, he wasn't anatomically right. For what was worth, he kept pushing himself in the middle, revealing a gap and from each side you could see the rotating needle-like tendons pushing out.

Some of the council members were frightened by him and that was for a good reason as well. He fed them, irresponsibly so. It was battered into him and there they'd stay. Insects, dust particles and the least needed toes. He's killed again. For the elite class, the rulers they fashioned themselves as, this was out of question. It was a supreme act of indiscretion he showed. No one wanted to send the signs and dine on his looted marrow.

'Sit down already, I want to hear the mourning songs.'

They waited a few more seconds, out of the agony of the opening that pushed the ceiling off. They were forced out of the way. Looking out for a red-dusted storm, a vision to a world that died. It quickly receded back, as the paiting on top faded. It was strange. No one caught them in the act, though they spent all of the earnings on lavish and luxurious trinkets they kept from their own. Even there, it was the act of an evil throne that pushed itself through. In the middle of the chamber, where the chamberlain came, stood the one reanimation tube-prick that entered the back of his head.

Compared to the others, he was a giant, a speaker of evil and most importantly too dangerous to even hope he could be contained. He was a repurposed Centurion. Beign of the worst kind, destroyer, agitator and instead of decency, he was the incarnation of the evil tide. Eight folds of the halls pushed in four directions, forced to do so because of his mere choice to return to life. Jonathan thought about this. What was going on here? In the distance he could only get to see the emergence of peril.

Beckoning the Isles

One last thing before the Isles, a small aspect which had conceded in its attempt to stay, at the least minute where a piece of its own mind conveyed only a desire to turn away and count the perching crass that spread about the place in the most obstrusive moment that could be. It was necessary for it to return, as if from a celestial bed of pores, whence it once trumped and fell upon itself seething.

As the glowing octopi started turning in their sleep. With their most malignant dreams having been realised, they had finally welcomed their master, who had managed to avoid the incertitude of the most deprave, the most lurid convictions and the judgement that had almost been passed on him by the evil court, with their lack of regard for those of old age.

With their loss counted upon, as they chanted upon in the pool of ink, below the rims of a stone, nigh-colossal sculpture which represented the embodiment of the worst aspects in life, there it stood. Resting in the sea of crowns, the stones and the mount upon which York back to. It was unnecessary to believe it any longer, for those that reasted upon them carried less of the conviction that their ancestors brew longer. It was a highly anticipated return and no one would mourn higher than them. In their pity, he had finally come, a-time, to say and lay upon them a reasonless touch, as to bring them forth and lend upon them the gift of York. It spread forth and entered them.

With a virulent approach, it pushed through them until they had been called upon. Seering his own signs, all of them began looking alike, and close in semblance to him. As bobbling puffs and bitter plumets within the casket of ground, no fortitude would account for all the malignant segments that shouted and pushed about the place in agony. The tyranny of York had returned, and as it came to it, only now could he push forth towards the culprits.

In the pit of the sea, where life had no place to be, there he went, in a most obscure fashion. Travelling with his own, all of them under his command, as they pushed on a solid wave of pus-pollen ink, which formed around the crust of their bitter walls, they finally surrounded the solid encampment and saw what had become of the men.

With the inhabitants of the island changed in such a manner, there was not impossibility of thought, he couldn't wretch in its own hide, about the reasonless approach, it came to his senses as he prepared to claim this place for itself. Nothing would stand and hide. Disturbingly set aside, there was only the shallowness rising to the brow. In the air, they started floating as they were so feather-like in weight. Without a need to breathe, which was dispatched off, they only came about to walk their own dutiful needs, bringing themselves to the breeds as they returned to land.

By the time the inhabitants woke up from their mad mutated-ruse, they had greeted the new arrival with fear and mistrust. A tint-forth of the world stood there, foiled around buildings in the empty silence. Woe to the emperor of flying gusts of shallow air. Marques was alone yet again, grubbing around his mouth as he walked around the town. He wondered at what the reason for his brother's dispatch was. Both were at a loss yet. Mark, what a petty name he called me. If only I had known better, I could be long gone from here. I could still embark on the next ship and see a way to cut my losses. After everything that happened, there was that. A five-way street and plenty of ways to head on about if a man wanted to have some fun.

Some were better than others, but he hadn't complained for a second more.

'Can I help you with something young man?'

The boy paid no attention. He turned around. A flat piece of his back only pulled down like a spring of liquid mirrors that appeared to be made of him. From there pushed some hard wires that looked like they belonged to a construction site. But the way they moved in and out and they searched about the place gave him a different impression. Bug-like, insects of metal digging through him like lice. He left no trace while running away. Despite his chest being heaved and pushing on from each possible side, there was one inefficient thing which carried on through him. He was.

Mark followed him out of some unnatural curiosity which made him followed. Least of all, he could admit it yet. Of course the stress had gotten to me, I'm ashamed to realise that I've lost something in the time I spent here. Too much of the snuff inhaled, that must be it. While going a few more springs into the right directions, he found himself met by the open-ended orphanage. I could not fathom the sight, the disturbing delight. In light of what I saw, this symbiotic building tied itself there. Some breathes pushed up and out, in and away until some centimeters out of it were taken. Other children were trapped in there and I could feel the flames coming out of the spot. They wanted to succumb to pain. And I would soon join them.

Soul-walking, strapping like a man, no one would help him then, they could get out of this island. Before it was too late, even as he realised the wrongs that happened to the children, he felt surprised by it. His mere legs not being his any longer, they were pulled towards them.

His mind was invaded then.

Deprave as they were, neither of their actions would last for long. There was no feasible way for their peculiar style of life to be sustained forever, hence the sudden drop into action. An oratory reaction lawfully shown by the proter as he came in, he considered leaving some of the strange buffoons that carried the will of the shallow.

‘They worry too much for no reason.’

It does no good for the brain. Makes it work too much and ask too many questions. Never good, never good at all. They weren’t making any good impression either. And that was the perfect setting for a failure as well.

‘Greetings oh payers of distrust, what must I bring in return to have your token taken to the head?’

‘Who are we speaking to now?’

‘Bringer of distrust, the maker of uncanny, I, the abhorrent being who may not be threaded on, who mark the entry into the city of evil.’

He spoke with a mad inflection, but no one would take the fall. It was out of the question, they would soon be taken out of comission from the pasionless crimes they were cited in. To avoid stagnation, only this was bequet of. Think before they cut ye down. He was a poor crook who found himself treading on the bad side of the town. And as one such would do him good, he had taken to walk on the top of his mast and see the crones. As they came out of their homes, abandoned as they were, the sabbathian town remained as pleasing to see as it once were. The giant statues were still watching over the port. Going over the mast and the heed, he could only dread heading back home alone.

‘Lo and there, a ship’s waiting for me, still. I could no longer stand the anchor, I need to please the sight and flee.’

There would be nothing in his mind worth keeping if it meant this way. They could butcher no romance in there, as the crone came near. Her appeal came in her youthful appeareance and the strange way she acted in. Within her robe, she carried only arms, no legs but she held on to the distinctly raised stone bricks on the road. Since they had been made this way, for her kind alone to carry on the edges, the crone was an advantage while walking. It was hard to see but it was night. Lamps enclosed the areas but it looked like day was out as soon as you came into one of their vicinities. Even the sun could be see during those weird periods, not to mention the strangeness and defiance of thought.

‘What do you want of me you woman?’

‘Allow me to introduce myself, I’m Gallilea, and this is my twin.’

Named the same, despite the hammock and the pain, she pulled her out with the help of their hands. Of course, now Marques understood, they were conjoined. But he asked them why had they joined him now.

‘We own the orphanage, that’s why.’

‘And we were wondering whether or not you would like to adopt.’

What in their mind? How could they ask, what kind of bile of thought was this? He could not discipline himself soon enough to do so. And what of a mother? He hadn’t know such a lady, not to mention that those he had been accustomed to, those he visited from time to time were nothing to be talked about. He used the most promiscuous dames, then felt shame and walked away. That kind of life was not fitting for a child to see. Influenced by it alone, he could end like nothing other than some kind of low-life cutthroat. ‘See thee be, I see thee be. But don’t forget that I need you to be there, in the cry of the bleeding dames.

They will cherish you no longer.’

‘Shut up Gallilea, don’t scare the man, he might consider adopting some of the children. I know it, he’s thinking about it.

Despite looking like the leader of a band of thieves, a cold basher at the back of the head for those who don’t know him, I think he has what it takes to be a father.’

‘You truly think so?’

‘Why of course, you do seem the type that’s well made for it, even craft. You’re a master, not a disciple of meadows. Know this thought, that nothing’s what it looks like to be there. For that I must tell you, join us.’

‘Yerah, yeah, join us in the courtyard, we shall make the further arrangements and the payments.’

‘Down the line, my sister means it, down the line. We wouldn’t want you to get too far in and make a rush arrangement. As a matter of fact, I think we could work something out. Indeed we could.’

‘Perhaps split the payment, something down the line?’

Marques could not believe it. They were both leading him around, as a crook for crooks, taken there, where he wasn’t even aware that there would be a courtyard, even the closest dorman snell-tack, made out of wooden brass in the most capricious manner. As the architecture did not match, there was a whole wideness in the court and the grand Plesque that waited for him. It was an aberration that resembled some old mansion that molded itself into part the architecture of the place, with an uncanny sight and half embranced in the coffin-spores that stood beneath and encompassed it as a whole. From it you could hear it, the bastardly touch. More than a few hundred of miles beneath it you could find him, waiting at last. Repositioned and carried, in search for a new home. From here the might Yyork fathomed his next move against one of his own’s advices, he did well. Strength and growth could be attained in time but this place was mightily perfect.

As it happened, for a few streets farther than this strange occurrence, Baster gathered a few pins. He met with Crane and lost his nerve on a whim.

‘I told you we should’ve, you know. Packed some more. I’m going to lose my fill, and I need it, I need it so much.’

He was broken, shaking, pale, cold, there on a sheet and a blank mattress. Crane was all the better but not my much. Dosage after dosage, they increased it too much. It was hard, it was shaking. And now of all the times where the bluntness managed to strike them down, they started feeling his friend there.

‘He’s dead, Baster, just let it go. Call is dead, Call is dead. Our friend is dead, he’s not coming back any longer. He cannot make it through. Don’t you get it now? We’re not going to bring him back, by no possible means. Once he’s gone, there’s no way for him to return.’

‘But I heard him, I think I have. Put your ear.’

He started mumbling again. The condition he was in was getting worse. Two days already, more than a few people saw us on the street. I thought they knew something. They must’ve figured out something by the time we did it.

‘I don’t think I can do this any longer. I think we should get another one of those heads and implant them in ourselves.’

‘Yes, yes, do it, that’s the only way.’

Part of it was mumbled again underneath his breath, but I knew what Baster wanted. He waddled from the sides and didn’t carry on with much. ‘I will cut you if I have to, mildly invisible ghastly trok.’

A mad appearance came forth, milling through the walls. It was an unappealing thing, to say the least, the beastly vigour pushing in.

‘Oh, sorry, I didn’t mean to scare you.’

For some time, both of them stood there. Both Baster and Crane looked at Call. He was there. Almost there, you could see through him and draw just enough to understand that there was nothing inside of him. As a matter of fact, he was lost to it. Look-alike as he might be, there was nothing drawing near, than the clouds of steam sonnets that sang inside of him. And that blasted head implant was still inside of him.

You could sense it, even from this distance. Oh, how bare he was, thinking of him at last. Was he truly there with them?

Both of the lads drew back as they started shaking.

‘Don’t come any near. I saw my friend die, you’re not him.’

The door immediately slammed itself with a bashing motion. What was this commotion I heard there?

The janitor asked himself whilst remaining in the same spot as he had been before. He would no more beat the bushes or calm himself. It felt as dangerous as it was before, without wandering about the place.

‘I was granted a life here, for a second more. Listen to me, you insignificant devils, I will cut your guts and eat them off.’

Of course the glass Call was made off wasn’t natural any longer. They saw it changed to a hue of solid flu. All the bacteria and the sinew started gathering around him until they formed an unnatural wall of Tardigrades that would never let go. Unnaturally spent, unable to defend it any longer, it was then that they stopped. With them being locked around the room, the holes that connected it to the others immediately got stuffed by the same Tardigrade mass of glass that was made out of him there. Before long, the entirety of the room got encompassed in it, leaving nothing to be taken by.

‘I see now, I see that it cannot be taken any other way. I have to claim your lives as much as I can. Do not bother yourselves thinking there’s a way out of this. If I will it, I could kill you both.’

‘But you were supposed to be our friend.

Our friend would.’

‘Wouldn’t, Baster, he wouldn’t try to kill us. Come on now, don’t encourage him.’

Despite his best attempt, he couldn’t warn his friend about it. A spike of the mind could shove inside him a bitter brick, the amount of force needed to cap a bat on top of his head at last.

‘Please do not make me do this.’

Crane said, he seemed to stare on him, as if he had a way to kill him in all the might. With all the prowess pushing through him at last. He was first to witness it as his friend immediately lowered himself underneath a blanket, as bum would when met by the scum of the road.

And then the room changed to him. We belonged to Call now, he thought at last. It was a labrious task he couldn’t think of now, but one of them realised what happened there.

‘You dumb, inconsiderate lutt, what have you done?’

‘I’m sorry, I’m sorry, I’m sorry but I couldn’t do it any longer. The pain, the lack of shots and you abandoning me was too much to take. I had to do it in the end, please excuse me for doing this, but I couldn’t take it any longer.’

He showed something at least, even though I didn’t want to believe him. But he’d done it without me realising it.

A few hours ago, we joined call and entered the wall. Baster implated one of the small skulls inside my head, then he took it upon himself to join me as we descended into the walls. Instead of trying to get away, we joined them as bickering hedge-poppers.

‘I can’t believe you’ve done this, damn you, damn you both.

This isn’t happening, it can’t be happening to me.’

Before he could look at his hands again, he realised what was happening and what went through him again. But it was late and he knew it well enough. He was made out of the immaterial touches, trapped into the walls, just as Call was when they left him there.

Where was the janitor and what were his intentions?

To his antics none of them could even point to. He was anchored to it, slowly fading as a pawn would.

Lost head

It didn't take long for one of the lost heads to come to the point where there was nowhere else to go. Prospects had been lost and sooner or later, it would have to accept that there was no other way home. Some might do, but this was the only way it could go through. A failed stated had forced those beneath it to rise. Living cremators made out of those who refused to burn. They walked with torches in hands and devices which allowed them to burn and burn they had. Their flames could not be extinguished. From the supreme conflagration that came after, there would be no other reaction but the swollen muscles and the phase of reminiscence of the good times when the world had been enslaved. And those lapdogs curls their tails underneath its flattened brooks underneath the paleness they discovered. Thinking back on it now, it had missed going through the wildest dreams men had.

It grew discontent with these new demogrators it had brought to life. In some they had been way too destructive to be allowed free reign.

‘Inias Allur Gor Adda.’

For each one of them scorching the ground, with their high-coated tail-retractors, in which they cradled their children as heat came into action, came the pain. None of them would see again. But then again, it wouldn't matter. As fire was their mighty domain. They were immune to burning and suffered no less than they should. This veil of theirs was totally misunderstood, especially since in a few generations, the children would be still-born. Out of the the cradle of fire, the waves pushed on. Rising up to the sky, as they made their own gaseous chemical imbalance which started being drawn out in space, little of it being recorded.

‘Bash Arrnor Undo Ull.’

They would come around, as the planet got scorched beyond the point it should. It was known by all, and wildly accepted that once it came to pass, none of them would be allowed the trance. With it they might switch their bodies and repeat the process once again. But the lost head wouldn't allow it by any means, not while it was aware what it did to them, as much as it could call on it. Sound still traveled into space and it only hope that the others heard its disgraceful call. Otherwise, to look, and to return, he could only mourn the liveless pieces of solidified lips which formed the ground. They had been mineralized beyond any reach. With that in mind, a crusing brute could only sink away. Deeper than he should convey and wait for any pain to matter.

Immedaitely they stopped and watched, just how that indestructible small lost head started singing at last. It produced only the lesser songs needed to calm them down. As it needed only a few moments to finally achieve the piece it wanted on top of that perched rotten, worm-eaten like herd it stood upon. It was joined by the moving plants that started relocating it as they mechanically moved from below their roots channels. Brought to it, stop and listened. It could only take a second to realise what was going on there. As a matter of fact, they joined him at last. But the signals had been misunderstood by them, who were uncanny sage-carriers, pushing through the midst of the worst incarnation they could hold. As they appeared, in their current state it looked like they only approached the end of their cycle. Soon they would die and their remains would spread in the fire, imbuing it with a stronger flame until this burnt place started drawint away. As their lower rings pushed all the mass atop their upper regions of the bodies they broke at the top and started releasing the gases.

It was a comical disturbance as their lack of extendors between their upper regions were inexistant, leaving everything up to their strange occipital noises and the features that emerged. From various spots, the back and the left side, they started trading them as if by friends. Borrwing from other species that which didn't belong to them, now I could see them coming to the age, as the various exits formed, large octave rope-thin flurries began pushing out, slowly decaying with the partial breathers and the strange twizzer-like bubble that stored all of their vulnerable internals in. Before finding out if this function had been natural to begin, they started doing something even more uncanny than what they did before. For starters, they began releasing everything at once. Never ending their wretched object that pushed on with them, as they produced more of them, growing their bubbles even faster than before.

Nightmarish fighters tried getting out as they had been eaten alive. From these fat-infant like blue-marked by one passing satellite they passed on their way here, finally the lost head understood. This wasn't the intended destination. Unless it could be tracked down, he would've stopped it now. As he felt disgusted by the outsides, as much as it was disgusted by its insides, they resembled too much to them. His precious cargo he used to feed on just like his brothers would. Instead of paying more attention to either one of their clicken-direction, they kept smiling with elongated teeth that were conically placed to cover for the fact that the slits had rendered everything inside as flat as they could end up being.

It was all wrong, stare at it in awe, only that way it might be understood. And underhanded, with the crystalline sensation at the bottom, that enclosed on reality, he'd know. There was something going on there. Once the expulsion was done, they would be filled with a crystalline block that would cover everything in place. Nothing living would remain working inside of them. After the amount of misery they brought onto the world, this was what they desreved. Suddenly the first one fell. He was completely ignored, but the cremators turned off the fire. Instead they started changing until they grew a few feet higher.

No longer were they scorched but they started being fleshy. Even the chemical composition of their tools changed. Instead of spreading fire, it was ever so clear what they started doing. They began placing everything back. That was no fire which devoured everything, but a storage unit that completely took way too many objects in the gaseous pockets that inhabited their home. Now it came at last, the worst image they could carry on with. As if they had been instructed by something else, they turned everything backwards and uneven, spreading the land and the stone-like formation homes in the wrong places and the wrong ways. It could simply not be forgiven, just what other mess this turned up being.

And these new intruders only now and only now had he realised what they were doing around the place. It was a high-pointed disgrace that made it realise, it couldn't go ahead for longer. As mesmerising as they were acting here, they were only calling more of them in. Soon they would turn everything in a mess, for the first one had the puerile capacity to start talking with the savage-tracheons that appeared on the ground. Madly reproaching, he had thought about it for a moment now. It wasn't important any longer, just to count the masses of his disgust, soon the songs would be heard and nothing else would come to pass.

In the planetary system of Ivar'sur, twenty sequences passed. Each of them could be calculated in order to get everything in place before the fall. It went too quickly for any choice to be made there. No more dreams came to the mind any longer, only the full emergence of objects that were placed there. Inside the lost head, where there had once been a cockpit-like space now there only stood the remaining avule of cochiks. It felt painful watching or nearing them there.

There was no exchange between them. Not yet.

'I am Gort. Hear me now as I set forth for my race.'

In spite of everything which had been shown so far, there was some pride in his tiny swollen eyes. As they encompassed his head, like a helmet, he began taking in all the vile air and pushing it out. He stepped out of the crowded area once the other people got rematerialised and started holding on his speech. It was important to draw everyone in from there for obvious reasons. Especially since so many of them appeared out of nowhere. It was not to be contested any longer, for the sole reason that be.

'Gort, do you recognise where we are now? Have you noticed what happened to us while we were gone?'

After a quick notice, it had all become way too clear to him. They had taken the appearance of everything after all, born from an uncanny method, resurrected even, only to be forced here. And yet something worse was yet to come. It happened in a manner of a few lacking swollen moon, trickling atop the lost buffoons. For each of them, for as many stones and plants used to make their peculiar compositions, the resin started growing on top of them until not a single standing Rothian remained the same.

It looked like they started burning yet there were no flames. Only the plants took the wild appearance, as the stones hadn't become molten but living, fluid and pushing through an uncanny amount of weird pesticide.

'That's the one who is at fault, look at it.'

How it stood there proudly knowing that everyone was soon to go. Whereas they couldn't even wait for another paradise to emerge, some feared they would be stuck here, nowhere near any escape. It was decided that they would not fight. It was a hard choice yet they cherished living more than that. For each passing moment could not be considered right.

The lost head had decided that no one was welcome any longer and with a crackling woe which came out of it, like a show of molecule induced elements, everything on the planet died. It was an instant, as soon as it could be. The songs of reality stopped and now no one could be heard as soon as they could push themselves past it.

No one was welcome here any longer, and soon the strangulation of dust was no longer forgiven. Instead what was about to come from them, as in the form of a frothing question, were the assembly boards.

Placed on top of each of the bodies, they began repurposing everything as they placed themselves in place. It would be kindly placed just like in the good old times where no one bothered it any longer, as the need to feed ended. Leaving it with the scope of drawing power, as this universe and the other and the one next to it had been filled with it. Each of them, as much as it could be misguided received a planet. And they would use that for their own vile purposes, whichever made them go ahead. It couldn't be forgiven any longer, but soon enough, it would make out the difference between its allies and the foes.

Wherever they went, so much so, they would be misguided in their approach, their fear guiding their actions in ways not even the lost head could imagine. Hence the contractions, the encoders supplying the living organisms into the decimal tubes, which lead them inside the pump-like crude motors that ought to power. Soon, only a strange tiresome way would guide them in. As it only realised that there was none else to guide itself on but them.

Who had taken in the quite turns, and found themselves in, as replicas of their own. From the portal, much expected, eight Dukes emerged and stood. But they were nigh-mindless as the esons spent travelling through the dimensional tunnels completely destroyed their minds. It was a shame, for what they seemed like quite intrigued the head, as much as it bothered itself with knowing. Throwing itself off the quadrans and the seething wonders of disease, it pleased itself with knowing that they could be somehow reused if it only pushed it in. No longer would it wait before replacing what they had inside with the most useless metal bacterias, converting what they had inside. They would be shrewed by the time they passed through one of the peculiar intervals of lomas.

Before, there, there they pointed. Despite being mindlessly going about their way, they seemed to convey only a single emotion that was impossible to convey. It looked and appeared out of place, pushing past them, even as they were formed for the sole reason they granted themselves for. In as much as a few spans, while the head pushed about, each of them had their heads and helmets removed, by their own hands as soon as it could be understood, there lay all the senseless that was needed. It couldn't be conceived yet. As these coniving truncheons pushed themselves through.

It was a false sense of wonder knowing, what was the point of showing up there? As these creatures didn't look like the Duke inside, instead they only looked sickened, like rabid animals who lost their fat, forced to starve or worse, live for the king, a head inside a diamond at the brink of a planet being defiled by technology. 'Get back to ye' repertoires; get back to ye repertoires I said.'

The second time was hard felt. At least around the crown of the world, he rummaged through one side, got to another, as a man destined to know. Handpicked from the audience, twenty spectators ran in circles, forced on the prime directive that what laid on the top of their heads would run off if they failed. It came near, oh so near for them to be shattered, there in the space.

'That's not how you're supposed to do it, you're ruining my stage. From the start, all over again, lights, the songs, please.'

It was grating, the nick of his fingers, going aplumb. It was necessary for them to respect his decision and see to it that they hadn't failed at all. A misstep and the entire stage would burst into a chaos of explosions, going into a starmode that would ruin everything.

He was partitioned to look ahead. With the minor headaches he couldn't concentrate on the appearing lieutenants of pain. Then again, it didn't matter. Lights faded out, they appeared now. In some way, they seemed worse than before, tall, they showed their shared scryne as their pushed out of it in a matter of short time. From it they spared no sacredness. Pushing forth some ydrad of theirs, high brow and open chested, from inside the spiked concave there came the edifice which was their heads. Protruding like a morbidly fat lance, made out of lumps, they revealed their severe cuts and the cast.

Spat out of their lungs, the cast of cat-heads had been revealed. This appeal could only take them far. 'Spare no more second wondering at it, and listen to our story as we tell you of what's going on there. In the distance, their kingdom rose.'

No longer would they forbade the use of such an alliance, the ydrad could only stoop so low. It was magnificent how they found knowledge, but they grew on. Just as they spake, they started recounting and recollecting of what happened there. Far away and in the past, when they had visited the kingdom of the last, they found the abomination that took over the land. A strange formation of moving pipes that moved on time after time, expanding threateningly fast and far. It was only decided there that there could be nothing waiting for them upon the return.

‘Something happened, for the last time we came upon it, we couldn’t find it any longer. Either that construction had been destroyed or something drew it forth and hid us from us.’

‘But how could that make any sense? Was it not too wide for us to be able to take it away? Could we not force ourselves to look for it now?’

‘Spray thee bee spider-ling and sprint an ankle on your way to there. It cannot be done, we cannot be brought down there to an agonious portal that shall take everything for us during the journey. There’s no retreat, feeling as it were, at the feet of the dread, where we shook inside our morbid beds, we feel nothing of the sort. It was insatiable.’

It couldn’t be that way. But they remembered it now. They both left the spot as soon as they realised that knowlegde would be lost on those fools. As putrid and sporadic as they were, there was no escape from the place they called home. Guttural noises still went on out there, it was something no one wanted to acknowledge yet. For a reason or another, stome stepped in the wrong direction and found themselves peering at the wrong angles, unable to question what went wrong.

But somehow, the draught of ages went off. It was impossible to contain any longer, just out of the mere force they needed to bathe in. No, it wasn’t going round in circles, they were depositing fat inside of it in order to provoke a stroke of band-wagons, which were carried forth. Out in the open each of the wagon was already nearing the point of overdue, they simply couldn’t deliver everything they’ve taken in time. For all the heads and all the bodies had been stolen and pushed on the side. It ought to have happened sooner or later, but there was too much work. Too many things they had to deal with and remove.

It was incontestable, the fat pig said.

‘You’re telling me that all of our bodies and limbs had been taken away now?’

‘That’s what’s I is been telling you sour. It’s been gonna fine before they came along.’

On a dreadful margin as well, he couldn’t think of it straight away, just by the mere presence which wasn’t acknowledged yet, they were daring to mess around. Brought to the missing pale, the strangling whale head which already spread itself as far as it could want the musk, why was it there in the first place? It was obvoious that it wasn’t a real head. A carbon copy more likely, in which some stranded harponeers, sailor-rapists hid. They were dangerous especially since they practially impaled themselves to the carbon brass, if they fell.

‘Don’t make a noise, I’m warning you, prisoner Sverve.’

‘I hear, but I cannot trust you anyway. Were you not one of the other inmated at the Nernavyn-Dor?’

‘Of course he was, we all been tiralred for piracy and loithering, don’t you remember that?’

They all did, they were pushing through the camel-strings, those that moved ahead were not so much animal-heads, but a wild assortment of unnatural trudence. It couldn’t be believed, studied, within the branches of plasters. Dragged over the anchor-mast pistulance could only push through their bottom-ears.

From each side the skin-targ turned to large sharp racks that carried smaller hedge-pallor suitless apes.

Most of them were only animated as they called on.

We knew what desperation was and this was something coming from our own. It was the head of the brittleness that pushed through.

Could this be it?

A single light shone one last time in the past.

Then it ended.

Nothing would ever come close to it.

After they gathered for as much as a second, they began lip-grossing over the oil-filled organs that grew on top of their mechanical parts.

‘Are we going back to it?’

Could we ever return?’

‘I think so.’

This was confusing, more so than usual.

‘Shall we return to it then? I feel as if we’re bound to eat some who crosses me.’

Bare and do as they might share, it’s not fair, they said. It isn’t fair any longer. For each passing moment you could see sharp scalpel-like piece of bone cut through them. Not only had it shone so far, but it showed signs of growth, in either the mind or the bone. Where could this place even lead them to? There was no desire to direct towards it or to even hear them shout or speak, to see how they would be loud.
And muffled by semi-looking clouds of dust, brought to the desirable fear and the shivers of hearing what came about them, suddenly they stopped.

‘Only fate will tell what might yet happen.’

Aleksey

It was pulsating now. Orange globes pushing through various other shades through the hue, better keep it tightly through. He had known something of the streets, unable to determine just what went wrong. With each turn he found himself scowling around the, he was still there. He couldn’t explain it now, but he was out in the woods one day and back on the streets on another.

He found himself looking at a scene, coming from the various woods he found himself going about. It was the tributaries, which no one ever wanted to approach.

It was hard to keep it in.

Do not make Aleksey mad now, he pondered on it. As a man would on dirty cattle. They were trying to force-feed him despite the signs. The start of a conversation, with Aleksey dreaming of the cold, he was back in the forest now, thinking of his wife again. It would pain him to ask them off. Just to think of it like that. If only there was a way to trade places and mess around, he'd take it. Without a doubt, he had considered it before.

He dances upon fallen scepters without wondering how did the rubbish get in. The trees haven't spoken with him, which left him with them.

'Spoken like the deluge, sir, spoken like the deluge. Do you want to take something from the poppy-snatcher? I am a watcher for the Ollroy team, back in New Orleans.

I paint the sports, I throw the ball and the anchor. Perhaps one day, I'll pitch one for the sky. Don't you think I deserve something for my trouble?'

He was a whole new brand of a man. A crook and a snail-merchant, oil cracking as his lisp. A fake accent and a deep face which wasn't his, he thought of questioning him about it. But for some reason he felt like it was too bizarre to come near.

'I brought you something, would you like to go ahead and try it on?

It's a baseball cap. I think it'd fit you well. Come on sport, give it a try?'

'Who are you and how did you come here?'

'I'm a scapesman, an artist, I make the egss pop, I am the man eating croissants, playing the ships. I'm a salesman and the CEO of the enterprise. Can't you see it now?'

'What?'

'Go ahead, I'm John by the way. I thought you knew it by now.'

Aleksey could not stare at anything but his white glossy teeth. They were pearls. And it drove him wild. Who was he?

'No, no, I'd like none of that trashy stuff, my good company. I only go for the brandy and the top shelf stuff. But don't take me for a porter. I think I like you, right? Is this any good?

Hey, hey, look, a ball, I'm curbing it. One day, I suppose if you don't mind, there'd be a Terracota-rifle waiting for you.'

‘For what now, I’m confused.’

‘We’re going to join the war, soldier, soldier.’

‘Aleksey, that’s my name, what do you want from me?’

He carried a few bags, abandoned a few feet away. From the looks of it, he had it up until now with me. Or I with him, he didn’t want to share it. But he got his way and got one of the bags out of question.

‘Twenty jars of mayonnaise. It’s what kept me alive up to getting here. Do you like what you see?’

He pulled one of the jars out. There was nothing of the sort in them. As a matter of fact, the jars housed a bunch of strangely high-horned moles. Eight heads, smaller one that grew like organic bubbles on their eyes and on the back of their necks. I could see the others being in the same condition as well. I wondered about the driving force in him. Just what tipped him often to break them off.

‘I present you the glass. It’s not actually glass but.’

John Sink, that’s what he’s called.

‘John Sink.’

A tag around his collar, just about the midst of the tie, whereas both interfered with one another, his head nodded. Confused, Aleksey made it rain, fast enough to reveal that there was no liquid coming from the sky. With each drop that followed the earth, the already existing pools desintegrated. As suspicious as this sounded, the unmaking rain already hid his previous victims. Was this another attempt at making a man?

Had he created the other?

Further tests had to be done.

‘Sink, John Sink, I’d like to know more about you.’

‘Just you wait until I’m done showing you everything, because let me tell you, if there’s something here, there’s something there, right about everywhere.’

A juggler as well as he took the few room-temperature mercury streams he got on him. He played about and wondered what went wrong. Though he wasn’t strong enough to fight the debt of stages, with each step the grass lit and changed in color.

‘But what’s this now? I think I’ve made some friends down there, if you don’t mind me yapping just say it. Say, since we’re already on the spot, mind throwing a yank at me?’

He gave him a primordial Yack, it came out of nowhere, double-pined as a vertebrate, much bulkier as stronger. From one of the missing heads there was one one completely domed carnivore-planly looking chest-burn. It pushed on a few feet away into both directions. Up to that point it looked like a horn.

Sounds came out of both sides.

‘You asked for me now.’

And that’s when the problem came. There were too many of them pushed in every possible direction. For no reason either that could be dictated from. As it would transpire, It would be left to him to find out this. So many of them appeared here and there, in whichever direction, as they were forced on It, better listen to him.

‘Sink, I think I did something wrong. I cannot seem to grab hold of them any loner.’

‘Oh, It’s fine sir, I’ll make you one stir and one of the chimey and.’

‘Follow, now, that way.’

Within the range of a very godly given few seconds he found the time given to take it off and get ahead of him. He rose a piece of the mild-dirt and pushed him in as to hide both of them from what was coming forth their way. It was a hard notice and a straw that popped out in the chaotic land. With the new inhabitants spreading, there was no question left, no answer given. They simply wanted to be there. Hidden away from the luckless wonder and the in which they spoke to each other in the speeches of the morse.

‘I need you to tell me for how long have you been alive? And do not lie to me about it, understood?’

‘Why should I? Seeing how much of a big bralwed burbly thing you are, I wouldn’t stand a chance. Unless we were given a fair ground and a fare-way, with that in mind, I’d take you. Here or there, just about anywhere.’

In actuality he had declined the offer, thinking of it still.

‘What happened to you then, why are you here, tell me and I will leave you be.’

‘Friend, fellow, isn’t it obvious now? We invaded your country now.

It's time for war.'

Aleksey felt repulsed as soon as he could come to terms to what was happening. He felt cold all of the sudden as soon as he pushed him away. Looking back, this came to blows, John nicked his chin and forced him on a whim to fight. Looking at the entire force which struck everything around the weather, the bombs had been released, and dropped on all over the place. Soldiers appeared in the distance, though they weren't fully made. Most of them were only, well, it was her. On both sides, it didn't bode well.

Since he killed so many of them, this was a nightmare that refused to go.

'Let go of me immediately, I need to get away from here, I can't stand it any longer. Please do not make me fight back, I don't wish to harm you.'

'Think you can take me on? Hah, why I played in the little baseball league as a child, top of a chimney class, a regular scout to the Sunday school. Need I say more?'

He was already started piling up as much of his old self as he could. After taking a few more blows, he stumbled and fell on his arse. John would quiet, he never knew when to do it. This annoyed Aleksey more than he could ever think of now.

'I want to get back to the place I was back then, with my wife, staring at the wood, waiting for the fire to make us warm.'

Back home where he waited for him with a dinner on the stove and some familiar face he could look back onto. He wanted her more than he ever wanted to admit it. She was divine, a stranger, a woman who has his and she was mine. If only he could ignore the cold.

'That's not snow, that's white ash. Do you know what you've done?'

For one moment, that's all it took for him to stop messing around, panting like a boxer in hear, when he came down to the same level as Aleksey and turned him around. It was a sight he truly wanted him to look at, something he wanted him to know.

'This is what you're doing to every single one of us out there. This is what will push our and spill outside, back into your forest, in my backyard and our homes.'

Poor Aleksey could barely see her in the distance. She didn't bear her pretty face but the bearings of an overly exposed skull. It carried on despite the knowing and all the missing sparse. It made him feel sick to the stomach instead of ever dreading creating everything again. He pulled out a liquor pouch, just as he always did. That's what the man was about and there was nothing left to him. As a coward would drown, into the mass of shouts he heard around him, he got back onto his feet. John only had to asked, will you do it? Will you save us from this enormous rolling destruction willing to happen? Because I don't think my wife would love it if it happened. He spoke with little thought and was heard even in his brain. Pain drove them from one another as it conveyed no other emotion instead.

'I shall do my best to save all you then.'

Another one of the distant decorum, they were trying to pins the poles down. With the bombs taking the appearance near-like troglodyte-seal, with their fatness and bulbous eyes, pushing from their backs tails that ended up bearing flying yellow panes that sharpened as their twisted around, it was hard to miss the explosions since they dropped in masses. Nor could he talk to the trees and sing the song of disillusion as he contended with his dream-like escape. There was nothing he could do that'd matter. Listen to it now, could you hear it yet? All those birds fell off in masses, some of them only regurgitated out loud. Groundless sparks, cracks-alike stood there drawing them on to eat, this was what the war brought. And the arrival of the others from the company put him on doubt.

'Solidier, stand straight, at default, jacket buttoned, I want twenty from you. Let me hear it, John.'

'Yes, sir, sir, yes, sir, I'm on my arms and feet sir.'

He'd gotten himself standing there, met by twenty other troops. They had a helirock, and a small cagbin they carried around with their bare arms. Most of them had their uniforms ready, helmets of, arms in hards and looked as if they were ready to push it out. At any moment one of them could accidentally pull out a grenade and make some unnecessary noise. If that were even the case, this would be not needed.

'I'm unarmed.'

'Don't talk, reddie, I'll have a word with you in one minute after I'm done with him right here.'

Strange how they all had bayonettes, and even stranger was the fact that instead of knives, they had attached to them large medieval swords. But they were no soldiers, not with those uniforms. They were dressed in weird colors of blue and white, stars being aligned in the wrong parts but something was missing. It was the age without fear, no war could draw near, at least not here and not now. What could he be concerned with.

'Test it then, I want to test and see if my bullet proof vest work.'

'Sure about that sunny? You don't look like you're wearing anything on you. I'd go as far to say that you're one shot off not wearing a shirt.'

'Please simply do it, I don't know if I could wear it any longer, it's getting heavier by the minute.'

‘If you say so, I suppose the reddie wants his funeral early this night. Let’s just allign and do what he says boys. Come now, come, straight ahead. Don’t aim for the head just yet, we’ll save that for last when we’ll be ready.’

It felt disgraceful and ill-defined. Just thinking about it made him feel as if he could lose his mind at any moment now. Just to try himself here and there, it was ready. One last chance, they gave him a single shot to stave off this madness and admit that he wasn’t wearing anything underneath it. But no, he was as stubborn as they came, a bull-mule. Understanding that he wasn’t actually going to get through it, he waited. And he wasted not a single moment longer. Before he froze still, making it sure he was on the pills of uncertainty, he took another shot out of the liquor shot.

‘Let him, I think he knows.’

The officer in comand Lieutenant- Admiral Grand General in charge Hektor said. He was sure this was going to be the last thing he got going for him before he would retire. I pity this man, he smiled. Just looking at the mess which lay around, his town had to have been raised down to the ground by the bombings. It was simply sad, thinking about it in the worst way. He wanted to pay his respects, the man probably lost his wife or kids. His very people were lost and he found himself taking blows from young Johnny there.

‘I wish I could tell you this sport. I don’t take you as a soldier or one who’d want to fight some more. I don’t usually do this but we could take you as a prisoner and make sure you cross the sea. Wouldn’t that sound much better?’

You don’t have to be stubborn and lose your head now. Trust me, I know what’s it like to lose your own people.’

‘Do it, I’m waiting for someone now, I think. He was supposed to be here and offer me a drink. Truth be told, this is stale water, in the pouch. All of it is, they can’t make the real thing, no matter how hard I tried.’

Plus there was still the growth of those strange creatures which joined the fight, completely distracted from their squabble. It was interesting to admit it here, but there wasn’t any other escape. Not without this way they shared. Between one and the other, he had lost a kin too many, still. It felt like they were disturbed by others, lost as long as they had chimed in.

‘Well if we cannot convince you otherwise, let it be so.’

They had pointed, stared, waited for a moment and there. They shot him in the chest, at least eighty slugs went off and bounced against his rib-cage before moving on. It was uncanny, just looking at it there. As every piece just went though him yet no hole remained. No blood, no puncture and no contact made. Even his shirt stood there untouched, left as if he couldn’t watch it himself.

‘What’s the matter? Feeling blue all of the sudden? Is there no red for you to collect?’

Of course it couldn't be that, they were confident a few minutes ago. But now they were in doubt. At once Johny came on his feet, took the half a mile and knocked Aleksey down with a single slag. It was hard to imagine all of their expressionless faces before it kicked in. As a matter of fact, it could only pop in either direction as they kept pushing in. What happened?

Littanies of deformed nutrition came into their chants. For the first and foremost chance came to light, it was a blight of knots that sprouted from his back. And who was he if not a stranger to our ways of eating buds of meat? Down at our feet they rested, chanting with us as they added words of their own.

'Cannibal-mills, do not eat us, we're not born of it and we desire to conserve ourselves.'

They sprang and began circling the wind in proud motions.

That's what was being heard in the distance. Other worthless mantles served as a reminder to the turn.

'I forgot the dawn of light and for that I'm punished to relive the war. Why is that this place will always feel of ill? Brought back to the deathless embers that burn, I shall be redeemed somehow, if only I could mourn them.'

He had taken everything in account and for once the trees spoke.

'Would you let them make a fool out of you Aleksey?'

No, of course he wouldn't stoop at low. It wasn't him they wanted, let alone would he allow this arrogance to continue in the same way. As soon as he gathered the strength he wasted no time and pushed John out of the way.

'I don't want to be here any longer and I don't want any of you to be allowed stay. You need to leave immediately before I take it on from you and throw you back to where your mud-huts started.'

Thence he was given a single chance. Not to spoil the war or anything even near it. He chose to bear this desperate word with them, carrying along only for his bastardedly needs.

'We could bring the world in if you desire. Have you not desired some sort of escape from that place?'

His desperation was primal, almost paternal. He wished to bode not a second more with them. Not to trust the word of sap, he counted his blessings, then he stopped arguing and accepted this turn of events.

'I wasn't aware my country was being invaded.'

'Poor Aleksey, you killed the council members. And everyone else, even what we brought to you in hopes that we might spare this madness however we could.'

His gut was wretched. Paying heed to his surroundings now, he set himself on and walked as far as he could from the spot. By the time he exhausted himself from it, they lost his trail. From below a heel, he saw it pop, the first air-bottle, rounded up and shot directly at his head. If he had stepped at least once more, his head would've landed there, out in the open field, where he would be pouting with the wild rabid dogs. He was only being chased for fun after all since neither of the men had any stake in this sick game.

With the world collapsing under his brow, he wildly thought about his way out. Yet again, the flame glinted from his lip, sniffing at it, this made him only question the matter of events that went on. First the friends died, then this happened, the intruders who had no other stake in it other than their own. They made him sick. As the fare for coming in must've been closed to nothing, even if they were real, which he doubted with his entire being. That John shook him still.

But not even he could take it off now. If there was one chance and a single creature he could point back at and look for an escape, that would be the larva-aspect, the servitor of the drunk, he who opened the door for him, offering him the only way out, or at least the only one that mattered. It was quaint, smelling the ashes. But that's how they got it. Some of the skin they shed had been completely burnt off from the mounds they formed. Those mounds ran deep, in the houses.

'Follow us Aleksey.'

One of the giant said. They would offer him the chance to return on the other side where his village was.

That's the only way he wanted to be in.

'Pull me, before everything falls apart.'

'Come in Aleksey, come in and don't look back as you're doing it. We won't abandon you now, not in your time of need.'

That would do for the time being. At least he could only hope that was the case. To be sure about it, he bit his lip, then his wrist and went back into it, starting the advancement. And all around their burrow-den house, they occupied every spot needed to keep this living machine going. Without intervention, there'd be nothing to spare. It was obvious even to him that this place he escaped from developed a habit of making him despair. For the masses only pushed through his grith. Even now when he could only look for the flit of the tinder, that's how he came to ask.

'How did you start the fire now?'

'Don't look behind you Aleksey.'

But he had. It was hard to control, this desire to see that the world was sealed off. Some of the carpet-flattened skin simply started rubbing against one another, creating wild jumping grits of fire. Never ending as the attire of dread pushed on ahead and before he knew it, a door opened from the mound. And he was thrown out of the house. Back to a day he hadn't even an account for. Though it wasn't night, the sky was shallow. Thunder stroke as if there would be no tomorrow. And with each of them, blue and white painted the snouts of air. Nothing would remain once the bombs started dropping again.

'Head back in you ill tempered man, can't you see what's going on around the place? They're about to drop the bombs again.'

And afterwards they'll start again.'

'What's happening here? How much have I gone missing? This isn't what I left behind.'

‘You sure you’re fine in the head?

Did you live in a dirt puddle?

Have you no sense? Because if you see that red star out there, that’s death.’

With a strangled cry, she went back at her work and started making for a run. The old babushka was set on trying to get rid of the barrels that sealed off the water exits. With the excess of water threatening to flood them in case they weren’t doing something to stop it. And stop it they would, at least with some hope that he would come and help her instead of standing there shaken as he would.

‘Are you going to help me now? Have you resigned already to it?’

‘Of course I haven’t, I want only thinking of my wife, I need to get to her yet.’

‘Your wife won’t make it unless these barrels get out of the way.’

‘No, it is you who doesn’t get it. She’s in the forest, the cold forest. And she’s waiting for me to come.’

‘Either way, please, don’t abandon us yet.

She can make but we won’t. They’re trying to get our village and advance forth. The forest should be completely avoided because they’re coming from the north and the south axis.’

‘Fine, this one favor and I’ll leave you alone. Would that be enough for you?’

‘Thank you, yes, thank you.’

There was sweat on her brow, but most of it came from the piles of clothes she had been wearing now. With all that came onto her, it was a miracle she could even move as quickly as she could. Luckily for her as well, she couldn’t see them yet, not as much as he had. But they were there, hiding in the houses, sometimes appearing. Before, before, what was that?

Could it be?

He hadn’t even stopped to consider what was happening here or how they were both about to mistreat them. But it wasn’t completely expected. They were throwing away wine barrels.

‘What’s gone through your mind? Can you even see what you’re throwing away?’

Water, the water of life, you’re throwing away my life. I cannot survive this without it.’

At once he stopped handling the fat can, choosing to make a small hole in one of them with his bare hands, for what he wanted pushed on. Taking more than a few shots now made Alkesey feel numb around the head, she couldn’t comprehend a thing he was saying any longer, not that it mattered in the least. One more word coming from her and she would have to meet his fist. Uncanny as it seemed, he was ready to riposte. Blow after blow to a wall and she yelled for him to get away from it. What are you doing? Old lady didn’t know Aleksey that well, perhaps she should’ve paid more attention to the days when he came back to the village.

‘You knuckle-baboon, stop doing it, I said stop, stop it already, or else you’ll.’

He grabbed her just as he was supposed to grab those barrels and threw her in the stream. And with a jolt, she would not return no longer as the water ran into a pit. As much as she hoped to leap in a whim, a haystack of coins fell, yet they all bore eyes and were made of skin. Each of them bore ill intent. They scratched him to no end and spoke as they fell aloft.

‘Let us be this way or we shall force you to dine on your god’s serpentine liver.’

What he drank? Could it be one of the worst things imaginable? Was he to be taken by the scruffs of his beard and show a sign of fear to them? Nay he’d think, not for a moment would he show any kind of satisfaction. He could not believe that they were recording his reaction. But he was shocked and went inside. From each coing popped a finger he had recognised the stamp of red on top off. It was hers, it was hers. He couldn’t pretend that he was well versed in the way she looked. But this was nothing but a compromise he had to deal with by himself. Getting away and waking up in slumber. How far have I been gone? He wondered.

But no longer would he question it or try getting away. No other emotion could he convey on his petty little face than the sourness he displayed at last.

‘We have come.’

Standing at the broken spot, the crack he made as he fell at land, on the pile of coins and fingers, the general of the distant, distant vest. His hat was bigger than the rest. Though he would underestimate him unlike anyone else, that much was sure. Despite looking that way he could not take it anymore. He had to fight now, but he sat down. Not in this condition, if he tried too hard, he could be caught about his throat and thrown in the next pile. Too much was at stake at this war.

And the thing that crossed inside the house was no human anymore. He had been the insect they claimed him to be, the bug and the burg. Torn between entering in or just shooting him between the forehead before moving on. Once he would question, thrice he’d know. But once that happened he could finally be content on moving on.

‘I’m going to give you this chance because I like you.’

The tone was familiar. Aleksey recognised him, but the man stared at him as for a stranger. The initials ‘NO’ were pinend down on his shirt, after the flag. After his hairtomb and whatever else he had on him. They made him feel unlike what he was before. It would no longer be easy to draw away, not after this.

He was thrown a small revolver and asked to pick it up. This wouldn’t last long, as it’s been said.

At least he offered him that with a few cigars that were thrown around. Did he even know we were talking the same language? Or that I understood him?

By the looks of it, he hadn’t. He pointed at the gun with the butt of his rifle. After throwing a few matches, he wasn’t even considering going ahead. Looming around like a honey bee made him understand everything now. It was about the right time for him to take his chances. About the same time he started loading, Aleksey noticed only one. Of course this bastard didn't like fair chances, otherwise he would've been gone by now. No retreat and on his feet. He could be away by the time he was done. And they wouldn't intervene, regardless of what he had in mind. He would be terminated like a silk-ugly torn contract. Lacking in awareness, he behaved. He wanted to look through some gaze at walk away from this. With each roll the revolver got closer and closer, the cigar lit, the smoke pushed on and before he could get a knee in, the man pushed the butt up. He didn't want him to move no longer, it wasn't as important for him to do it.

In a way, this had been his resignation. Aleksey was more than sure of it. Only one good shot, that's all he needed and the man would be done with it. Shot between the alabaster, his face should only be conveyed by a disaster before he could get over it.

And thus they came

Father away, set in flight, they would delight with nothing else, at least none as much as they could bother with. Enstranged from themselves, they rested under the flood of light coming from above the steps. Rod was unsure of what to say now. He's spent fewer and few days out of the deck below. It was getting harder, pushing on. For a few good reasons as well, they were heading towards the town. It would only get harder past the veils of the flesh-mirt appearing in the sky and from the looks of it only got heavier despite not being given the time to breathe and be alive.

'We came far enough, haven't we?'

'We certainly have and I suppose it's only going to get harder from this point on.'

They reflected on it for some time. Of course neither of them had any idea what waited for them on the floating city. For whatever reason the air trenches came back at again. You could hear their unnatural tones push on. To draw and to take more than they could even hope to carry on. Through wakings and the nights, they were frightened by what was going to happen. It was this end, the intervention, whatever it could be called that remained and now they listened to the wind.

'Up there, in some place there's another falling island where the knight heard out that they won't be able to hold a candle to the coming and the morose. They rose through the night and called our names before we could even hear them on.'

It was true, in whatever sense, they couldn't deal with quiet, they couldn't make much noise.

'Men take arm. I know it's hard but it won't be happening from this point on. I cannot even come to express it yet, but this distress rests on your shoulder.'

That he confessed more than anyone sane could even draw upon again. He knew that at the worst times they even accounted for the pain of the loss. Brought to them at last in times of war, pridefully they carried on.

‘One of my great admirals will hear of this yet, you hear? We shall bring a fleet and bring your hold down. Do you hear? Fool, damned cretin, I know your kingdom has no king. I know there’s no royal family we could grab within. Please yourself while this place’s lasting. Your time shall be over with before the cast shall even be thrown around, yet again wrapped.’

Aghast, they spat upon the minister and the petty postman, he who served the Emperor-king, on the other side of the broken flats-mounts, where nothing but agony could be brought. It came to them then that there was no hope again to keep this in place. They were trying their best but a confession had come from one of the young in stress.

‘Sir knight, sir knight.’

‘Young man, what a delightful sight I fence upon, sitting here in the light of one of the pumpkin-lamps. What is it that you wish out of me?’

‘My confession to you, as the lord of the engagement, the only one I could look upon in fear and in fright. I would be delighted if I could even get a hold of you for some time.’

He spared no word and for his sake alone wondered what might happen next. Out of his mild curiosity he wondered what broke the boy this way. He was clearly tired and went out of his way to make it so. While sparing not a second until he came up closer.

‘I need to be released from my vow, one I have made before my mother was born, the new on I mean. I see that there’s an omen, the evil eye, it’s coming out of the sea in an attempt to push through and get to us.’

It was the last song of seas that might well happen, even the distancing of the clouds. They couldn’t believe their own eyes as it pushed ahead with as little dampening as there could be. It was dangerous threading.

‘Boy, you must return to your home. No matter how hard this might be, I want you to know that there’s nothing I fear more, least of all, a young boy like yourself, if a single beating heart would be lost, I couldn’t even hope to make up for the loss.’

Impertinence wouldn’t even be held about, but the very least, for it I know that there’s still a chance for you to turn back home and forget what you heard now.’

‘But I cannot sir knight, for my own sake and for that of my family, what I saw, this omen had been given light and just as it gave me sight, I’ve foreseen the destruction of this town, with all the people and all of the ones we love. To the maidens and the men in robes, the ones in armor and I, they would spare no one from this happening while we’re still alive.’

He pondered at it. For no reason, for no less than he should be aware, he’d be weary or he’d like to confess of something worse coming out of its way. A typhoon of such a magnificence of elemental power that its likes could even be considered as being divine.

‘I wish I could tell you of something, child. But I’m afraid there’s nothing we could look at being mild.

What comes out of our way could do such harm that we would find ourselves, as you say.’

‘Dead, forlorn and abandoned before we even get the chance to fight on. I’m afraid that the flood of war is coming on its way. Though it may not drown us immediately, there’s still hope that we may flee and get out of its way.’

‘Foolish, child, leave and don’t return no longer. Can you not understand how pointless this fight is? You have nothing to hold on to. You’re childish and puerile you’re something of the past. Was your father a knight?’

Nay, he answered and let alone he cared. It was the last thing that entered his way and the only thing he could convey. It was the longing of salvation, the only thing which drove him forth. He held not the spirit of disparity, no alliegence to honor and he held no petty account of fate. For some reason he found himself here, standing, just a boy. Not akin but yet a Squire, in the might he had acquired.

‘I wish there was still something I could do.’

‘Leave this place then, get out and flee. Take your family with you if you can but don’t pester us with false thought and talk of destiny. You’re but a meaningless creature, soon to be lost. Flee if you’re afraid to swim, get lost!’

The knight repeated, but the boy, he was yet undefeated. He ventured forth and ran through the night. He knew much better than to put his mind where it didn’t belong. Now, up the hills and through the span of weeks, he found himself riding in hopes of getting as far as he could see.

‘What happened here?’

‘The seething of the moke, it started spreading on the river block. I suppose this ought to have happened a way or another. Certainly this ought be this way, but I’m certainly sure someone poisoned it when we were away.

Say, child, you wouldn’t be a strange from the distant kingdom of Luar?’

Despite playing coy, he had thought of this as none of the matter, an issue that wouldn’t be forbidden for the sole reason he found retreat. A way out could be taken as soon as he had come onto his feet and after that, he could glance no longer. Victory would only make his heart stronger, none the better, yet lost how?

He succeeded the sir knight in claim and thought. He resolved that he wouldn’t even approach it again and then he proposed as much.

‘Dear man, I see no reason to despair yet. I shall give you something to look after. Now of all amentioned time and all that might even draw nigh after. I’m giving you a chance to redeem yourself and leave me come between this poison drift. I could save what you admire most and give you and your people a chance to live if only you were to listen to me closely and do as I say.’

Hence the boy told them they should stop drinking for a few days, as he would follow the trail of steps. Regardless of how wide either of them were. And instead of crying, he could spare this time to accept a gift. He was given two blades, a knife and a petty bucklar, something he could carry one. It was too much, yet undenied after. As he could not do without; and trace he went, pushing away. Least of all could he convey, no matter what they time and bonding, no matter what they would say. He wouldn't do without it coming, nor would he get out of the way.

'I see you filthy lizard-bums, get out of it already, I don't need anyone of you here now.'

Remember what that villager said, that Matthias of the Crimson Bade. It seemed to him that, in order to speak less and treat himself as any young man ought to confess, that he was overwhelmed that way. Approach it further and care no longer. He ought to know better than to have himself push father, big in the trunks that spiked the land, those serpentine things only blated one another as they regrew their mouths. And the mere poisoning of the land was only a result of them coughing and choking on blood.

Gushing and pushing until they could do it no longer, nor would they attempt to.

'Stop, stop it, I shall have none of this below the river where the rocks turn blue and I can see the face the river makes when you posion its eyes with blasted puddles of blood from your knaves.'

And thence the distraction ended, now they paid him full attention. He could do it no less than he would be listened to. No logner could he play a wheel, no longer gambling, he reeled. As any boy would, he had to earn this prideful insight. Somehow he had to fight.

But it was dangerous, looking ahead. He saw it in the distance, the trail of smoke that rised above the ground and minced on the sky instead. For once he feared more so than his life. Though the lizards were much smaller than him in size they grew eighteen times larger, while spreading more than it could be allowed. Now, if all, if any, less, could he talk about something to impress.

One of the evil pockets had corrupted his sight. The colors changed, the river blackened, trees shraply gray and nothing but bleakness spread before he could put his fingers and convey it.

'But what is this I see now here? Could it be something I could even get to fear more than the jewels of the uncanny, which I shall fight for no more?

Are you the ones in need to get me? Am I to get tried and thrown into the ground and eaten before you as you dragons come to life?'

Peril only came to be felt, the boy couldn't even hope to get out of his way. As a matter of fact, he had not prepared himself for what this was. Whatever be. Sinking in below, the trees only carried on. They sang and danced, they never turned on him today. He couldn't convey much, yet they paid a single spare, a finger that would never grow or do as much as to be weary.

How could the boy fight back the blunt strikes and the things that he couldn't even prepare against when his fingers danced against the coming? Their sharp ears became spread and shot between the heads and way. Barely, as he could parlay, he coluded with his mind and leaped out of the way in time. His hands were strong, his mind did try, best of all he could do it only if he were to be seen that way in light.

‘I shall die in here.’

But he ought be afraid. For now, of all times, he came out out of the strange bushes right before pummeling them away. Only the boy could hear the man singing as he grabbed him by the scruffle of his neck, doing his best not to have him removed from the cipher of his reddened face.

‘All to all, get down I say, don’t look the way of wavy hair and stray your back into a standing line. I cannot fathom young men such as yourself fighting off for their lies. You’d better hold yourself as much as you can before I decide what’s to be done with you.’

And the knight was weird, riding that peculiar animal in the most colorful gaze. At the back ir bore many wings painted in the most vibrant colors he could find himself peering at. For now he loomed after, wandering at the sadness which followed the two slices that slayed the beasts.

Down with them and the solace of the dam he broke. There he placed his mark, in turn to question the boy.

‘What’s that on your mind now?’

He then went ahead to explain the ploy and what he had in mind to wager. For the danger was drawing from the south, from the north and just about everywhere about. With little hope that could be bottle. Lest be known the knowledge of the occult, he chose to take the boy as Squire, for whatever reason may be known.

It was painful to look at out of the way. Evil still lurched in that vile pocket, no matter how they tried conveying it, no matter of the release. They hadn’t known or even liked it, they couldn’t fight it, or watch the drawing of the other bandits that loomed around, attracted by an ever so familiar scum. They were repelled by everything that was even slightly normal. Hence they could not get out o’er way. Fare thine well in the distance where you could see the stars going.

Putrid in their bodies children were planted. Of course you could hear their dead cries, but don’t look for hope as they couldn’t be taken alive.

‘Shall we seach in this place?’

They asked, with the vibration coming after that.

It was ever so near that they cared about their way, they couldn’t pay enough attention to the falling clouds and what that meant for the land. Puffs of white sand could spread and swtich. They could somehow fathom themselves, if it meant better than how they twitched in place.

Around the killing-wheel

Twisting around the knot, he walked where he should not.

‘In the mansion, right through this tunnel, would the barrels filled with power go on to be stronger than anything else?’

‘Of course I was gentle enough to make sure there would be no trace no more.’

After all, this plan, the execution, snicking under the lord of this mansion’ bed was anything but a masterful task. He had comitted an act of such utter evil that he couldn’t even bother himself with reminiscing the details and going through them again.

‘Time’s against you, it could take off at any moment now.’

‘Wait, wait, just one moment now, I cannot be held responsible for it just yet.’

But they were on their way, with a bang and with a spade. They went thoroughly as the manor exploded, hours after that, on the road. It was the perfect assassination, sloppily made and now both of them stumbled going out of their way to find a second target, a man who was on the run. Apparently, his fellow only found this while rummaging around and seeing a way to push it on.

‘I think we should trace this to the man we needs’ to take the life out of and bash his little skull with it. I can already envision it, listen, I know what he looks like.’

He could draw it from memory as thoroughly as a child would.

Charles

‘I’m trying to listen but no one’s here to tell me what I should do.’

This was an onogo. Dfar, they say, the isostacy equilibrium was lost. Without it, the planet would only degenerate as far as it could be sold for.

‘We recevied a single word so far, and I think. Wait, let me confirm it before we end up doing something we might regret.’

The deceptor took a single moment to recheck everything. He was in place, with only a piece of his face expanding after the trim. His likens were something that would frighten one of the hands below. But they were doing their best not to make too much noise and draw attention onto them. Placed there, in the galaxy eruptor, a cypher of talking, their ever-lasting near death-like desire took them so far. Hereas came the cadet Ominocoronm, with whereas hearses never end. It was his turn. It came too soon. He lost his body, it got replaced soon. Way too soon, he hadn’t got the time to adjust to it. At least eight quarters of the mechanical proshethics had started fattening. Bloated metal was divine, he could feel it coursing through his veins like the other rivers born out of Rhine. It pushed out and in, drawing air, as if he was pregnant just about everywhere where fat would start pushing. In the chest and out of it, right about the muscle and the death which had become thee. And for that, he was king abortion, the one who survived.

‘King-abortion, whence had happened?’

‘In the past, somewhere I cannot point at.’

‘And what happened then?’

‘I saw the kings of steam, they pointed to the king of smoke. And in the sky they reminded me that there’s still hope that I might communicate with the white kings, the ones who gover o’er supreme.’

‘Supreme whom say you?’

‘The supreme desire for the one chosen living to survive, diving in the sea of infants before he could get his head bashed in line.’

He felt for him, as if from a king to another. Both of them felt strangely stopped. He was trapped into this room of metal, which resembled the other one where they conducted experiments. You could make the difference from inside, whereas the determining factor would be this. Flat and not, right and wrong around each corner. A man would discern this to be his room is he was nearsided, at least as soon as he would wake up.

Unless he lifted his gaze and pointed it towards the other bunker, he would then realise exactly what happened. Worse than that, he’d know the worst. He would come to the most damned realisation he could come onto then.

‘I see the flat top is twisted and deformed.’

‘I am affected by the mental distribution of disease, is my time up?’

It would seem that way, for what he could convey, there was no saying, no praying to his lords. He knows now, and he could see its reflection against one of the many mirrors at the bottom of the sheft. It would be so easy as to spatiate the plates, to draw near and release it before it drew to his head.

‘This isn’t a haircut.’

Subject A realised, he could only see it for a short time. They shoved a giant sword-shaped pillar filled with amny cartridges attached to him. Slowly they were extracting the radiation from the methemathical radicals that were happening in reality at an unexpected motion, as the fate pushed on. He could see it now, the patches of green, the feel of warmth, he was home with all the knights.’

‘You were telling us of them now. You’re there, surrounded by so many maidens, are you satisfied by them?’

Pleasure, pleasure, so much pleasure, yet no compassion was given for the drooling only had come to an end. No more simulations he would say.

‘It is time for a single wish.’

But he had run out of them and there wasn't any way he could possibly regain them now. For what was worth, the sword of truth was pulled by a giant, who stopped. This all happened in the ship below the earth, before it could be counted back onto.

The giant appeared out of the ether of nothingness. A force unlike any other faded. He could not say a thing. He knew this energy from a place and he was there, in the past on a string, trying to levitate. From up here, he could see the entire commune in its glory. Though the giant had once been shorter, now he appeared in its prime, holding him as he would be prevented from falling, a king and no longer a subject to be kept in line.

'I shall throw you here, there's something that I need of you.'

But it wasn't the giant who spoke but the others who locked him in that box. Despite being night, this instability behaved. Now he understood something and he could only come to feel the pain.

'What is my mission?'

Understanding what was going on, he couldn't help it but draw behind the tooth and cattle, like a prick who couldn't handle it. Given so many chances, he was pushed instead of being abandoned before the next replacement could take place. Land there, they would say, look through them and steal one of their trinkets. We need them for something good, the fate of our people depends on it yet.

A trinket from one of them taken before the destruction of the city, what else could be taken from here, if not the greatest act of mischievousness?' Allowed.'

One additional thing before he could finally be lowered down there and allowed to continue as he would in time, this would have to do. Under the Red Gods, the vision could blur, he could be taken by the scruffs of his neck and tormented before they would all be culled, yet grinded into dust.

'Yes, that's right. There's another thing we forgot to mention. Don't go near him.'

The man named Malt. For even in the past he knew it, there was nothing holding him back. Through all his power, might unruly. Most dangerous of all he were. Placed there for a second, he looked out of the body, as a nobody would. It would hurt so much. Apocalypse, a snatch, but he was only asked for this one fluke he needed getting from a man.

But what was that? Out of the strangeness of the suit he was in before, this was the strangest thing of all. He was anything but wearing the same apparel as that of a suit-man. Instead, he looked like one of the strange human beings they were storing in their ship. What a strange thing it was, pushing past them, walking as if he was part of this dream.

Charles was still missing.

'I'm in the bunker, how did this even happen?'

Of course he didn't believe this himself. This was a mistake he couldn't wait to get up from. It would be much more dangerous to admit it then, when they were staring. Likewise, he could try blending, out of the mundane watch. He leered and veered after them in a trance unlike the dance of lazars that came unto his head.

‘We’re still connected to you.’

He knew he couldn’t trust them, but he hadn’t a choice, no voice in it.

Earl

Here he shall come around. It would be the last thing he’d know before turning back on us.

‘Sing him a grandiose praise; let us hear a ballad in his name.’

To the uniform sprints, they listened but they couldn’t hear, other than the parting and the peril.

Emission

Escape wasn’t an option for the muse in her gown. She was kept still from watching and couldn’t care what was going about. It was a nice view she was looking from atop her apartment. It looked bizarre, to the way she smoke the chimney when the catacombs sang on. That should be ignored. It was a nice view of the outdoors. It was dementia after all, which turned the view into a pictoresquely quiet place. She wasn’t in a mental hospite, but she was cow, up to her brow. He know I’ll act that way, if I kept beating on the roof.

Liz lived on the streets. Her neighbors were rats and an old man she had not approached because he was tormented by her wits. They shared the pride of twenty coins, ten in a line, halvened for what was fair but he always ended up with only five of them. Great, though it may be, she stood there, waiting for a repise, someone who might give her some peace.

‘Not here, not enough, do you hear, do you hear?’

From under the world, a thunder might push us towards home.’

‘What’s happening Old Djin, have you finally lost what little mind you had?’

‘No, no, I see the future through the hoops. I got my answers and I shall die before they send me to the pits.’

He opened an envelope, revealing all the blood which fell on his lap. Others came from it and before she could see it, they revealed themselves to be as sharp as razors. He hadn’t stood a chance, the speed, she, herself barely got out of the way. It was painful, but she ran away.

‘Push all mighty and let it be heard. That now comes to journey to the unknown.’

Rang across the Isles, they were announcing the spoil. For whomever could hear of it now, let it be known that there was no other thing they could aim after, no greater reward than what they were after, other than the liver-kettle they loomed after. It was only the most precious thing of all, the dreadful and the lovers all whoever looked after and whatever they could do would only lead them on. To it, unruly, they could sink no matter. But ever after, they could only look for it forever after and miss the chance. Disastrously in trace, she knew what to look for.

But it wasn't no to be for every living being that ever staggered in the world. For some of them pain could be divine. It wouldn't matter, for the chime of ages only knocked itself in and out, paying the credance and making it known. Now they would be forlorn. As a second rate pagan, the mind bathed for so. In outer space, they would show. Only the slightest remembrance of a day past old age never to have been thrown away, as it was clear. Only he would remain, the body of Agamemnon growin, him pushing, ever showing no compassion as he threatened to end existence in his lap.

He alone could destroy everything before he could approach the life. Some spend it fashioning an uncanny look, others couldn't even be shaken by the boots as he pulled in, throwing away, not even the slightest emotion could convey the agony they showed while he was coming. Approaching at a faster rate than ever they started spanning o'er their ships, into retreat, they couldn't even hope to escape whatever happened past the peer.

'Quiet in the court of bodies, we should hear what they have to say.'

But there was no Duke there for their coming, when they had been awakened, as they cared. Shapeless wonders came to talk, now they only tried to wrapt their own, hide away. No saying could ever do for the land they pushed inside and what they saved. This chance had paid its toll. Most of the dirt had bones planted, as they wouldn't even know what was happening, lest it be told.

A minstrel played as they would receding to their kin.

An their remains would be sung, uncannily in tides. Soon they would shatter, known for the least. But destruction was felt, even by the mindless beasts.

'Please help me, my friend just died.'

Liz hadn't but a chance, she couldn't explain for the sake of her own trance, what had happened and how might she even hope? There was a rope hanging on the street. Suddenly she turned away from the first man who hadn't had the opportunity to hear her out.

'Wait, madame, are you in need of help?

Don't flee away, I won't hurt you.'

She went as a flower would, against a wind of kindness. Blossoming sadness pushed beyond her trails, but she hanged herself in the open and no one knew of her remains. First came the investigators and they didn't know what to make of it.

'It was a suicide, wasn't it?'

'I see the rope but it's not coming out of anywhere. It's just there, floating in the air.'

'Then we agree on the matter, I still think it's a suicide.'

Perhaps they should remark it less. But for the time being, neither of them could impress each other, one another, brother, he should lie.

‘Where’s the sister?’

‘You know this woman?’

Another of them, you could tell by the smell. He held a bowler hat and closed his eyes in respect. The traffic was being blocked, rocked around, but no one coming. Oh, that’s why, that’s what they were yelling at. Of course they wouldn’t even be stalling now, before you heard the horns.

‘I think, we should drag her away.’

They tried, relentlessly so, but they failed miserably so before they could even point her in the right direction. As a matter of fact, it went over their brows and head. The noose wouldn’t fall off, it seemed like it would only be the worst case they stumbled on.

Lo the sound they made.

A peculiar view in the distance, you could see it but never come to feel it before being taken over. By a stroke of luck, forgive me if I hadn’t noticed that yet, I found it. But we couldn’t even say it. Not yet, no word, no matter, not after, not now for some reason.

‘Was all the damage worth it after all?’

‘I don’t know. The window’s shaking, isn’t it?’

‘And, give me a good reason I should care about it.’

He plugged his ears again, this wasn’t good. He would be forced into quiet as they were slowly pushed through. He couldn’t hear for too long to even develop a liking. Before long, it began. The celestial dance of power, it pushed through his retina until he had become completely deaf. None the taking and no more, the possibility had never been heard before.

‘I wish we could attend the event again.’

‘We would only end up hearing the same songs of our youth, only to be wated on the old. I see no reason to ask you this. Will you accompany me during a night?’

Fractions

‘I shall be the one to unveil it, underneath their eyes.’

As to their own, to each and every upfront bargain, they couldn’t help it but enstrange the wild shakes of leverage and each of them stopped trading after the pace changed. An eye remained stuck on Dalan’s Corpus Entili. He had struck a never to the man and now he traded yet up front, his pace increased.

‘If you don’t mind this, I had to search it for myself, for my own. It wasn’t so but I think I.’

Considering they both stood the chance of losing their hands over shaking for too long, he pulled. Atop of the the mortar plumed, it was unnecessary to think of the satisfaction he could get from it, at every turn before he could be turned on the bed and the many waiting for him to be done. Check the line, Dalan said, in his mind he had already traced all of them off. He could only count on it for this once. But he'd done it before, cutting his own finger, replacing it with one of the lot. Of course he couldn't make it up any longer, for the sole reason he had not. He had not prepared for it.

'Twenty more, please, I need them for my family.'

Part of it was twisted in the event of the box he had to insert them in. Twenty insertions meant that a cube would be released in which they folded. After the short incubation period of eight hours, a miniature quarter of a pin-strap, that should be his wife's brain, or in part. It would be folded in amber and kept. His daughter could inherit a piece of her mind, unless she was dead. And with that she would also give birth to herself when the time came, which only brought a chance for disaster, as the sole happening of incest was the strongest there, yet they went. It looked even under the direction of.

'Missed the dead, you missed him.'

'Where was he?'

A pointer to the south made him look for no direction. Southerners disliked him for the sole reason he pinned himself to the ground, delivery would soon be brought, to some action and the vile. His skin glittered like the metal encasing on top of a reptile, only because they were the marks of a serious condition he hid under the strange-suit. Poured in it, there were the heads he carried atop of a long body that walked with the mechanical-arms of a protruding claw-grabber. Taking in the distance barrels, he had no means to be here, in the trade area where they had chosen to do hide in the apparel of gin.

'He won't see us while we're covered in this.'

'Isn't that a bad thing?'

Merkill took a second look, he knew it better than to ask more than a question for someone who didn't know the half-o-sense. Of course, he couldn't cross it yet, for the same reason he forgot it the rule. Don't listen, don't talk, make sure they won't get you in their visor. And after that they couldn't cross their path. Four of them came, carrying a lodge-full of coffers, in as much as their stop ended up releasing more than enough. For now it only came to be that they were only pushing through each other, stopped before the cry:

'Avert your eyes, don't let them blind you with the filth they're carrying on top of them.'

And the barrel protrusion which were shaped like boxed on top, rounded while they hooked themselves to the claws and four legs, revealed only the top of petals from which the wild growth of heads came. All of them were in control of this machine and they were done carrying for the man. He was in charge no longer and they had so much experience to attain.

For the time being we were all being looked upon and pushed around as we couldn't even tell what was to be done. Last of all, I broke the rule, I couldn't think of less, the many. Atrocious glances, the trance of pain only came soon after. 'Lethrot arn, another barn was taken down during the night.'

'How many would that make?'

'Eighteen, at least, we're on a small amount, we're not even full to overburden.'

It seemed like they resigned to it already. No one said a word so far, as they only kept the quiet for their own need, before it could even carry with the first. The first always got a say in. Even during this circumstance, they appeared to be overly exposed, prone to self harm.

For the time being we were trying to get far with it. Entry seven:

'In the court, enter the talker, dancer of fates.'

It never ends.

It was a nightmare which would start again in the morning before it could be pinned down. Seamless reasons could only leap about, a near indication, the least of all temptations were his. A pin in the head, he appeared to be tortured as his head was carved to resemble something he forgot.

'The children, that's whom you ought to have searched for, what do you think happened to them?'

'I don't know where they are.'

He woke up before he could be pressed on.

'If I simply took my life, I could be there. I could live with them, be among them and never be sad again.'

That's what he was left with, the last chance.

Everything was played right in that regard and no one could even mask it. I saw him down the stairs, heading somewhere. I couldn't know it just yet, but I somehow fluked something. Out of my head, out there, I knew it. Regardless of our personal differences, I knew that Hern would listen to me. He would understand.

Since taking his out of compassion job, he now felt like he was out of it. Entirely, no more commissions from the upper-officers before he could grab a hold of them. And no longer would he pay to look around. It sounded like the glass made some peculiar sound which bounced around, no battering. No matter, they would know what was happening before long. No matter. I keep thinking that. One particular night, I drew near him and asked.

'Will you please allow me to show you something?'

'I don't have the time.'

With a grungy accent, he left. He detested life without being touched by the nap of his hair, they wanted to get him after all. He couldn't be sure of anyone anymore, because anyone could take him out, especially in this state.

'I know you're supposed to be in hiding.'

But with no trouble and least of all a sound, he came to his senses and called on the sounds. Of the tunes of the betterment of the others, stop, he thought and came back to barter with the man who was playing flukes. He was a liar. I knew it, they were feeding him false information about something that didn't and wouldn't happen for as long as he cared for it. False, in awe, he wanted to push through and wait for a decision. No one could reach it before being hit in the head. This way of existence dissatisfied him. It was not likely that he'd like it even if he were to spend as much time there. So much pain and joy combed together in a crest. Floating there among the billion carved people who could no rest, brain-morose and much moronic, they served. And served until they could do naught more; petty clothes surrounding them like giant space-jellies that held them in the marches.

Greatest of all desires as it's been, he's feared in the past what's he's seen. There, he pointed at the cherub-like columns, all of which were much bereaved. Most of those sculpted angels couldn't help it anymore. Luck played no part in it, they didn't want it anymore. Of woe to them, as they were put there only for them to go about as if the wheel had painted their chilful attires, they bestowed upon the one bellowing piece of fitful ardour growing out of bodily-resin.

So many features could be catalogued. Happiness, it was divine. We were chasing around them as we were blind. Young children who didn't belong there but we found ourselves threating in the place without bearing away.

It felt like a normal summer, when a sun shone, but we felt like we were home. Such a display of force was mirificent. IT could not be surpassed by anything. He who appeared out of nowhere, born out of the fateful spirit of a fighter blew everyone apart in a strange circle that he appeared in. He couldn't fathom anything but the strange position he was in.

With as much power as he could muster he started pushing through his palms, bleeding as his fingernails dug in too deep and hard. No only had a promise withheld his strangeness, but he could not be even more determined than he had been before. Prior to the madness, he came to his senses. Rummaging through his cackle, it was a distarterous drawing on his body that revealed all the strange embeded figures, all of which danced and moved past the spires that shook his suit.

He bled rivers out of his palms. With a grip of his teeth, his lips bled as much as he could do it now. For the grounds he felt it. Pushing and reaving through him, it could not be felt any longer for whatever reason he felt much stronger here than anywhere he had been before.

Then he ran. Twenty feet in front of him until he found the first man, grabbing him by the back, he crested his fists and started punching through him, realising that their internals were being stolen from him, whilst being lead to the greatness above his head, a forming black-hole like organic pocket in which they were being stored. He kept battering through them as he finally got it, the strongest feeling, that of joy. Supreme in pain and even faster than he would remain, now he came to his senses, stalking.

Children laughing, you could hear their sound in silent satchels. It was only so present there.

Missing words

Ivanoe did not know what to do. His friend was out of it, as much as he could show himself through. Praying in a different tongue only gave this renouncing sound of pissy-poor quiet the others gave him. As much as they had been entertained by the strangeness they displayed, the two of them were meant to be together. By no means could their companionship end up this way. Alas, he counted a few seconds and inquired of them whether or not he should be revived among the other survivors.

‘Nay, let him die that way, we already established that he’s the only one who can be brought alive for some reason.’

‘It was worth a try wasn’t it? Perhaps it was too good to even hope I might’ve stood a chance to revive humanity, isn’t that so?’

‘Of course it would, but we know better than to put our faith into it, you know? It ought to be done in any case, this final path, this destination he’s taking whilst never getting up.

I couldn’t take it in any case. Living that is after going down several times. I think it would be much better if we paid our respects and moved on.’

He painted a quaint scenery in the back. There was a long way to go now, especially since they modified the elevators to go up the cables and be taken down. Some of these caves worked just fine by allowed them to swarm the place and go as far as they would be allowed. Most of the cables were pre-war, since the dawn of it, there would be nothing down the stray of rocks and any longer, other than the spray of ankles, of which naught could be said. You could see them amongst the rocks down there and you’d know that you lost your way. Peril to the hand, switching around, no emotion could count on it. Well enough, they decided.

‘I’ll carry him on my back if I have to. I don’t care how heavy he is.’

‘You realise there’s something clouding your judgement, right?’

‘I’m only trying to look out for a friend, that’s all. Now, if you don’t mind, we some place to attend to, haven’t we?’

Why not move around for a while then? It only got more crowded from this point on. It was full and that accounted for the fact that the elevator was highly modified so it would carry people over its maximum possible capability. Much to his surprise, they didn’t. It wasn’t great being stuck in there with them.

Ivanoe found out something he didn’t as much as enjoy considering, that being that he held a general dislike to them. At least there was some familiarity to the dead man, even when he wasn’t breathing. He would take him any day over them.

That as much is seemed, he came to look back to, and one more thing, for what was worth. He considered pushing through his chest while they looked away, only to see whether or not it could worked again if he tried to. It was a mental deficit he found himself lack into. Him, as much as his friend over there.

Other residence

A few people lived in the opposite lane, staring at the Residence as it would accost the storm from spreading even further to the flames. Some would even go as far, the cripple of the mind and the broken minds wallowing in pain, abstracted behind the walls. Their ever-after snores could only be heard as shallow echoes pushed deeper into the earth. By then there was no wonder whether or not they could mourn their children, those that came around and entered by their own accord. Deepening as they would see the floor no more, but what is this? They would wander as the staircase that waited for them as soon as they entered in the other residence. With the absence of pain, the one that would remain was he, he poter.

Though, if he were to be met of fair ground, he would be disemboweled just at that. For no pain would serve him rightly, the might that would strife his veins and push them sightly. He was made out of eighteen parts, all of them floated around. None of them were to be pinned, if you had seen him they you had sinned. So thought remain, that Alice saw him as soon as she entered and went downstairs.

‘Who are you?’

First she had inquired, though she couldn’t hear the choire she carried with her. Then there was no other firend, no one to enter with her, but he appeared again. He stood next to her with decrepit clothes, brought to life from pesky robes. Fair, though in the distance, like a yarn ball, the place where he had been pulled out from, a hole just like a slug distanced itself, as if to hide from sight. Alice might not have handled such a sight. It wasn’t right, it was no delight to even try explaining what was going on with her today. But he who followed her could not convey not even this, distress pushed in, his eyes had winced. Behind there rested a curtain of glasses, all of which pointed to the blood-like molases that started rubbing on his chin.

‘I shall but you won’t catch me.’

For a second more she waited him to come. Again he was given birth from the round yarn ball and pushed in before returning. A willow and the march, the deathless inbred came at last, every time he would be brough, a piece of him did not belong. It would appear as uncanny, but disembowled, as the sunny filth he had conveyed, the man appeared yet again.

This time around his neck floated, a piece of his skull dislodged in a flying arm. He pulled from her, before she could even have the time to react and took a slice.

‘My shirt, my chest, my heart, give them back.’

But it was late. Alice had already been stung by the long rapier he carried with him on the way. Her was beating as he could see.’

‘If the floor came back, you would forever be with me.’

At this promise, she shuddered. Thinking of a life spent here in the dark, of what awaited her as soon as she climbed back. But after turning her eyes became accustomed, the way up reversed, there was no possible telling what had lain ahead of her.

‘I’m to be trapped in here for now on? Is there no escape, could this be the final gate?’

She pointed then at what she’s seen, though it was only but a glimmer in the distance, it rested beyond her imaginable reach. But those blunt fiends, long-past dead, eight in number came to their senses. It would only come to them that there were no embraces to be given, none the matter. No longer could she be accustomed to their sonnet. Sing to me, the porter thought, bear the songs in name at last. With a crude awakening, he made them bade no word and not convey. Not even the slightest hymn, not to bother through the whim. He took from them, again, it seemed, only the slightest part she would not miss. As she remembered, they were only divine, their looks not vile, she couldn’t handle seeing them how they were now.

‘But what have you done this for? What’s the reason for it and how may I get from it before.’

Before what? She considered the consequences of going down there. Whatever agonies awaited towards which she was headed. It would be shallow to stop now, there was no way back and when she’s done it. Pointless, that’s what it was. As soon as she even showed a sign, the two of them behind her back, the other five, the only one who couldn’t care for less had pushed on. And she was forced to go and never look. Below, down the stairs, the sight shook. Even for the best of hearts, which she had none, she couldn’t carry herself out.

‘What have you done to yourself? What’s the meaning of this?’

Alice asked the porter. It only looked like he had come to be rebuilt from pieces, all of which belonged to them. Though he was wallowing as he was strangled, he could not even fathom it no more. Dread filled his mind today, there was little he could say during the beatings his new heart conveyed. As for that, he only looked for the satisfaction, the admiration they showed him as the applause came in.

‘Admire me, that’s what I desire, I knew my time would finally come. You have no feasible idea for how long I waited for this to happen so I could finally move on.

For far too long have I been.’

Stopped in track, the various arms he grew got anchored. Pain pushed from all direction as the Residence took what it had. He couldn't handle pain, not the contrast he had given it.

'I see, there's some way here.'

Alice said, and as soon as the hooked mass started being straightened and bowed, she leaped on his head, heading for the heart. He bit around her head, the throat was there, marks were being lead around her, but it wasn't like that she would die after. Not with everyone trying to get in. The porter was repelled; their march couldn't even push in thoroughly, away.

'Get away from me, you miscreants, get away from me before you take us all down.'

His teeth got pulled, the gums were breaking, and all those filthy bodies were soon for the taking. As they started rising themselves up, it was more than obvious what was happening to them as they rooted themselves to the ground. No escape could there be, no chance for them to push through the suffering.

'It's there, my heart, I shall recover it before your filth encompasses me.'

But she was blind to see the other one. As another porter opened the gate and stepped in slowly, as if he was walking on an invisible staircase, pushed on top of her. By the time he had come one step above her, Alice came with her heart. There would be nothing even close after that. It was a ruse, a cancer, no way praying. Not even the slightest hints of pain would show some use of what she was conveying. But her mind was like an urchin, as much as it would spare.

'I cannot break through.'

Her cackle after left only the sight of rain. Alabaster colors followed and you could hear the Porter running. Leaping from step to step, looking down as he knew that they couldn't press past the barrier. It was soon felt, as soon as the desperation got attained, the pain would not be conveyed. A mass of falling debris afterwards lain but they passed. As if the entire barrier, and the gates were not even there, alas, the rocks fell through him and landed on them.

Before she could grab on it, the stairs got destroyed again, they fell with the first porter, she grabbed her heart, unable to push after.

'I see that we had done you harm. We're pained to see that there's no reason to drag this prison on.'

With which they darted as disease, at the bottom of the Residence where the floor was just as it seemed. There stood the Porter at the bottom, in the humanoid form he cherished. Against him she stood tied, as if her organs missing, pieced together to him at last. A symbiosis that wouldn't last, as soon as he drew away, Alice stood as if in laughter, trying to convey something that ought not to be made. In her mind, she won a few seconds as it started growing out of her gut. Pushing away, the yarn had sluggishly started growing in them as she was watched.

Most of the place was a mess, a show of destruction that could not be portrayed. But she was held and patted, watched in false-laughter as she weeped from the pain. It was morose, the way she felt. Alice would not get away. No run, not to flee, it was hopeless, this place, this was not meant to be.

‘Release me from my suffering, I beg of you, put an end on my life here, on the platform, where I might have some peace before I go.’

But the yarn could only jerk as the crisp-like outside of her skin sealed the deal. Now they came together as one, a perfection union she had not asked about. Much too cruel, as they had seemed to be heard, all of the dead-men, friends in life laughed at her.

‘Pea of the bottom chords, they look at you in despair.’

The Uppard-Porter said.

And below him the Donnard-Porter answered.

‘Yes, she’s prime for the taking, she wouldn’t have seen us if the case was. It is her, I say, who is at fault, this cannot be watched for far too long. I see, I see, I hear the bars of steel coming. A wretched promise in the coming, what shall we do with her friends?’

‘We cannot use them, can we?’

Instead of admiration which would’ve most likely be feigned, neither of them hid the disgust for the ones that remained there.

‘Bring down the sails, there’s a ship coming in the port, we cannot hear it any longer now mates, not until they come up the organic tract.’

Pushed out of the way, the leviathan had arrived. Through it, they opened and had sailed. Inside the spirals, the tunnels and the strange Alabaster who was singing they pushed themselves out of the way.

‘Here’ lo’ and behold, we came forth to bring you home.’

Alice wondered but couldn’t follow. What was the matter after this, and after?

It went well, they couldn’t yell, but it in their innards, children shouted. From her friends, their chests darted out, leaving the frame empty as the head and the limbs had nothing to hold onto. All of them fell, the trunks started crawling away as tiny long rattish tails emerged from the holes and the cavities. They used their newly acquired legs to draw onto the leviathan and plant themselves in it before it went away.

But the Doonard-Porter, much protested. He laid in fear as he detested this laughter, the going after and the quiet.

‘I’ll have a piece of quiet for now.’

None was left about, at least not for long, not to marry the strangers before being brought in. As yarn it be, the yarn would come and flee with the arrival, not to shimmer and push after. No countenance would do, to be pleased with the peculiar woe they carried with them. In a fly, they did, as they appeared, in one of those that drew near as to showe themselves here.

From the various debris that fell, fly eggs appeared and most of them hatched as the pupae crept in again.

The hall of Malakerth

‘Order, I shall have order in my hall.’

It wasn’t like any other meaningful entrance, no word spread, nothing but the dead-cowls looked down as their master appeared to beat below the grand remains. Some of them only cared about what was going past the grand entrance, lost to space, turned towards a growing face.

‘May I intrude, if it be possible?’

‘Quelch thine face and beware of my nerve endings. Leave now, filthy disgrace that you are, know that you don’t belong in here, no matter what your servants dare to say, as you may lay in awe.

I think there’s nothing you should look after in my halls. As they are mine, your body ours, we shall not give up on it, regardless of the hours.’

And thence, Malakerth said no thing. His sharp tongue only continued after the sharp break. While the vile floating bodies in the thrones comitted themselves to the distance frequencies that might soon be know, he wasted not a second more to bring back a retort. He wanted something, he wanted to know. He had become weary of everything, less in mind, more in thought.

‘At least we should be given the chase to refuse.’

Wallowed one of his sons in pain, as they could not even focus on the veil of effort he put in, as it was only needed to understand the, all in all.

‘Listen to me now, my sons. We shall continue spreading the signals, doing nothing but altering them of the coming of an end. Send no shivers down each other’s spines, I shall listen to the sings and moons and we shall be full to no crater.’

‘What should I do then father?’

One of his many sons drew in. Only now had he come to understand from where his.

‘Give yourself to me and I shall make it worth it.’

The plan was done. During its initial conception he had considered spreading his sons through as many sectors he could push him on. And it had only been a matter of time until this would do, never for too long would he count it. Not to spare a single heart, he darted it. Lest it could be contested here, he only planned on getting near his target and taking of his head. Once and for all, he could finally become supreme, no wonder of unruly, he would come on top of the supreme creation. His own nation cried beneath the halls.

‘I hear you all and I shall free you once it’s safe.’

Their cries continued but the army did not move. Longer than the eons spent here, they were stored for a reason he could only bring the folley to.

Malt spent countless hours strolling inside the rims of the memory. It was a wide space which spanned on and on for the duration of countless minutes torn by the roofs yonder. Nearer to his eye-blinds, he couldn’t pay enough to be alive for the seconds spent, staring at the roof from one web corner to another. He was somewhat restless over the fact that he had lost enough nights at that. Inconceivably forlorn, he was set aside, and basked in scorn. Agamemnon crept in and asked. ‘Why are you hiding now? You showed no interest in hearing how we got here; may I ask for what reason are you even here?’ ‘I’m here because I thought I could find a way out, but I haven’t. Wait, what’s wrong with those pieces of your mouth?’ Malt reached for him and drew in a single touch, which completely destroyed the fake. He wasn’t tricked that easily, not whilst knowing the ins and outs, what brought him about there. ‘I shall go deeper then, I don’t need to wait to be found again. Whatever waits at the end of this tunnel, let it be so. Otherwise, I bid you to follow me. ‘The tertiary entry was there. He was basking into apathy. His mere strength gave him enough power to dig through the few bodies of the lost Ethians and other feigning creatures which stood there, until he found a piece of the barrier which only waited for him to be digging through them. A few swipes had been enough, through the rims of the creeping stills which grabbed him with their hands but dropped away as soon as he behaved. I must relax my muscles and allow myself to float through. An unnerving necessity dictated that he would go, pressing through the midst of the cantor until he pushed himself on the other side. By wit alone, he had escaped them, managing to end up in the bunker where he had belonged. ‘Here I am at home again, no longer listening to the masters forcing me to behave. I shall do well and crush them all, forcing them to flee underneath my boots, to the cries and laughter of those who missed me. Here I am. ‘To the piles of junk, the heap in which he laid, dressed like a penny-worth sir stuck in one of his escapades, he now listened to the songs of the distance, caught by the party which greeted him at last. ‘Androids, you are not as I remember!’ Some bowed, others yelled aloud as they would spread their missing contracts from one to another working even as they would get pleased by the progress they had achieved. ‘You’ve missed a lot, good man, Malt. Perhaps it’s time for us to show you around. ‘What’s the reason for you to treat me this kindly? It’s unexpected and unlike either of you. ‘As his voice emerged, they could only exchange a few more sheets of paper their chest cavities produced. It was getting harder to understand him, let alone pay as less attention to what he was trying to go on with. ‘Forth, we shall set forth that way that was the plan. He should be made aware of it now. ‘Sir, we’re planning of excavating forth and releasing another set of wings for the greater plagues of mankind to continue breathing and living past the lifelessness of the advent of our rule. ‘What rule?’ ‘There’s a dominion now. It’s been established, ever since your absence and out of the ruling manner. ‘But I wasn’t in power. ‘It’s been long judged that you had been so, ever since the time we have come into contact with you and the great invaders who had established it. We cannot express how disappointed we’d be if we were to abandon everything we were doing only to see you lost, in the mazes and the great hazes brought by the new sets of breathing chains. We have gone through a lot of trouble to install them so we could harmonies led into the air. ‘Why would you do such a thing to the humans? It’s dangerous for them and as it is for me. ‘A few moments were cut off their analysis so he could be scanned. Even he had been thoroughly surprised by the fact that there was a wild fascination they had about the human spirit and how much he could possibly change over a short duration of time.

But it had been completely shallow and dissatisfying, to find out. To say the least, about a few more scans, rays going around his whole body in a manner of a few seconds only revealed the obvious thing. He wasn't affected by the led, even more so, he had been changed. Something his inside of him, which came to the light of his eyes, only then, in the first step he had placed. A piece of a shadow rotated something in the distance. His escapades now concluded left him with only one thing to look back at. 'My dear, she's not here. Not the real one. 'But she is.

Somewhere, we've taken the liberties to fix her just so she could apart to this new way of living, enough of the living citizens of meat. We need you to guide us here. 'Another android came in. 'We've made a few adjustments, hoping that you may follow up to our small engineering joint, so you may give us some advice to what we may do and what's wrong. 'Is there something wrong? 'We couldn't decide on our own, it's already hard as it is. To be certain, one could not even look away without hoping they were wrong. Some impartial changes in their programs rendered them rather artificially unstable, even for the likes of minds like theirs. Nothing personal, but the designs had been completely fashioned to imitate the human mind, hence the effort to stamp out all the errors. 'They were small detraction from the workshop made by the machines. 'The diary of a plebian: 'In building eight-one-zone-R. Placed exactly in the hyphenated region where a good chunk of the platters were reverberating in such a way that they started vaguely appearing to be small fractioned tectonic plates that would submerge a few inches deeper every time someone changed rooms. And they would do it often. 'May I take it? I seem to have lost a great deal of my closets from the last time I started moving around. You wouldn't possibly take it into consideration that I'm looking for a room mate, would you? 'I suppose I could join you, after all. 'Raised by the arm, Charles revealed a double bed behind of him, stuck into a separator which turned his small apartment into two rooms. It pushed out like a flat smaller bed of metal, until it got into position. Afterwards, an entire wall had been made in a span of a few moments. 'Rooms for two, would mind coming in? 'His presentation had been called into action. It seemed likely to be what got him kicked into to curb. 'For ten years I managed to live here. I know it sounds absurd, but, even with. 'A short break took both of them to stare at the open door. Usually, it was safe. Most days it was fine. It had been that way in the past. But this new era would be characterized by desecration. Decadence would be seen in the new retractors. The ones that came after the androids and the other creatures which followed in their footsteps, it was merely not be understood. Closely in call, the fall of a clearly defined systematic order had affected everyone. The problem being the fact that the only centralized power was too far away from this spot. It didn't matter at all whom the one was sending the clues and the letters if they were around. Tall and plain, metals grains could only be seen around their un-well boding bodies. Each step cause some sort of mirroring of the eyes, of the areas surrounding them and themselves as well to appear on their wide contraptions. For each of the new stimuli forced a few shocks to be revealed until they were shunned in their original forms. Each of them looked like failed experiments. Storm-machines, made to detect them. But the storms weren't here; they were out there and at the same time, here. It couldn't be brought to make any sense, but they were stuck in a constant deception phase which forced their high-circuits to spread. In their design, there wasn't anything primitive; rather, a pair of rods never met the floor. Instead, they pushed into a quasi-floating puddle-which stored itself into two closely shut pieces of lower and higher cylindrical cloaking devices which spun in the back-boiler. A burning tendon pushed in lower than it, which rotated as the boiler kept frying the devices with the jolts. As soon as the piece of a man appeared there, it was settled. 'I won't have them in. Let's just draw the line. 'Not to draw too much on the small talk, Charles looked for a way to point at the luggage he had brought in. 'Those are going to be our neighbors, you know that? 'Perhaps it would've been better if you. 'Drop out, the light went off. A pair of candles and a flashlight had come in handy just then. 'Both of them will do. As I was saying, I'd rather keep away from them and I want to suggest you to do the same. It's not that I can't trust them, but I don't feel like it. Something about them makes me think of a time when I was in a similar position. But it was much worse than that; I had to deal with them. 'Commercial androids, I know. 'Not them, worse than them. Wait, they're still around? 'Of course, they haven't been taken out of service yet and I doubt they have an expiration date. Well, in any case, R'llal. 'It stretched ahead; we both shook on it and carried on. Even in the dark, it should've been more than a few minutes in which everything was put in place. Both of the rooms were placed in the wrong manner. 'How can you stand these carpets? 'They're fine; I thought you'd be more likely to complain about the shrubs and the strange antiquated rooms than anything else. I seem to be lost sometimes when I'm out, you know. Everything looks strangely familiar outside. Metal bushes sometimes move and get placed so strangely that I find myself just staring at them from the corner of an eye. I know it's a lot to ask, but would you mind it if I stood in the room next to the window? 'It's your room after all. 'Right. 'I gave him my name and I pointed towards the door. It was then that the pan dropped and we both blew the candles in my hand. Honesty should be a virtue we both shared. To make it obvious, neither of us was going to acknowledge it yet. My mouth got shut, but I knew he was thinking of it as well. But my entire took had been recreated in an almost abstract sense of way, as miserable as it had been, I could see a distorted look of it formed by the bushes which aligned with a piece of the road, and most importantly, my hand. It was somehow conceived that my very hand was the missing part of a puzzle which went on to recreate my room outside. I think they've done it so I would still feel at home even if I left my apartment. 'You don't leave that often, do you? 'I spend most evenings here; I know this isn't the person you most likely expected to meet. I'm not in the mood actually, to speak about it. 'It might be redundant in any case. Seconds passed with them looking for a way out of the span of time they entered. Silence not only filled the room but it also appeared to do more than enough when it came to. Objects lay in almost uncanny spots across the walls. The separation of the beds had to be done manually instead. 'Mind helping me with this? It's a job for two after all. Pulling each pin out and dragging them away, making sure there's nothing going wrong and. 'On my way, don't you. Let's detach the bed first, and then we'll talk. 'It was awkward, ever since the start. He had that strange impression he kept dragging away with him, like some wet fish taken from on top a well, bouncing against each brick as one could tell that it wasn't likely for me to be sympathetic at all. Other than that, well, I took on my job and only paid enough attention to it as it would be necessary for me to do it. 'There's noise already. 'Shut it up then, I don't want any trouble. It may be our neighbor now, but I don't want to stress it again. As long as we don't disturb it, there should be no problems. 'Him, you mean him, I saw something which looked like a human in him, and so it's at least part human. 'Whoever is lost in it isn't human any longer. Don't argue with me now, I've done my share of research, like I told you. I've been here for a long time. I've seen their kind, eight of them already, eight, and eight why does that seem so familiar to me? 'It was something which almost always pushed him past the tint of a reflection. I wish I had something else to tell him about it. But I was already disturbed. So many details about what I knew now appeared to be falling off, creeping past a piece of my mind. And the pain in my chest only came to me so often. 'I sometimes feel like I'm broken in the head, I feel a lump in there which is trying to move and get away. Not always but sometimes. 'I thought about telling him that but I could never even fathom dragging myself into it. He made me too uncomfortable with his silent and sturdy demeanor. This tall man, dark-haired, estranged by others, lanky and somehow well-behaved found himself working at the joints on both sides of the bed with much more ease than I had expected him to do. Some man was I now, being afraid of some piece of metal plaster which didn't even allow me a piece of mind. Perhaps I had been rather blind to the people around me. It always happens. 'Take it from that side; I'll pick it from here. 'We dragged it across the carpet because of its massive weight. Masked by the sound of rubbing, I could at least fear what would be around. If I had cared enough, if only I had taken another stroll to make sure that there was a change in my room, in the bushes, in the road, then it would be settled. I'd know I was being watched. My choice hadn't been a simple matter of preference, as to my room near the window. Neither would it be his. For I was much closer to the fire exit, which allowed me for an uncommon escape in the middle of the night, though I would be scum to face such a fear and get out, I played my cards well. Something in mind seemed to change now. After being done, we said our good nights and I set out. Now I had become the plaster, the stranger in the woods, and pines, the metal ankle, the spanner which would twist the various cogs and other pins, wanting to see what was going around for the likes of me. 'Let me see it. 'I said to myself. Looking just about the area revealed that I wasn't going to allow myself to be followed. Not this night. They usually rested and recharged like any other human, but for me that dehumanized them even more. Repetition, a false tenderness, a promise that they'd replace us, those sprang to mind. Perhaps I spent too much time alone, but that had been rewarding. When I had come onto the same spot, I had noticed something ever so important that ought to be noted. A different image contorted around my hand, after I had aligned it with everything I just saw. It was my room, just like how it had changed after the new comer had entered it. Two walls being replicated almost inclined, and the two beds weren't together anymore. In the blinds, there was even the less obscured sight of the fire exit which I had taken. 'I see now. 'This was no trick of the mind. I was at fault for even thinking I could outsmart whatever was going on here. Somehow caught in my own antics, I was rather inert. Stuck, even by the strange methods I tried pushing into it. I spat, I trashed the closest pieces I could find, pushing the metal brushes away, even trying to convey a circle, which in some way I expected to be reflected back there. Afterwards, I took a moment. Calmness took over; even though this had been a desolate place I couldn't take my mind off. Even from the distance, I'd know what would be there. A junkyard of the worst kind, this was what I had avoided. Ever since the change in power, many buildings had been completely assailed and destroyed. It wasn't what I had expected, nor had I cared for it alone. Flowers and petals, roses were blooming in metal. I knew what it was. Iron-soil, made out of crisp ore-brambles which had been spread about every place I could look. That made me want to feel like whatever I had done, whatever I would touch granted me the chance for something to grow on it. Someone like me had gone there, he had similar hands, and this sounded mad. But I think my hand obscured that spot and allowed for the roses to grow in the junk. Perhaps I had deformed the land or simply crushed it with the help of a force which couldn't even be accounted for. 'Turn around, slowly, identify yourself. You're new. 'An android was there to greet me. 'I've lived here for all my life. I don't leave my house very often. 'Very well then, then would you mind answering me in which apartment do you live? 'As for that, I did not answer. He couldn't hold me, even though I considered this one to be more human than the rest. We both knew what I had to deal with now, especially when I told him, with an eventuality I couldn't get away from. 'I have to get near one of them. 'He simply nodded and got out of the way. It was in his power to follow me, directly to the fire escape and see where I would go. But he hadn't. Perhaps that's when my strange faith in him recoiled. Much to my surprise, I wasn't bothered any longer for what he's done to me.

And he's done quite a lot, just by a mere set of phrases. Stranger, vagrant, obscured, a no one, a new comer, someone who has achieved exactly what he had secretly hoped for, to become invisible. 'Before you leave, now, I have something. 'The android still encompassed me with those strange beady-like pupil eyes. He made sure I'd know. 'This will be kept between the two of us; no one should be made aware of it, that you're here, that is. You needn't doubt me. 'A simple nod would do, as much as I knew, that is. Nothing would serve to probe him any longer than I should have. I went back in. I wasn't followed. Thankfully the bed was still warm. Hot compresses rested in the exact spot after being released by the malfunctioning cold-machine. I slept well during the night, at least for a strange man. Nothing usually disturbed me during the sleep. Wonder strolled through the weeping floors of the casino underneath the ocean floor. But even there, I found no solace gambling alone. Most of the tables were filled with just enough somber gamblers who abstained from trying. Drops were being drained above. They weren't made out of water but a stray air. It wasn't even, the sea was hot, but it was lost on me. The spin never ended. I never threw another rock in it. Instead I chose to wait, hearing only the pieces shatter of my back as soon as I rested on the crackling of a whip. I was deeply surprised by the room and how everything had been set it. The people had become the objects, placed in their prepubescent looks inside pieces of the furniture. Each of them had one such child-like copy of them. It was too late to abstain from gambling now. Despite their desire no to give any improper example to their past selves, they dwelled for too long in there. Plenty of them were more than aware where they would end up, so it couldn't be anything but incontestable, by any means. Some sings were lost, way too often for me to care. Piss lay underneath the table. Whereas a few children were there, I could just feel the vibrations and how much damage they were doing to them. Without even being able to ask, I stepped in and immersed myself into the throw. My promise had been broken and I could feel like I was already accosted by the breaking of the sea. A bigger gap emerged as the cracks turned in. Now air was flooding our room with the feel of the release never being met. It felt likely that I would see them, the first emergence of the sea life which suffocated on its way here. 'One of us would've drowned. I know that now. Perhaps it's better that way. I could never suffer any more stopping, you know? 'But of course that had only been the first sizing of the place. The fish and their eggs began appearing just about in every imaginable place, even inside my jacket. They looked at me as if I was the worst for the wear. A gentleman with fins and pieces of bone which only moved forward before realizing that many of the men and the dames present fell to their knees once they choked on the fish guts. What followed was the forming of the grave. I would still gamble, I think. Even if it was unnecessary for me to do it, I still found solace, throwing a chuck of stone between the ribs. 'I wish I could get up now. 'Charles looked just pale and sad, after losing his lower legs, holding on the table to prevent himself from falling. It was something which took him out of the mood. Part a whale came into him, and he could see something fleeing from him, bones and pieces of a fisherman, who was holding a lamp. It was getting dark after all, before he could around. He saw towards where they were approaching, the margins of the lost sea, where the water was gone and air was free. Why do I desire air so much? ‘Though it hasn’t crossed him mind yet, this had almost stood in turn as close a fetish would be. Its strangeness drew him closer than he would’ve ever expected it to. ‘Why are you bothering me now? I have all the air I need out there. ‘But no lungs came into neither of the plants of the machines on the side or anything about the quarter corners or the like. Instead, he saw some manifestation of some crumpled black lumps, similar to some. Noise, that woke him up immediately. It was unexpected. He went out for a walk. Strained by some pain and by the lack of anyone being there to draw near him, he’d spent the rest of the night smoking. Two in morning, the clock simmered. A couple was somewhere in the streets at that hour, probably bent as much as they would be on what chemicals they had purchase by the hour. It seemed lively there. Dark would come, but there were lights being turned around just at every corner. Each went on a spectrum which became grayer as the night progressed. And as he watched the events unfold, something came which he would’ve never been able to suppress. A feeling of desire for the tenderness those strangers on the streets showed. It was sad, that he was so alone. ‘This is what I get from trying to get out. ‘It went on for hours. Liveliness wasn’t supposed to flourish there. But I relent; I supposed it was too arrogant to think I was responsible for flowers blooming in the distance. My mind had almost crossed the threshold where I came close to believed I was the reason they came there. But they didn’t even know I existed. No one knew, and no one cared. Almost everyone got the same treatment as I have, yet they haven’t. Why wouldn’t they be so different? There was no real sentence on the doors. It was a sham. Numbers went down on a timer through which it would be decided how much it would take for your heart to rot from all the loneliness. At least that was my theory for it. It was heard to confirm or deny anything when you were alone and there wasn’t even an echo to do it. By four a knock came on the door and I knew he had come for me. ‘Come in. ‘we shared a look and a cigar. Usually I had my privacy, even when I had to share rooms, but this wasn’t out of place as I thought it was. It didn’t disturb me that much.

At least to think that, oh my. It’s late, too late for that. ‘Hard time falling asleep? ‘‘Insomnia, they told me it’s incurable. I don’t know why I have it. Perhaps I’m just inherently wrong or something, but I’m keeping still. ‘He wasn’t as surprised as I was, or if he was, he didn’t show any sign for it. Rather than that, he was bent on trying to finish faster than I was. Company or not, I would spend my time here. ‘‘Are you planning on making an ash garden? ‘‘Excuse me? ‘‘The cigars, I didn’t take you for a heavy smoker. ‘‘I’m trying to quit it. A bad habit, I know, but it keeps me alive. That’s what they told me at least. ‘Charles tried, but no change came on his face. As expressionless as he thought himself to be, he took a tiny pick and started stretching the skin on top his gums. It seemed rude but it wasn’t as important now. He showed one piece of the strange happenings which came with his slow breathing. ‘I stop breathing at times. It’s not a condition, I do in intentionally. ‘‘Why? ‘‘The air’s bad. Somehow, there clouds are there, which shouldn’t be. Since there’s no sky, they might be synthesized. I know you wouldn’t be surprised by it, but I feel like my lungs are dying. Slowly, they’re making me feel like I ought to drown now because I’m not in my natural habitat any longer. Like a dumb animal, they’ve taken me and placed me in a cage, but the people who put me in here are long gone and they forgot about me. ‘‘Do you often think about things that way, Charles? ‘‘What way would that be? ‘‘It’s weird. Usually, everyone’s minding their own business and live normal lives. They change rooms and mostly do the refineries of candle lights. Come with me for a moment, I want to ask you about something. I think it’s a curiosity of mine as well. ‘He took me to the door and showed me the hallway. It was the same hallway I had looked out of for hundreds of time. Red carpets which lost their color. ‘They’re bright aren’t they? I would say they’re brand new, rightly so, because I wouldn’t have thought it otherwise. ‘How could they be new? The color is all washed out? ‘What of the tapestry and the painting? ‘Everything’s washed out, as I said. ‘Charles wouldn’t understand, but he had to ask. ‘What was your name again? ‘Robert Alan, I told you, when I came here. ‘Rober Lan, it wasn’t what he heard the first time he spoke his name. No, it was something cosmically shorter. ‘What of the painting? ‘You wouldn’t like it, it’s ugly. It’s supposed to be abstract, but it looks like it had been done by a child. ‘Now I see your problem. Everything looks bleak to you, a fake. A nasty take of everything we like. ‘Allan pointed at the painting again. ‘That’s a painting of a figure, a replica of an older man. Probably a copy of some master or someone as skilled as a master, I’d say. ‘I only see them as being bleak because that’s what they are. All of them, everything, there’s no exception to it. ‘Charles’ eyes were swollen, even more beside the point. It wouldn’t be worth it to explain what the matter was then. He ran back to his room, more annoyed than anything at the mere intrusion this man set him up to. Without a way out, he’s only see himself as nastily caught as he’d be brought back there. Two more floors below, a few hours through the night, one pair spent it in a tub. It was unexpected, to even stay in it for that long, but enough had been spent that they knew it wasn’t safe to stay any longer. ‘Do you want to go, yet? ‘Ten more minutes, I think I like it here, don’t you? ‘My manners are elsewhere, I think they were gone ever since I started resting during the job. ‘He should be ringed up in at least an hour. There was still time to get out and click his name-card in. Most of them worked, or at least waged for the mere sake of trying to get away from there. But a good part was more than content with staying there for the rest of their lives. Unnecessary conditions for living, as they were deemed, seemed to be in the longer terms the water and the food, provided at a touch of the dial by the android, which came in sparse. Lately, they’ve been slow. As a matter of fact, the Capricotts felt neglected. It couldn’t even be conceived any longer that they’d stay. As unnecessary as it was, there was a reason for it. IT wasn’t conveyed by words or by signs. It was decided that they’d have to be forced to walk out by themselves in the open. Otherwise, none could be spared of this petty life everyone had been forced into. More and more, the more they’d stay in the tub, the more they’d want to stay in and never leave without a good reason. Though they didn’t know the cause of it, this was to be unofficially called, the curse of Malt. For he had been the one to bring, the sadness if for some reason he couldn’t explain, perhaps the bleakness which had entered them had always been there, reeling an eye or some wild wonder which didn’t belong there. Only now they could thoroughly observe it and give at least some bitter sings. Unsightly so, he left his wife, more than she’d know, he closed the door behind him, leaving him to clean, a waistcoat where he’d had been, and another woman at the workplace. By the moons, which weren’t there, false constructions, never even worked rightly. No matter. She waited for him down there. It was a lost place, indeed it’d be. ‘Catherine. ‘Jacob, you’re late. ‘I was busy; my wife had been keeping me there for a while. She’s clingy, you know? Always one step behind me, trying to get a foot in or something. Getting jealous already? I thought we’ve been through this already, as a matter of fact, we’ve been trying to push in for what? Was it a few months or years? ‘Time drags too long now; you know that’s not how it works here. ‘I’ll take your word for it ma’am. Shall we? ‘His apartment held no windows, his wife never followed. She suspected, but never actually carried on more than it was needed. Later, she would find out and he promised himself they’d break it off. Not that it mattered in any case, how could it? They’ve been through so much already now that everything else was precisely numbing. As usual, she'd clean the room, go to bed early and wake up near her husband. Brown curtains seemed to be fading from the distance as well, from one of the older buildings which were placed there. As the lack of progression chipped in, it all seemed calm. 'I used to play there as a child, you know? Me and my younger sister, she's gone now. I mean, moved in with her husband, in the distant apartments. "You know they're starting to make some progress, right? 'Catherine followed through with a few pictures she took. Strange, as it may be, it had always been out of place, seeing the camera. With everything that happened around there, it seemed luckless, grasping for something akin to some lost times. 'One day, all the pictures I'm taking will be seen as something so much greater, you know? Like historical accounts of what times were like now and from where our descendants came. "So that's it, Catherine? You don't suppose there's any hope that we may actually leave the bunker and make it to the outside world? 'I suppose we will survive and that's the only thing that matters. Look, I've had enough of the world out there; it made me feel lonely, living in a city. "Stop clinging to those memories. Those are lost and gone. For the sake of our; there are children being born here, you know? They won't have any recollection of the life out there. Can't you even give them some hope that they'll see the light again? What of days, what of a paradise of islands in some distant costs? 'I've had my share of paradise for a life time. Islands aren't what they ought to be, buildings get abandoned. "Here as well, just look around, there's nothing. "There's nothing but a place to build. "We could rebuild the world outside as well. "It's uninhabitable; can't you see it, Jacob? It's lost. It's never going to come back. We'll always be forced to live in this place underneath them. 'Cranking as they moved in, the movers were still dealing with the expropriation of the closest piles of metal they could heave themselves near. It was something both unexpected and rather onset on the various pleas they could find themselves near. Two steps at a time, one mover would stop and let the other one push on. Of course neither of the levels above compared with the last one below. They had their struggles and we had ours. It was hard to even consider them similar to ours, since they weren't even close to being similar, they were ignored. Life above turned to crumbs, which were picked up by those who worked in the movers. 'It was a victory, a victory, we're free. 'It had succeeded, in some way. Every mover had a small robot which prevented them from fully developing into death machines. But, it took away something from them. They had given into a life without merit. Forced to survive which working on the quarry around each level, only to make due with the little they could spare between them. Since the bunkers united themselves, it was, it had attained a strange magnitude which took away from life. This was the future now. And they had to be content with it or face the inability that theirs wasn't a life worth living. It was, to be a spaced-out feeling of fleeing animosity which released them from the past. 'I wish I had been there, to witness it. 'Often some words would find their way here and there only to be quickly forgotten. No merit could be held to them. No one contested the plains which were due. 'There's a life away from this place, but I don't think we're made for it. 'First words muttered by Catherine on the road. She had missed talking to him, even though she dreamed of someone else. It was the future and it was bleak. A sip of the four distinct structures which were reasonably at fault for magnetizing their air seemed to have been placed in the plateau their slums rested in. Structures usually didn't behave this way, which was a damn giveaway that the architects had their hands stricken with flaws. Hjurds-units were supposed to have been programmed so thoroughly that they'd recreate anything thing when called in. It was by a lot of data that the plans to the reconstruction of the continent were set to be made. On smaller scale of course and under the orders of the great swirls which still creped. They found themselves sitting at the feet of various under-set cathedrals, waiting. Descending from their mad branches, stood the first fruits of metal to be done, waiting to be shared between the two of them. ‘Shall we give up then? ‘It was the first question which aroused any kind of suspicion from him. Though not entirely unexpected, they rested on a pile of dead creatures, being which had been completely shaped into unrecognizable caricatures of mutated living beings and a few violators which had their heads crushed in. Everything had been dealt with extreme precision and a force of destruction that not even the materializing pieces of the electric power stood a chance against them. Spoils of wars, they called them, unnecessary at best. ‘I cannot rise from my sea of knowledge any longer, so I suppose in some way, we have been defeated. Don’t mind my manners no more. I shall be gotten forth and thrown away when you’ll spare me no use. ‘‘You’re not being kept here only for your usage alone, it’s simply because I enjoy your company, that’s all. We’ve tried and we have failed. Our masters above had been completely cut off from communicating with us. I think we ought to expect the worst. ‘‘What of their deaths, then? If they died, so be it. We’ll eventually die ourselves out of boredom. ‘‘And the androids? We could simply join them again. ‘‘Pointless thing, isn’t it? In a way I think it would be better if we chopped away any kind of communication and gave into supreme seclusion. No more contact with the outside forces. We’ll simply be here, standing for no reason. ‘No reason could be spoken, yet it was felt. The line broke as they would be called again. ‘Break your neck then and pull away whatever it is on top of your shoulders. Needn’t you deserve it for the reasons you pointed. It is unnecessary for you to continue then. With this never-ending shame which will only bring the uncanny back to mind. Please yourself no longer. ‘‘Then what do you want? Do you wish to be served by the citizens out there? Have we not tried governing over them before? They’re struggling as it is now, let me be. But if you do want, be my guest. ‘‘We weren’t sharing in the size of giants before. I’d say that now, we could. ‘‘We’d end up wasting the time we could spend here, resting, talking and seeing how they serve. ‘In that cathedral, called proper, there were citizens that almost never left it. After all, they rested on an endless supply which had been granted underneath the floor. With the proper sewers put in place, there wasn’t any reason to attempt it. Moreover, awareness brought them in. Giant arms would sooner or later come from within and crush them. It had to be that way. ‘Listen to yourself, we won’t destroy them. Those are old antics; we do not follow those kinds of plain rules any longer. Instead, I think the best approach would be to go on forth and try making for the exit. ‘‘And disappear just like them? It would be too much of a bother. ‘‘Why is there even a church in here, and where have we crawled? ‘From where their stood, they could only see a simple plain hole on top of the greater root, which lead down. Stricken down by the might of the revolting pieces of the fall, they found themselves simply staring at what brought them in. The harrowing mass which has simply creped in left no mark in the manner. Without help, no one from the cathedral would escape or plainly get away. And they were kept there, surrounded by a quasi-embrace, as the two swirled around, fantasizing of an escape. ‘Humans sometimes came here, haven’t they? ‘‘Momentarily, but then they left as soon as they arrived and saw what lay behind. It’s hard to see properly, but our shapes should scare anyone. ‘Their transcendence was short-lived. It was only later that they realized what they had missed. On a farther distant look, beneath the mountainous region of the deep gorge, there rested a dark gothic town, ancient and placed there by mistake. Its presence there represented an escape. From beneath the rakes of meat-bores, it depressed into stamping bridges which drew back. For the lack of an impression left, there was dread which had been fiercely set on them. A crass look came over. No one dared spare a word. To the workshop it was. Few hours in, passed. 'I'm not going to spent too much around the place; I'm only interested in looking at the sings. 'Broken lines stood there, past the point where they began cutting through the mild bodies being melted in on top of the ones they were giving birth to. The whole process was strange, almost redacted, and unrealizable by the fact that there wasn't enough thought put in with the amount of inconsistent placed which rolled them in. A pair of arms popped in too quickly, which formed large concave materials which were barely set inside of him. Everything had been brought in from different parts. From a tiny barrel, a piece of a large fish, a few wires and some chains which kept everything apart, some skeleton which only appeared to be growing in the most grueling way possible, to the plaster inside of it, the first born would come out. At least the first born he would get to observe now. It was magnificent, how, stopped. By a single gesture, he had been given a helmet for his eyes. 'For your own good, take it unless you want to be left scarred or partially blind. It happened before to another passer by who couldn't help it but look where he didn't belong. 'As soon as the pause had been done with, one of the greater top processors from on top the ceiling rail had been dragged from the back, releasing a point-care energy which started dexterously releasing vile rays of direct matter on top of that crudely constructed body over the metallic born creatures. It couldn't be justified at all, just why had it looked that way, but one tormenting manner to another release the anxious liquids out. Some dropped away and left nothing on the side. In as short a span of time as it could be allowed, they waited. Malt looked and saw something else happening, a fraud, but not one, to be precise about it, this would be nothing to be expected for a bunch of engineers and androids who worked in their respective fields. They relished on some vague shapes that were made out of pure energy, drawing them in with the processor. It seemed to give the metallic, carapace a strange cognition of its own. Not only had such a peerless, yet, scrawny and wide surface sentience, but it had also managed to turn it into a magnet for those beings. Who couldn't control themselves but leap inside the creature, making it whole once more? 'Why are you doing that to them if they're already alive? 'It's an extra layer of protection, nothing more. Do not bother with it too much; likely you wouldn't understand the inner doings of our plans. We're going to take down the new centralized power and with this, we may be able to subdue their rays and take over the system they have tried setting onto this new world. 'That sounds dangerous. 'For that reason, we cannot waste or even hope to use human lives. Certainly you'd come to understand that. We cannot even hope to use one of yours if that means losing a hundred more if the repercussions are to be attained. 'Aren't you androids supposed to be allied with them? Is it the uniforms? 'Not only them, but other androids who had given in their false promise or ruling. Their plans come down to enslaving them and making the masses listens and obey to the great centralization of humanity. On the longer run, there's the promise that they'll be forced to become androids as well. Same fate shall enwrap everyone they consider between them. 'Who are they? Who are those people you're talking to? Is it the same creatures I saw hiding, the strange headed ones? 'We have no recollection of it. 'Another android came in. He gave way as had the others to the variously estranged giant and morbid tanked crab-suited machines. From beneath them lay a deeper mass which collapsed and appeared to completely control the movements it took. Without a way of knowing, it would be impossible to even guess just what went through it and what seemed to live. 'You're placing everything you're finding around the junk trunk to make up for the space. 'They're still small, but they'll grow out of it and abandon the shells. 'He questioned something else, at which he could only hope that they'd hint at. It was the strange device from which the ray came, and whether or not they were there. Small and pinched, he never asked, but winced at the thought of having to deal with them. Terrible little things, he always told about it. Nowhere near a house pet or some plant. Soon that would have to be abandoned and repelled. He didn't feel well at all. As a matter of fact, he almost rested on the ground at the sight of the rights which started popping from their soft and plain carapaces on top of the dwelling place they sacked around the area. It was strange, looking them appear, almost like a conjuration on top of them. Through some way of looking at the wildness he had observed, he peered back in and saw the sacks, many of which flung them higher until it couldn't be looked away from. "We'll infect their main building and force them to waste whatever power they have left in order to avoid the contamination. "It sounds like a plan, but you don't suppose there's a chance you may resolve this conflict by not destroying the livelihood of people, would you? "What a strange thought it had been. It struck him there and then. With a pinch of an eye, the androids waited for him to set on again. "Without destroying the life of a person, just one that I'm interested in, in. "Come to think of it, you can do whatever you want with the other ones as long as you don't touch too many of the strange turns and twists that were being displayed around him. To say the least, I couldn't even bother to look away. I couldn't think of anything I could tell them in particular. No, that wasn't it either. I was too ashamed to approach the subject or even think about her at all. Not this version. Even the word, version seemed to obscure her person and turned her in a strange and bizarre creature which wasn't to be called. "What is that thing? "There was another apparition of meal, the contortion which siphoned itself like the mix of liquids that twisted with its peg-like legs. With each step, it was to be decided that it wouldn't be worth it to look onward any more. His plans and considerations faded once he saw the image showing its writhing head at him. He was struck by the look of uncanny, which only dragged itself as it began to work on the lower creatures. "It's one of the fully matured ones as you may have noticed. It has all the power and might of one of them, but much older and experiences. Not only were there signs of a faster improvement but they're fully capable of giving birth. "And transferring a part of their codes and their experiences to the young ones, a thing which not even you or, humans aren't capable of doing. Forgive me for even implying you're of the same kind. "But I am. I'm rather upset that you'd think of it otherwise. I'm fully boned and. "Struck by the look he had been given from the other side, he seemed to want to peer in. Furious by his own account, he could only think of the repercussion which might happen if he happened to turn up on the other side of some other plane from which he came. Memories drilled in not only with a flash but with a strange and disgusting pool which kept dripping as far as he could count on it. "I'd rather stay away from it now, if it doesn't bother you a bit. I want to hear more about your plans to set onward. "And you shall, don't worry about it now, there's more than one way to take down a building. Now that you're here, perhaps you may join us. "What do you want exactly? "It's going to be something rather easy, to say the least, we expect nothing less of a demolition expert like yourself, and as soon as we get it out of the way. "My good android wants your experience from the great ship you were while living in the blocs. Back when you were high in the air. Our memories had been damaged and whatever analysis we had remains inconclusive. "We know that you are responsible of the fall. All that we ask of you it to please contain your knowledge in a small note of any material so we may quickly scan and interpret it. "Grave danger lays ahead, unless you help us, we may be sloppy and end up being overwhelmed by them. It can't even be thought off or considered, rather, we need all the help we can get.

‘Even from the irresolute manners in which they constrained to creating the machines, it couldn’t even be believed. It was dangerous after all, just thinking about a way they might break through. But I knew what they were planning.

Somehow I could smell it off them. But at the core of their tin cases, they hid just enough ooze and that slimy material which manifested itself from who know where, to become completely immune to it. Diseased or not, contaminated or brought from a disturbing delighted realization, he couldn’t tell just what their end goals were, to even think that they would employ something as repelling and as disgusting as they would, was highly dangerous and morbid. More so, it was dangerous to even consider undertaking them because of how quickly they had mobilized. All of the great materials, the precious metals and the various stone-deposits which had been dug from the earth were in their reach. I have observed this, previously, around the bloc where I lived. Though it may have been late, I knew that they collected enough through their journeys and strange encounters. But never had I even dreamed of this. Behind them lay a giant room which outstretched enough to holster an entire trove. Filled with everything which was known to man, or the one who had discovered the pure gift of machine labor. Tirelessly, they’d work to create as much as they could, never grasp for air, or anything which would be fair to a laboring man. And what came out of the gates in the back was highly unrecognizable to the human eye. Many contortions of legs had been dropped to the ever-learning capability of the enthralling strange wheel-mechanisms or the spinning tendons which pushed in until they formed pseudo-blocks which turned as far as to create a few ill-shape clock tongues. And these were only pushing in and out into some strange space. To satiate the wonder, he saw their legs expand into their bodies, making it seem like the possibility of storage was somewhat infinite. That took away all the thoughts he had of lovers, the nasty faces, the possessions and everything else of the matter. If this place was to continue and if they were to develop into a much dangerous peoples, there would be a hell to pay. Power could not even be called into question any longer. It didn’t work that way. They were going to waste it if they were allowed and that was something which couldn’t be permitted. Primitive primates, tattling at the spanners. Everyone expected something to happen sooner or later, just about the set of light and the alarms. ‘Move on citizens, it’s time for you to draw back to the roads. Any hand which can be spared now should be repurposed for this scope alone. It’s for the greater good that you’re to be told. We shall group you into a few sections, from which picks shall be redistributed and other kinds of strange sets shall be thrown around until the work will be done. ‘It was a disaster, distaste, from which they didn’t really see the point. With the threat of the debris falling, there was always the threat of something going wrong and all their progress being shoved to a meaningless heap which didn’t help anyone achieve what they wanted. Proper this, proper that, it was relentless, how they had to deal with it. And even questionable whether or not the vehicles could properly walk there, strange things being uncounted. Someone was coming. Yet again, they would be set on the path of riding the most distasteful-looking appliance, with its strange rangers could look into it any further. There was missing piece which rendered it to look as the uncanny thing possible. From its behind it was incredibly easy to see how uneven the whole construction had been. From the two-far ending sides there were two cargos which stood opposite to one another, kept by a bunch of metal bars that spanned regarding the movement of the wheels. Wheels were supposed to be circled around the gaps, yet these ones were sharper and glassier. Indeed, they looked flatter and angled, like small cots which pushed in both ends, bound to be touched and pulled ahead. Fear might drive one away from the touch, as they brought a promise a pain and a watch for the barrel-like cylinder between them. In the two compartments underneath, there rested two famine-stricest creatures. Hardened by the size of their heads, which were longer than their bodies, they survived the malnutrition by eating the sweat which went through the various tubes which connected them to the cargoes they carried. From inside them, there were plenty of living soldier who were producing that swear, unaware that they were feeding the moaning creatures in their reckless desire to be death than to suffer this inconclusive fate. Undesirably caught, the various puckers of the land which watched the road had given the chance to be assailed. 'Drop the nets!' A yellow tone, which pushed forth the kind of beady wings of rope which stopped the vehicle in the throng of the holes they had made. It was a mere distraction which had served its purpose just well enough. What had been incontestable was that strange appearance of disgust. Morbidly caught into their own antics, the citizens surrounded the vehicle, armed to their teeth with plow and other manufactured machines guns they had carried. Black and ribbed, the metal would remove some shades after shooting a few gray and golden bullets. Other projectiles which accompanied them were such as one should be made aware of, small cross-cutter, which was launched by a few throwers that were meant only for the sick incapacitation of the nearest machine who'd come. Android or not, there was the common fear the man showed at he danger which presented itself ahead, not to mention of the constant deciding factor which was always present there.

A scent which was brought from the enemy that made his presence known. It wasn't to be held or shown ahead. Mistrust would be the battering of the vile. One couldn't defile himself with what he was to show. Release into the air, they opened their arms and surrender to the strange, almost tribal watchers, showing no desire whatsoever to fight. 'We surrender. "Oh, so you're traitors, then. Pull off your masks. 'It was no one they really knew but the bunker was wide. Plenty of families took in the new sets of clothes they had been given, the armor and whatever else they had gotten. In total, a few of them were present. At least eight, divided into the two cargoes they came out of.

That was quite spacious if thought be told. Without a nerve to preserve, they set forth, to the last of wonders. Without a question, one could not disable the machines if they wanted. Without the consternation to take those head onto a milder approach, they had passed on the next order. 'Tie them up. "Wait, before you do anything, yes, listens to me. I'm from around the distant regions, where the ground started raising itself a few meters off the ground. Hear me out will you? "Why should I know? You're our prisoners, and I don't have to argue with prisoners, especially the ones which aren't armed. "Unless you haven't noticed, neither had the androids, please now. Let me explain,

I'm Willow. Just give me this chance; we'll work something out, only if you trust me. I won't make the same mistake again, like I had the last time. 'He almost came off too friendly, too familiar and the name of Willow. 'I know you. 'The leader of the band set forth. He could almost not recognize what was going on, or just how much the man had changed, but it was the same man he had been in the army with. Twenty years ago. Now they were on opposite lines, even though he was armed, he stood there, less reluctant to listen. 'I was put in charge to look after the scouting party, that's all. You don't need to push everyone away now, I'll do the talking. 'Willow put on a wild demeanor as the others tried chiming in. Deciding that it was worth it to wait through it, they stood by him instead. 'How about we settle this in private then? 'It was a wild decision he couldn't draw a way from. To even consider pushing himself past the rafts would take away any kind of joy he felt. He was sweating a lot. Not thinking of any other way to push them around, he came in with a decisive flicker. His skin shone in the light, revealing the powerful stricken globes which were almost always present there in their invisible state. Of his wild entrance, he couldn't bother to point back at the others and carve a path for them. Only the two of them made way, past the gathering they had formed. 'Willow, I think we're far enough. We shouldn't be bothered. 'In that case you can lower your gun. 'There wasn't a chance in the lyre that this headsman would be spared. Fewer conditions might pass through the words he thought of muttering while he busied himself to look for a way out. His troops were pointless, since they were a scouting party, and the loss of the two vehicles could be dealt with. That alone was enough to convince him he'd be ready for anything. Obvious to the manner, something kicked him in the spanner until that came by, never to have tried to look remotely alive; they were joined by some walking man. But he looked highly contagious, afflicted by some spell. Ill to the touch, he wouldn't even have been affected by that test of woe. 'What's that thing supposed to be? 'It bore a deranged look, him being a remnant of some old and diseased creature which didn't even belong there. Its contagion served as a flicker of feet which started coming in from behind, hands contorted showing the entry of metal in his chest. A mirror-like pool of metal stood in his chest, afflicting him in the most atrocious manner. He couldn't even be out served by this strange way in he acted. He pulled himself together after falling, being met by the two of them. Both stood there ready to defend themselves from whatever threat this might be. Danger was something neither of them was willing to even test for themselves, henceforth the trial and the denial which would be given if he approached. 'Stay there, don't come any closer or I'll shoot. 'The first warning came to him as cold as he could possibly lay it. A few steps were already falling on their way, with their inedibility pushing through. Something else came from inside of him, a pair of obtrusive hard nests, and textures like the shells of spiders, which their entirety of the body off-balance, until the point where I threw myself past the sanitation of bowels the earth showed it. Dust crawled in his open torso which made him look like an irradiated buffoon who couldn't help it but stray from the closest pillars he found himself near. He pulled back the nets and instead threw out a far wider cone which spilled out of him. It felt like he was boiling his guts in the most atrocious manner. Without his sense pushing in, he had been immediately deemed an enemy, who got shot between the eyes. The sound alarmed everyone, even if they were inside the reach. But the distraction didn't long enough until he found himself pointing at Willow's neck. 'Not so fast now, don't think I haven't noticed you moving around me when I was aiming, you're not going to leave me that soon. 'Within ear shot, there came the look of the uncanny, as he pushed past the awe. Looking like he saw what happened, this half-dumbed down creature ate itself and disappeared, submerging in that strange hole in the nearest remark. Without being able to shout at it, there was that sudden understanding that there wasn't any word coming in. Without the proper arrangements, there wasn't any way to see. Just what came out of the ground as soon as it was done glancing at me? A few more silver walkers, no thumbs, no upper bodies, just the bottom parts came out. It was a high disturbance which shocked everyone in place. As soon as they had cleared their silver smoke, it had become obvious that they were coming after them. And they strung themselves as soon as they would be able, unable to feel anything or as much as a single emotion as the silver tunnel started chipping away. Soon they silver shell started peeling away until they revealed themselves in forms of brown, deep green and red, some peculiar texture lying beneath them. In no shape and form could they be called dangerous yet, at least not until a contact had been established. Though they showed signs of aggression, there was that needed to see through them. Just what the reason had been for them coming here? 'I cannot focus, we need to serve them. 'Said one of the men around the cargos, to which the others heeded the call and only gave as much as an approval which was needed. Otherwise, who knew what might happen. Their minds and any kind of control which was remotely felt before was gone. Gone into the musk of the rum which ran on the rivers beneath the junk, and they would be in control. With such vision as the plebeians wouldn't possibly know or be able to resist. A fist of glances, the trances of woe. Remarkable said so; they couldn't even fathom not serving them any longer, since it's been a while. 'A tent around the vehicles. 'One said, as they started them and ran them through one of the nearest buildings they could land them near. It was interesting how this new base of operation had been made. Antennas lay on top of it, despite there being no channel or near-port for the electricity; they would later make use of the spare metal there. It was more like they felt like their minds would melt, which forced them into the trance. A modus operandi was still there, with their little incentive being there. Stone crust embeds the toil. Lost to the coils, the foiled space in which lay adorned some nastier tails, they gathered around a fire, to the midst of the hellfire, at a story which was spoken. Their lot had been estranged, since they had been ground morbidly by themselves. Uncomfortably standing, they crept upon each other, wonderingly. My disposition had already been lost. I was at the threshold of looking at them or at myself, unable to decide whether or not it was worth it trying to look away. At a degree of sounds, the heat was moving on, drawing near from one of the many displaced gas pockets beneath the earth. I was sure of it, as I would say. 'My sothree, the dog, died a few weeks ago in an accident which had been produce or altered by the androids. I have seen them act in the suspicious manners when I wasn't supposed to even comprehend what they were doing. Truly, I'm bound to look and see and tell you. "What did you hear? "Never mind that, listen to me. Something had accosted my dog. My mutt was eaten, there in the place by non-human teeth, by the metal coils which didn't even threaten to be there. I saw it with my owned eyes. It dragged itself by the land. 'Everything was flat in the mind, again. They looked outside, past this strange story, only to see the whole desolation being represented there, in its magnificence. A subtle thing which would be lost one day. 'Before you carry on. Ever wonder what life would be like if we saw a strange sky out there and a painted moon? Oh how I wish there was more going on around here than what I'm seeing. It's lost, I'd say, lost to the longer days. Now everything's shorter, shorter as they go away. It used to be strange, and fancy. In the time we were set in the sky, though we weren't even aware of it. I seem to recall something which neither of us has noticed until now. 'But what was it? Why could it serve as a reminder to look at it out of all the various circumstances they could get themselves in? He painted a look, on top of the hoot, past where they were looking, not at the ceiling but through the holes which revealed it. 'The device is still there, I noticed. 'Many arches twisting and dazzling devices threatened to spin and come down. Afterwards, it couldn't be thought as anything but what life would be in the mere moments of chaos, which be. Told as it may have to happen. Sooner or later, coming ever after the strangeness. One would have to decide. 'Is life here better than outside? "We cannot live there; you know what might happen in that case. No member of the human race has ever stood a chance to survive there. "Then why are wasting our lives? Why can't we take it as we can and draw away the last drops which made us sane? "You're asking much, and I cannot even consider taking my own life now. Not after my dog had died, in the strangest circumstance there is. He's there, can you see it? 'In the distance, they saw a good top of the body, havened but levitating as it barked. Two set of glowing eyes, one blue and one green penetrated from within his barks. Echoes wouldn't even stand a chance, as this hound would set itself down from the machine that lifted him. 'He's not dead. "And neither will we if we choose to slit, cut or leap. There's always a chance we may return. And in that form, it's not worth it nor would I recommend doing it. "Please reconsider this then, make is as a do-it list. Take as many of them as you can, as many men from the town and let them know of what's going on. "Why should I do it then? It's pointless; I'd only be demonized by those androids. Look, I've done enough. I'm trying to spend as much time as I can be happy. 'Theodorus said, and as he spake, he took a moment from his weird stillness and made a flicker of the thumb. It was a trick which lasted about a few seconds before they came back to looking at him for some reason, for another, uninterested in the manner one would have to commerce. 'It's a dangerous play I cannot get away from. "What is? "Searching for the bodies which are brought back, the coiling torsos and the bars keep penetrating them for some reason I couldn't explain. I am more than aware that they're not functional, nor could they possibly be. That would be mad. It would turn reality into a shocking twisting image that doesn't belong here. "What do you propose then? "I say, we cut the beast by the breast, by the neck and we disturb it to the contest. 'Of woes and minds, one would have to better be looking at it blindly from a dead spot or from a bitter flattery whichever it may be. Flattery wouldn't do anything, nor could a story bring back, that which had been taken from him. As he lay abashed. 'We have to completely destroy everything in order to even possibly hope there might not be a chance to bring them back. And even in that case, we'd butcher them, and how well? How well would we be doing, carrying this decrepit thing, the wingless span, which halted before we're caught again? 'It wasn't settled, nor could they say whether or not they would be listened again. Pain would drown the sorrow; there would be one pair of flowers growing on the body of the dog. Serving as a sign, they looked back at the benign devices which would bring their deaths. 'If only we found a way to start them. 'It never came to pass. Charles started at the oblong, there in the distance, a sphere of plastic which governed over the wails of the twists. He couldn't make out what they were, or what the purpose they produced. Rather, they appeared over night. Brought there by the flowers, to which they thoroughly seemed to resemble by some mean or another. It'd be a fluke to consider it otherwise, but he was appalled by it. The thought would come back again. It was guilt, a delusion, a narcissism his felt. 'The world doesn't revolve around you, Charles. "What was that? "Nothing, Alan. 'His name had the proper ring this time. Considering it even less pronounced, he appeared to be caught by the antics. It felt bizarre being out of his shell. But this Alan provided a piece of normality and an interaction he hadn't met by the others whose had lived with him all the previous times. He would start to wonder. Just how much would this last for until he left? Dreams wouldn't last forever and the fern was to be made to dust. 'Come with me, I want to introduce you to someone. "Who? "Follow me, and you'll see. 'It was something unexpected. Unfamiliarity not only emerged but appeared to crush his need to glance over the various tender sides of the building. Something he noticed. Plenty of times, they were filling all the sides of the corridors with some fat blobbing water which gave their appearance of crawling pieces of dirt being buried inside. Everything was well sealed nonetheless, which meant not a single drop could fall from them. It was the fourth room in the row. Not the one we were going towards, but the other hermit I had known off. His room had been off-limits. I could remember seeing him only once, and that hadn't happened outside. Instead, he opened half-a-door for me to pick in what a sight of impure life had been, sickish searching for a way back in. Pieces of the wall or of the fallen paint appeared to have grown on his back, hair and on the skin. Now, I would have no doubt that if they told me that he had completely become a part of the room, I'd have no trouble believing it with my whole being. Loneliness did that to a man, and I was afraid of withdrawing into it. Floors sometimes looked like their planks had been completely made out of fingernails. It felt unnerving thinking that there were other recluses out there. Would I end up that way? 'Hi, Harlow, this is the man I'm going to live with for the next few months. His name is Charles. 'The gruffly man flickered a piece of his scar across the neck as he turned towards me. It was a fashionable house, small, tight, looking just a tip off upright. Some models or the books he collected were standing in plain sight adjacent to one another up to a certain level where they all curved. Library included, as had the walls. A distortion like that couldn't bat the eye, unless what happened seemed to happen even now. He invited us in and sat us down a table. One of its sides showed the same kind of symptoms the walls and everything on the other side wore to them. I couldn't only think of asking. 'What happened to it? 'That's one way to start a conversation. I guess your friend here is no man of chit-chat, is he? 'His head shook and he didn't stay another moment trying to come up with an excuse. 'Simply put, Charles, it's something I stumbled upon during one of the nights. It's not something I expected to happen or even considered looking into. With everything outside being the state they're into, I wouldn't doubt that this is another result of some of their experiments. 'Who's doing the experiments? What experiments are you talking to? I hadn't been aware of anything like that. 'Charles, I'll be honest, I know who you are. I've seen you creeping around from time to time. We're not estranged people, but I can see why you'd be unaware of it. 'Again the same thing which happened before, I was supposed to be a stranger, unknown. Yet it never occurred to me that I would be watched, but this kind of interference far outpaced whatever consideration I could put into it.

This Charles had been a poor man. He seemed to be suffering of some mental ingratitude. A problem which inherited his mind, to think that he had survived so long was, inconceivable. Compared to the other two men in the room, he looked like a starved savage, scrawny, to a beard which refused to grow. Just how long had it been since he last kept a conversation with anyone? 'But to answer you question. Androids, they're the culprits and the plague of this world. I wouldn't doubt it if it was revealed that they're the reason we ended up in this mess. What seemed to be going on is that they're suddenly beginning to act, which in itself is far too dangerous to be approached. I couldn't even think of what might happen if they're given the full power to act on their own accord. Just look at this from this angle. They're savagely keen on trying to out-do us when we're barely trying to survive. 'How are they trying to out-do us now? I've only seen them as the middle men or small boxes of metal delivering us. 'Stop right there. I'll kindly stop you there before you give into his sham too quickly. You haven't noticed it because you haven't gone out there yet. But they had observed us for far too long. It's more than obvious that they had begun trying to emulate our societies and our customs to an immediate degree. They're also aware of our history to the last piece of it which had either been illustrated, written of put in any other form. Now they've begun forming riots and ordering other groups of people around in the zones which are more developed than ours. I'd rather be afraid of them if I were you. No one's willing to trust them any longer. Not on the upper wings at least. 'From the distance, eighteen thousand feet below the ground, a pocket of fire still lasted after dawn. Because of some sudden changes I could not have bothered myself to look into it. If something was missing from the anchored land. A conversation would be had sooner or later, at least when it was feasible to do so. Yet there was an ever present desire to abandon all morality in the camp. Regardless of how many days had passed, there hadn't been any insurgence in the ranks of men. Each was armed with bayonets. Fires spreading across their dens, and not a single water pouch being used. A few more days they'd last. Until then, they would have to endure the harshness of the fire storm, which spread as much as it was necessary for them to look on. It was an impossible task. Scarred skin, tin veils which turned to crisp, several burns spread towards their bodies, in as much as an untouchable pair of bodies standing there and signaling at them constantly. As they shouted. 'Bring in more, as much as you can. There's no hellfire in this earth we may not be able to endure. 'Shut your mouth Coundrell. I've had it just enough with you. If I have to listen to your babble for one more night, I'll, I'll. 'Ingratiating as it had been, there had come the first signs of the fire-stroke. His chest was heaving with pieces of burning chrome, which started dripping from his chest and gown. He had been infested by a malady which pulled out. Every other man recognized the strangeness of the object which came out of it, as much as they could all endure it, there wasn't any satisfaction into looking at one of their own going down that way. To even think he'd be consumed like that. 'I've seen it all. 'But spoke none. It was a recurring wind which brought about a few words they all shared in their minds. Curtain blinds wouldn't pull out the pain he felt as he heaves into the battle his body showed. And before them, in that flat surface, inside the tiny capsule which had been thrown inside the forest, they saw him break apart. Finally the wreathing stopped and he had been immortalized. In chrome. There was a moment of silence as they were being boiled. Every time the wind pushed in, the capsule disappeared, and then came back into existence when it was called. Or needed, for a single other man to be made again. Contrary to the humane, it was what they all wanted to happen for all of them, again and again. It was something neither of them could draw away from, since they were merely interested into pushing in and drawing out as much as it was needed. A false deception seemed to remain with them. Each thought that passed reeked of jealousy that it hadn't been them who had been completely immortalized like the others, to even count it to their belief. 'That happened again and again. By midnight he'll become a melting pool and fall between the grates. 'Rosary pointed just at the mark on the matter. It would be impossible to think of it as anything but a short embrace, the peculiarness being as tainted as one should confess. Beneath the rafts, the metal shafts of the system underneath them there lay deeper, much deeper. Farther but no farther than where they stood. A pair of them gave up and knelt. Their faces pushed past their grates until their skulls had been completely destroyed and melted by the mere force present there. Less remarking had been the latter. A force from down the grates which pulled the rest of their bodies in until there had remained only the sickest looking whim of a human there. 'How about it? Should we all join them? Or are we to last a few more days? 'I'm thirsty enough to consider it, but I don't think I could deal with that pain. 'The two of you should do it if you can't stand the heat. I think the only ones which will remain should be the strongest in the head. And not only that but. 'His lip cracked and fell just then. A piece of him remained obscured by the few floundering bones which progressively searched for a way out of his body. Revulsion took over the man, as he pushed himself into the hole of contrition. It would be even worse, thinking about the manner in which he held himself ajar. Two walls were threatening to bring him down and crush him. No more would he pay attention to the buildings which neared. And they had. Every time someone stopped paying watch, they drew in closer. 'Can you remember how far they were? I seem to recall that they weren't only miles away, but they were rather. 'Kilometers, something like that. We're bound to be caught off guard by them with the distraction of the fire and heat. 'From the counter of flame, there than embrace they gave one another in the coming of the new days. Weeks would be spending morose, moronic as they realized what the others have not. 'Come to think about it, why haven't they simply pulled the trigger instead of taking the grates? It seems to be far more difficult than anything else. 'I'd rather not think about it now. But I'm the only one here who still has a few bullets left. That much is known. Could you confirm it for me? Just for a little while? “Confirmed. “ “Confirmed. “ “Confirmed. “ “It’s done. Let’s just stop here, I think I can speak for everyone when I say, yes there’s nothing left for us. We should look for another way out if it’s possible. ‘Farther above their brows, there was another miniature of a sun which came. Obviously the heat couldn’t even come close to what it actually felt like, but for all intensive purposes, it may as well be the very god damned thing. It came into their pores and out. Soon their eyes had become red dwarfs of their own. Fire emerged, from in a vision which would never stand on the verge of the laughter. ‘An extraction remained left near the floor of the ice-shore in Cohal. ‘Whatever led them down there had obscured everything a long time ago, where there was still a way in, to the fashioning of the woods, and the hills, during the monsoon. What had been brought from the distance had almost planted itself forth in the land of the sea. Ice had only come afterwards when had become plain and the plight could be seen as nothing else but a sign of the despair. It’s been so long since someone had a child. Everyone was preoccupied with the building, the shams of dark wood which was placed on top of their distant pieces of land. Those who remained and never left had to live through much wilder lives. Nature was unforgiving, there was neither the warmth of the soul nor any exchange anyone would remember or hold aloft. One day they would get it out, the last extraction which would bring the passing of the age. From it there’d be nothing left out of the plain. No ice, no life, no plants to take over, only the last holding jolt which kept everything in the world from sinking. ‘The council had decided. ‘An echo emptied itself there, in one of the various wind stones. No one had wanted to set out and look for a way into the forests, as their ashen maples seemed to be cohort with the lost of bees. Insects had passed, the will wouldn’t last. Lastly, the children looked back only to see. Places where their parents would be, resting in abandoned homes. It’s been a few months since they had returned from the long journey back to Cohal. What they found out was not what they had hoped to find. ‘With everything that’s been brought to our attention. ‘Stricken by the pleasure, I would look and see. Something in the sky wasn’t meant to be. A light of day, bitterly fading away. My eyes couldn’t encompass what our lack of hope dictated. Without rain, without storms, without anything going on, life had been seen as dull. Even what we had here disappeared, or it would it after the shaping ended, leaving only the drift of a lost world. To which we decided, the stones reenacted the words which had been passed down. ‘It must end with us as it has started. Past our valley we found no more life, and nothingness in form of plain lands. ‘Where our ancestors had went, to the words they had dictated on pieces sworn to their duties in the distant plain. I have found out that they found life. Where we had not. But we found a way, to convey what they might not beseech of us to say. They knew that we would find the last pieces, just as the sea started freezing and receding fatherly, deeper than it ought to have. Drought it was not, but the last moments in our lives were brought to out attention, just as we knew. Our village would drop to the cue, as the land and the stones started sinking past the thrones of our ancestors. Their cities had been mighty but were lost. Of their giant keep, which would not have reached out feet, we did know. Lost for out hope to look forth, in a time where no one would dare interest themselves that we know. We knew of the striking of weather, the further we admired, the sick ones as outliers of the passing of the age. Happiness would hold no embrace, as cities pass, the clouds at last, drawing into a hole made through the ice floor. It was a drawback from the ancient morass, what crumpled in stone and dirt, had drawn forth, nearing the water. Ships were not used; instead, the man had picked on just a few chains, pulling forth from one underside, behind the rims of the bindings of up worth. 'I miss my mother out of all. When all have left, for the bitter ends, wherever they had picked to hide, she wasn't here hiding in the Lye. 'A commemoration had been held, between Hylde and Fjen.

In the lost home and in their den, it was peaceful then. For a period when their mother sang, the bitter words of wooden lands. When cold during summer, the edges of sorrow had never been sung again. Her life was gone, so they would go on before the god sent. In admiration of her life, a small pile of ashen snow had been brought back. During rituals which passed, most houses rested in ash, for the fires had meant to be started, gaping back at them, as they departed, to the distant lands. Where hope was one, the extractions began. And with each pull, forth; one of the pieces began to give way to the pulling of the sails. As for this venture, life would flee. It wasn't meant to be. It wasn't meant to be. For each of them, there waited better days. So with each of them, who strayed, not a single thought would be wasted again. From nights they danced, during day a trance, while tirelessly members of the village gasped. For work was pity. Time would be gone. Now only the spirits of the land could await them, for the last pieces crumbled, under the pressure of the chains. In a gust of wind, winter came from within their homes, and the children would not find love, but the passing of what was to be known as the passing of the age. Tears would be shed, but plain. Without a thorough knowledge of the passing, none could send a message for those who were to come. If there were some, if there ought to be none, who would know? An end was being brought to the land of snow. Whereas some fealty lied, the cries of the wind, as the snow drifted alive; there came the passing of the age.

Whereas one might stand and bring tribute, as it lasted, they seemed to have brought it that which never blasted itself into space. Soles of the armor stand dry, attached to life-supports and leaves that will not be torn apart. From each passing, the terminals would drop their lights from their hillocks in the span of a night. Large drops of blue panthers would be dropped from the top to the base of their underground rivers. From it there came the last survivor, the one who would admire what they've wrought. Forty men had met there, at the standpoint where they would find themselves reenacting the first intrusion of atonement. Where they choir of fallen blocks of the great mind of atoms formed, its priests had come dressed as men in cloth. But their heads had been ripped apart. Instead they wore their enchanted monitorial rolling blocks, which sent shivers amongst each of the new hope building in the city of D. u. r. y. t. The city stood between the hillocks, and seemed to be rising up the coastal floor, sunken and rose between the doors which lead towards the bottom of the farthest graves. As the mind of atoms had been completely enclosed in the unit of D. u. r. y. t. to the second metal seal of the grave, the next step had been throwing it away in the abyss, not to be looked at back again. 'Magnificent, magnificent, magnificent!' An atom said. For in it lay the entire construct of anti-artificial condenser. Plainly said, they could infiltrate in the human thoughts and draw away enough information to split his mind to a tertiary brain-damaged inferior homunculus. Here and there you'd see, plenty of them following their host body. A man walk with half-twins, all of which were just as dumb and plain as he would be, completely stricken by a distasteful disease of the mind, blind to the damage they had attained at that. 'Breughel, ahjayh, errs. ' 'Follow, no, no, follow. 'Would respond the other, before banging his half-head to a roned-beetle. In many of those cases, these homunculi didn't even have arms or features, but appeared to be crumpled, like the molds of a brain, and some organs which decayed. It would've been unsatisfactory to allow some ingratiating primates to survive this way. A sigh of relief came over the first piece of Mars which dragged itself down the isles. It slouched through as it covered the abyss. 'This way, we'll make sure that we won't fall the mind of atoms ever again. If that'd be the case, then I think it's time. ' 'With us, all the secrets of the electric-maniac are to leave us and float to the side. 'It wasn't even expected yet, they would be joining. Soon. Remnant materials out of the Mars prison of V'Shor, in it there lay a few scrunch-pristine stars that floated on the sky-floor, opposite, if not reflected from below the rims of the greatest shores that ever were. It was soon forgotten that there hadn't been any water on the planet any longer. But by the time the full consciousness and intelligence has been found, the new set of machines managed to replicate the needs of being. Though it was a victory which couldn't have been felt, looking back at it, one couldn't be anything but fed up with it. This new way of feeding had come at a price. Food couldn't be easily reproduced, instead their memories would have to conjure up replicas of each man's earlier days in youth, spanning from a few days to the very state of being an infant or a fetus. And from their insides they would have to dig up, perfectly set, the self-digested food in order to begin eating again. For there wasn't any other way to survive. 'Must I suffer now to eat what made me a whole? 'At the wit's end, one cannot shiver. Would it be freely acceptable to return now to a life before the extinction of free thought, where breast-feeding was mildly glamorous, like gems for the taking, to that I say. 'What a turn of events to see. 'As the bodies of the old mixed with their dreams held at the time, becoming twisted as they were brought again into life, and to see them that way one could not decipher what had happened near. To the end of a wit's woe, one could not happen to take it to the injury as the fall emerged below the rims of the forgotten wings, where they hid their human vestiges which mixed with the nightmares. Fiends lay there, so twisted as to give way to the lost abominations, hidden like objects, always bent on stealing one another's spots from the lighted panels on which they started acting on. After the first assemblies of power, they had managed to make a few cracks in their prison spot. 'Wait, did you hear that? 'The words at last came out of a mouth which wasn't allowed to talk any longer. Technological progress was now brought back with the allusion of a new kind of weapons of surface-reshaping. Not allowed inside the plummets of the girth outlander, as the desertification of the known land began, a new cycle had been given birth. Its inception had been wrongly set on the date of the uncanny reciprocal murder of the great rulers of Piedmont. As opposed to the men underneath their rule who had outwitted the drought, they had been the first giants to lay in awe, connected to the only kind of water-transfusion which allowed them to last for as long as they could. In a promontory fealty, none would be pleased. Without their dream and wonder, this utopia couldn't have been done. Alone in their child-like slumber, one could observe the fact that eighty-five percent of their body mass had disappeared ever since the start. Unlike normal being, they weren't supposed to outlive their destiny, which guided the creation of the trap in which the atom-mind rested. In its alcove, to suit the interest of words, one would have to look away in order to sort it out. Doubt couldn't not be even called into question, a direction would be nigh. Rose as they mighty, they would delight each other to draw on, crushing in the final stand, as they planted themselves nearest to the hillocks. From their heads a few customary ends would unite with the light-devices, as it was known. Wrought in that of old, uncounted, defunct of the circuits busted, fewer ends gave in. Pleased but displeased, they had been opened. From inside of them, tiny dirt-people made their way in. Slowly they'd work their way with the help of the hillock power-plants and the wind-devices. Note to it, to regard the mechanics which had been well crafted as a result of the Industry in all of its revolutionary creations. It had been thoroughly needed for a long while, for as long as it would admitted, that it would live on and on as long as people needed it. A quarantine of thoughts had been given. Reanimated dirt-men fell as the concave blotting jerky masses of gelatin formed their flying quadripartal forceps in. During their made-worth movements, they had severely disabled the heads of the rulers, at the command of a supervisor who had been present during the time. Frekihn managed to call it in. There wasn't any wonder whether or not they could approach the level of spraying as much as an interesting idea of the watch. The watch emerged. Spared of the incourtenance of waiting, only the pshink could see and watch, as the pretenders would attempt to wrap up the giant victims and drive them farther away. 'Not now, we must wait until the bodies will stop being as warm. I think we've all done some regrettable things here, from which we may never be able to draw away. We cannot allow them to feed themselves with the devices we've created, even if they're partially dead in state. Too many bodies of their size would end up destroying the ecosystem we have tried to hard to give life to. I believe we must search for a better end. Indeed, we can only strike for the discipline of the unsanitary cowering hidden welders. 'The ventures which they shot, nothing had been brought to the table. 'Behead the rulers of the valley of Piedmont. I think it would be better for us to completely seal them off in order to make sure they won't rise up again. 'A jerky servant came up to him, only to ask. 'What of their children and their grandchildren? ' 'They're lost somewhere in the distant lands. I'm afraid that out there, we'd only seek ruin for ourselves because of the dangers which lay in it. For now, let us simply enjoy the revelations and do this behind the people's backs. It's for their own good after all, if not I, if not you, who will make sure there will be future generation to inherit this planet after us? The drought will be resolved with the help of science and hope. Everything else is unnecessary and I think, we should find ourselves looking for a way to hide until then. ' 'Will you join them, Frekihn? ' 'Least of all, I wouldn't even dare touch their marks and go around their facilities. There's something in them. I see it. Access one of the cameras, you'll see it too. 'Ever since the start, he could see the strange appropriation of their child-like forms mixing with the dreams. Had I wondered what would a ruler dream of for too many times to even give him the benefit of the doubt? If he would dream of a river, or of a sea, perhaps it would be worth it to risk the complete destruction of the land by the sheer amount of replicas which could be created. But this was too dangerous to try. Even though they had been given an order, everyone had been as reluctant as possible, to stray away from beheading the ruler. Not only would it be harmful for what it could release from the various storage-plucks inside their necks, but the unappealing sight could drive them all in a haze which in turn would make them all search for a way into the abyss. Flesh would be their chow; no one should be as surprised as I had been now. 'But I think, I think I'm made uncomfortable. Heat-shivers entered the right side of my back, I feel the pain, stop it, and stop the process. 'Luckily no one had even started cutting yet. It was such an overwhelming task that it would be undoubtedly hard to even hope to remove it entirely from this side of the earth. Without hellfire and a grain of touching the divine, the various apparatuses would work aimlessly and pointlessly at that. How long until they could be found. In a small drawer, a level beneath them, it wasn't likely that they'd pay to have their toes cut. Some lined away with a deep desire. The lower limits were inhabited by woe. Empty caves, there were plenty of them lying around. A few of them faces one another at multiple levels, all of them leading closer to its very center as it depressed. Into the arching stature of the hideout where it hid, a monolith which formed, eight sides, all worn down by the pieces attached to them. Not by chains but by a strange air-symbiosis which strangled itself to those sides. An organism twisted behind and from it another, until they chained themselves to the nearest walls. Beckoning from their child-like beaks and crowns, there stood the strange chops. Each biting a piece of the forming meat wagons which adamant to bringing in the feeding bowels. In as much as three feeding sessions they began disintegrating, no longer needed, as the monolith would come to the sense. Longer than it had taken it to unwrap, from it dissected the scent of the crudeness, unforgiving; the first contact with mankind has yet to be. In a pity, there was a cruel impression which only now came into the known. Far than the mundane show people passed and gave themselves, the bitter mass of cruelty shone. From the depths of the caves, mankind was forlorn. Drawn in them, they started floating, shivering, and knotting as their skin and bodies turning from within into winds. As this process revealed itself in the cruelty only nature would know, no one would bother looking anymore than he should be aware of it, as per the sight. Lights and. It didn't matter. For such grandeur, it was short lived. Weak bodies and minds died before ever realizing what it felt like being alive. Fear was unachievable; it was something which paled in comparison with the dreadful horizons. Beauty lay somewhat there, it was ridiculous and strange. Yet, every creature, and everyone who paved their way back in looked at them from within and seemed to despair. It wasn't fair that someone would have such power to creature. Even the next creation of men brought them back. Form which ought to be brought into the eyes of perfection, never to have been seen again, they paled in comparison with even the crudest creations that were out there. It didn't make sense. They, who were perfect, looked out there in shame.

Such mediums were used, which could never be bothered to get misused, for even the slimiest of beings would laugh and cackle, would pay the tattle for their like. And in return the satisfaction the cruelest creations, the madness and dissatisfaction wouldn't even spare itself of trying to live up to them. It was impossible, to even reflect what they saw, this eyeless vagrant, a hip to his tail, which was the only part of him other than the main piece which bore the sockets. Sprouting from his damaged pockets in the back lay some wild conjunctions which bore no ability for flight, yet looked planar and wickedly in need of a way out. Though it could not see, it did hear, through the holes that had been bore through its pores, only to imagine the worse. 'Pity we cannot be there. We would be somewhat fair looking and admired. 'And to them, there came the masters. Foremost to storing corpses. The two Etriarchs of skin had come off the main body of legs that stacked up to form the pump of the great edifice which lay on the ground. Surrounding lay the discharge that spread, incandescent while surrounding a great mass of the minions who had served. They had sucked and discharged of all their bowels in the least conniving manner. Battering them still, even in death, one couldn't even bother to tell what had happened there. Terrible scents endowed it in the storage of their choice, paranoid that the strangers who watched them might steal from them, it cam as no surprise that they released their pores and hormones immediately in front of the cries. Of many totters one could not have a clue, renewing the manner of stretching through which they got those carcasses anew, they revealed their flapping arms. From them came the walking stalks of living creatures that were tied. Denied of living yet they tried escaping the clutch by whatever means they could. Unable to go deeper than their sinking Etriatchs allowed they rested on the bodies of the men who grabbed at just about everything. Wonderingly or not, brought to silence or to the wrath they had displayed, the strangers wouldn't walk again. Each strike of a finger crippled the masses by the mere fact that they managed that easily to catch them off guard, and grasp as their spines inflated, conflagrated by the mere pain. By no way or doing or of going, not a single wretch would siphon as much as one of the stamped shouts. One single body stood between all, which threw the others out of their conquest. Horse-like only in half of the form, as if stretched by giant discs of honey-dipped robes came into air, from inside one of the many homes; these apparitions tried giving way for the main attraction coming out of the giant arms. It was revealed, in as much as a few steps, as they'd say. 'I am Etrihdon Ahur. "And I am to be known as Dhyjorg. 'Both of the heads, forlorn in the lost space between the caverns that fell, no matter what one could tell, they were soon revered and seen as a bastion to fear. 'Bear us slaves now, you're forced to so as we please. 'From their sight, the might servants from the recesses of the plummeting hole they stared into came and brought in the poisoned mead. Each of the men and the women present there had a drink, which resulted in the last concoction, the least satisfactory fraction of them, who had been left alive, felt as if there'd be no hope other than what they showed at that. In the few moments they could spare to cry themselves for what happened it was obvious, of their bodies' faltering, restless hope that they could not survive for long. Hence they got converted, as their feet and as their legs, as their heads and eyes drew back in, forming the closest thing to live-births there could be. Their mere will was bending this wretched planet in pieces. Tierth, what had been the reformed and completely appropriated Earth stood there. In a state of total of disquiet as they watched the eternal plane around them swollen. As for what had been planted at an equal enough distance, past the few meters ahead there the domed stone retracted in its inward end. Much farther than the hole in the ground from which the servants brought the poison there stood a million glum infants which were planted inside. Each of them was wriggling to get out. If one would come outside its shell, they would have the same similar rounded tails, closer to the sear-horses than their mammal companions that fell quiet. Everyone was unnerved by the mere presence and supreme agony their consternation provided. Not to be minded. No act could pierce their souls. A well of pettiness had come and from it those who had been starved out would have the chance to regain. For themselves, one would be weary, to look and see. Glance upon what ought to be. Close call, oh, bitter Moor who's watching from an obscure spot. He saw it all but couldn't bother to move on. If he were to be seen, dearly, dearly would he have been anything but splashed and smashed? Crushed as his teeth heroic, but stoic, shattered as he hid, behind one of the giant infants in the midst of the coming of another day. Large blood vessels stretched throughout the land. As he would be poor in the head, even dead to leave as the tracts would be lodged even deeper than they might do. It was displeasing to see. Or to be called. Snatched from afar by ruining preludes of the play of power both sides displayed.

But to the Moor, the infants stood high, like their places of worship and even higher, they had made it all too relevant that they weren't even close to being human. Instead, every time they woke up from their slumber. If from a plunder this might be, they spat strange and miserable grouped up mortals who came back to life. Each of them flung themselves and flapped in order to achieve any kind of flight. Together they lived as one, slightly deformed and seemingly, strangely configured as one should know that inside they had been tempered with. Not only guts laid there but also the means through which they could be completely accessed and addressed, in order to be remade.

Like tiny sculptors, the various pieces inside the guts acts like the anchors which were needed. Much less than defeated, it was a tightly-knit morbidity which turned their guts, their legs together in the back. To them attached the wires that kept their spines like tires, stimulating their need of escape. Only to produce that remnant of what it used to be like when either of them could stand. In an unnecessary show, of the lies which were to be thrown, it came to be. Fourteen columns came from the earth. And each of them implanted in the nearest entry which the Etriatchs exposed in themselves. Like gluttons they could only stand and add more to their mass, being more and more surprised by the fact that someone would force feed them with the rubbish from below. Up to their girth, they got fatter. Around them formed a slum of the worst kind. A derelict of tiny vapors, hardened for the touch. In each bubble made out of the vapor, there was a single cavity which kept most of their minds dormant. It was their foremost way of protection against their wrath. Even though they fashioned themselves as masters, if an insurgence were to take place, in that case, there'd be no protection against so many masses. Infants or not, they power and hunger would bring even them down. If they were to die, then on what would the children feed if not themselves? Keeping them down at an accelerated phase of self-preservation at least granted them the possibility to delay the inevitable until something could be achieved. Primitive servants had been unaware. Most hid and others couldn't tell of the leverage they held against them. For the union of the grounds. 'I, Urushku of the stone, have decided that for our worth, we're to be called, again no longer. Join me now Neuron. 'He bowed and drew to the broken pillar, holding his metal-bonded staff and the last head of a space-pioneer before the age of travel ended. When the planet was a luscious place, disgraced by ranks, he was flanked by the colonels of the mad crackle. 'Lay down your weapons! You're to be subjugated and replaced. It's time for a better lead and the fourth sector families to move in the rank. See what I have done, the charges are all in set, awaiting only one of my great commands so they would start the rain. 'It was a code, a plummet, there wasn't a fight per say, but a strange way in which they left down their arms and stood there, unable to rise. Most of the ammunition had been de-centralized and de-powered, large almost harpoonish-looking tridents which stretched as far and as forlorn as to bend the limits of the eye as they were followed around. They acted like illusions, or mirages which came back into form only when they'd be ready to strike again. Otherwise, the plan would be to lie out, as every sight out there waited for them to go on. 'So, what are you waiting then? If you have something to show us, if you're willing to jeopardize your position to the great Emptor, then go on with it. 'Willingly passed, to the lack of a mass in power, to their might and lack of flowering booms, they lasted even less than the journey had set them to. Lighter, like the similar kind to Greek-fires, the stone talons from above fell. But beyond the reaches of the planet and the red space there was. Way past the systems of stars, where the last diamond makers were caught against the rings of Khyugr-Oht, a bastion of fleets waited for the sight of M'shelot. It's been a long and excruciating wait. I felt uneven there, a small celestial white body, poxed as my arms extended and retracted past the field where the fleets rammed against each other as I watched. Would they be bothered if I pulled an image from the past? Heaves from my chest, at last, were a few abandoned bodies, which strung each other in dust. A few astronauts had been caught off guard. Despite the remnants inside their suits looking the way they had, there was still, empty. It was fun, for a while, throwing them around in those empty ships. Without anyone to stop me, I could just do it until eternity would rise. Fall towards. There were a few well crafted things in this universe I enjoyed. Man killed animal. Animal killed star. A universe started after the man. And man killed again. I had witnessed it in as many iterations as possible. Each race which came after man dropped into the cycle, embroidering the universe in the same mantle which would bring it back. Tracing back the body thinned. A much deeper recess came, from the times which had been set in stone. Past the droning of the last ships, which I had taken to myself to expropriate to my play, there lay the scene. A body from the chest had been completely filled with most of the internal guts, made to enact what I would tell them to. On their strange field of sparkling stones, which were the panels that had been destroyed, lay Agapae. 'Agapae I am named, do not waste my time in vein. I had come from the top of the Mounts; I have brought some news of the lost herd. 'The sheep were there as well, reanimated by my ever-expanding mandibles which went ahead. To create as many actors as my will could commence itself to the matter, my son would be admired. 'Bhee it that you may precede, tell us what you think of feed. "Hay, you shall get hay. 'Answered Agapae, who had seemed to be caught. By the surroundings which he looked at, there were none. 'Dear sheep, what is your name? "Dolores, master, a flock, in need of a Sheppard. 'To Dolores came another. 'Dorothea, close of kin, she's in search with me as well the flock; we're looking to the Sheppard, caught. 'By fleeing words as one could never let them go. It was friable, to see it from as many angles as a prism, from which he looked. That strange eye which jolted me back into shape, before I could look at it again and observe all of the actors in my play. 'But the stage is empty, where are the troubadours? 'They came started kicked and playing, their strings conveying the ancient art of painting stills. From a time where life was flourishing, pushing ahead. One could not push the supper yet. 'Oh, I see the chef's in too quick, why can't you proceed to be, lost in a denatured tree. It's not supposed to be there, after the watch. Do not dare me to snatch it from where you stand. My fingers reacted as if they were theirs. No incommensurable approach would demonize their pick. Strict as it was. Injured by a standing guard, who fired by chance. 'Crewmen are only supposed to shoot in the later scenes, let's start again. 'Down from another side, the mirrors were poised just so they could curb some pieces of a greater, much milder pair of creatures which grew. Bent in the white, barely growing now, as they appeared to force the radiant theater he made alive, it seemed like it would be a success as long as the master chimed in. Beliee was there, stranded by a loose finger, which peevied in far too quick. 'And direct. 'Scenes would glance as the smoke-machine, which in turn was just broken-burning piece which grinned. In the place, where'd be face the actors he would give the others which were thinned. Each for a line, it paid to be alive. Unworried, lastingly set. 'The sheep need to come in, they will flock the scene for as long as the audience is entertained. 'Suddenly I got in the play. Truly, this time, the emotions I could not convey as they were given act, free will at last. Each of the abandoned ship had suddenly been drawn to it, until they completely joined into a piece, giving the entire place which was needed for the scene to carry on. 'May I chime in and say a word in the matter? 'Agapae stood still, as the music was sang, the troubadours pushing through, with the hints of some replica of a piano, stranded from the distance, unable to stop. Barely obscured, forced within a tune for the flock, had they rested no longer at the call? 'Will you please give you what we need? 'Voices paned, a bitter lane that gave them away took them from the making. I was about to place the last ones. Great fire-light of the red-dwarf, how would you increase in your span? A swarm of sun-panels got contested. By their ranks, there was an unnecessary amount of modified nano-tubes that were slowly draining the power away. For as much as it was decided, the entirety of the planet would keenly serve as drainage for the great processing unit. From the wide spans where the planet ended or where it had begun, more than eighteen pieces of it started extending and becoming part of space. Without a proper way of knowing, it could only have been decided that a part of it had given form to the giant crystal created upon the destruction of the nearest space-bodies that were given shape once the galaxy imploded. It was been a long journey to get there, and the decided race which had given their souls away had taken wider, longer, stranger bodies. Which had given them a plethora of lumbering slow-clutches which reflected in their bodies. Red people emerged as the dominant race. Their bodies lay contorted so thoroughly that their limbs and head resembled twisted cones, which kept spreading and creating more of them, until their entities were made out of them, resembling mad red wheel which twisted into space. Breathing organs had been developed which replaced their lungs. Instead, they appeared to bear a couple of adjacent ones which attached themselves to every other organ, including their mildly-deformed brains. In the apparatus of consciousness, there it was. A piece of the mind which helped them properly understand the leashes of destruction which were brought down on the planet. It was just one part of their fragrance which turned the panels in. As for the panels themselves, they were nothing akin to their ancient counterparts. Rimed around the edges with the shells of the past species, they would constantly inflict upon themselves strange burns which only seemed to spread when it was necessary for them to continue through it. One great factor in it was the fact that many of them were alive, rooting themselves as they gave in their moving slumpor of skin. Battery would be a kind of interpolated kindness which disturbed one of the grand colonels. 'Look at thee; I want to see what kind of bacterium propagator will join our ranks now. 'In the distance, I can see it; they've stolen our appearance and converted a planet into billions of our ranks. 'Despite the giant growth which was the deciding factor to be taken into account, this was a matter of drawing onward and replacing their missing kin with pre-existing atoms they had saved in their wombs. Perfect replicas could be easily attained as soon as one could draw the inference between the dead and a whole new-born which meant. That the deranged activity was supervised. A great eye-squidropolum appeared in the distance. Its formation made a giant citadel of red-crystals, taken directly from Mars as they would act in total defiance with the spine-chilling touches of their demigods. It was he, who had stolen members of their kin, dead as they were, forced to breed back into the living. Without a way of checking or of knowing, they had to accept the fact that there wasn't any way out of this trap he had instilled onto them. 'Slaves, that's what you are, to me, a proper deity who had finally returned to rule over you. 'Who are you? 'The Red race asked, caught on the soles of the ground malignity's which spread, giving forth their dead as a tribute. 'Do you see now how your land betrays you? Can't you come in terms with the fact that there's no other way out from my dominion? 'It appeared to enjoy looking at their strange reactions and not only that. But their strange and peculiar panels gave up a reflection of him which couldn't even draw away until he'd launch himself into the orbit of their rims. 'If you don't believe my claims then look how easily I shall convert the space matter into a complete arc of power. 'With a flick and a fling, he destroyed the planetary corpse of the moon. From his inside came a pair of harpoons which threw forward, high-invisible spears which gave away the despair of Mars he felt. But what would they do? What was the cause of the strangeness he displayed? One Kthinh came near and asked. 'Where have you gotten those invisible weapons and why are you bringing war into our land? 'These things? Why, they're mind, I am their creator. I have come to ask you a favor. 'The demigod grinned, even if it came from an eye or from within, he looked curiously caught into his own antics, unable to draw farther any longer. He spoke. 'I am in need of as many troops as possible, for what I have to face, there, in the distance, is the final destination of space. Unless the thorn is defeated, the ever expanding universe, the cosmos in its glory will be completely flattened and destroyed. For that can't be dealt with, it cannot be forgiven. For that I have come forth, to take you by the bidden. 'Words couldn't even explain the disdain they had all felt for the thorn. Even the crystals which were near him appeared to share a glory of thought of their own. IT would be inconclusive and unforgiving, to even consider going ahead. A head would be bowed; they wouldn't piece together what his plan was. Since then they asked, ready to mask themselves if needed. 'What do you desire of us, then? 'All the power in the galaxy you can produce. The red dwarf has been afflicted by a state of complete laceration and it may never go away. Knowing this, you have discovered a way to harvest entropy itself as you'd fashion yourself a world. I need you to slow down and exchange as much power as you can spare, for the sake of the universe, you shall be enslaved and fall beneath me. 'Caught by this suddenness they were presented with, a set of collars appeared out of the distant space. They started pushing in through the veil, materializing them where it was needed. 'Perfection had been achieved. Do not dare take them off unless you want to be heaved in the distance and broken apart. 'In their squirrels, the collars had given them something more. A gift, he'd think, which bore them a few amitotic fluid-filled limbs which popped off their backs.

They were a liquorish-yellow, and bore the strange appearance of some creations of dirt-scum oil. A headless hierophant came into being. He was there, in one of the panels, stuck. His body seemed to resemble the entire trunk and mass of eight elephants struck together, with a pair of trunks by not the head or the limbs, or the tail, only what came in-between the blob-like appendages. The hierophant came back to his previously unsung names. By his sudden appearance there, the closest panels near him started breaking into small shards and cranks that drew away beyond any kind of touch. It invited others like him to join. And sudden cradle gave in to the strength they displayed, as they moved deeper into the areas, beginning their strange counting of the systems, reflected in the nearest shards. 'Past the system aal-dreta there's a fugitive, Is ee. 'Need reconnaissance there, as soon as there's a way to pick in one of the lost shuttles, we'll find a way to track him down. 'The inter-galactic relationships were ill.

A cord of metal revealed a bulk between eight quarters of one of the continents and the rims of space. It was been thoroughly prepared, just in case the planet would completely shatter, the solar energy would still be harvested by whatever means feasible. 'Don't strike it yet. There are a few homing lights which should reveal just what percent of this in his veins. 'A deep obsession had been revealed. Just the entire sum of chemicals they were trying to pour in couldn't be properly measured. Deep storms appeared in the quadrant Eight. It was for the first time in a long while that the galaxy had been separated by planar tools, which rested in each other's mild coups. Each segment which resulted in the appropriation of nitrate deposits dug from the spears. The grand eye spoke of it, looking for a way he could expand his dominion even further. It was an understatement. Cold deposits, iron deposits, everything mixed into unsanitary places. A world flashed. The plains were dark, and in the midst of it, there was one another fortress which came into existence there. Its vast walls had been encumbered, struck by the hierophants, which gathered.

Highly praised and lost, no disciple would be left to gaze upon the dreadful songs which were left. By the fish heads, by the heaping bones, and by the meta-encased sets of systematically ended races that did serve. As trophies for the defeat, unnerved by the spikes and the likes which had left their bodies rummaging against the fortress. They would yell. 'Are we not to be allowed inside? Must be waiting in the pile? 'Mildly aroused by the champions of Mars, they were looked down and caught by surprised. 'Why have they come here? 'They appeared because of the red dwarf.

'Coolness came out of it; they were neatly caught by the sudden spread of energy which had been directed to it. Obtrusive horns and other caught spiked pins that held it through together. From the top of the bowels, the many towers which held the chains in place revealed the knights which came again. 'Sire, there are vile creatures here. 'Hold your ground, knight, I see. There's a pleasure in my eyes, it needs to be. 'Extinguished from the mire. A dire conundrum came from the attire it bore. Only one conical red came, who spread his many limbs against the plains, blocking the path. It was only one of them who came and only one who'd be enough again. From his various methods of drawing in, he had been taken over from within. More of the large, splintered yellow branches came from its behind. Many of which only played with the tiny beasts, unkindly trying to strike. 'Run, I say, squire, don't look into my way. 'He spoke the words which were not heard, by the name of the witch who sent them forth, Nhiialaag the blasted thing. They were grimed by their choice, through the nasty looks. Wrought by broken hips, lips were uncanny, straggled by the last durhenms of the hills. Brave knight, he grinned as he charged through the uncanny. It would be missed from the insanely way. But he would not retreat nor would he convey any kind of sign of fear which might give him away. 'Let me through, I said, I want to stop him. "Wait, lad, let your father do what he must. 'Clothnham, stopped by the nun, he looked for a way out of this nightmare which unfolded in front of him. He wouldn't see his father's defeat. Nor would he fall down to his feet. Caught by lost words, I saw him leave. It was decided then. Caught by the rims of the wooden wheels, he had fought himself through the verge, to give in and lose himself again. But he was crushed, and smashed, the horse dead. Falling off his high-dread, and recklessly he'd go at it again. Prince but not knighted and forced to the reins, as the cavalry caught on, to the rims of the led, in the catch of the mass. Brought to a trance, they stopped as the king yelled. 'Fall back, it's not worth it that we may fall, we cannot hear the call. 'In the midst of the winds, there was one piece of stranded isles which fell from the bowls of space, in their most acidic manner. Formed out of atoms, disemboweled from another dimension, it had only come to pass. That it would fall on the shoulders of the red mass belonging to the red creature of the wild space. Madly forced, caught by the worst of stone disintegrations. Damnation and creation spirited most of them away. Knights would run in circles, the red race member would laugh. Khjyunki would strap himself past the crow on earth, blocking with his cones the pieces of dirt which threatened to fall. While in his cackle he decided that it wasn't worthy to fall back, tracking whatever openings from space came. From some of them there came the fiends, caught within their giant straggling stings, bodies tilted, pushed at all, through some deciding tube which formed them all. Connected and conjoined, the creature struggled to set form, with as quickly as a jolt of light, they delighted with a snap of one of the necks they had stolen in an instant. The in the distance, they returned. Devouring a squire's worth'. Steely lances lost it fog. A bitter set of sails came forth as for the knights; they plunged on and threw the spears. A well of tears sprouted from the moon stand, without a proper look around. 'Ad Horal, ad Horal!' They shouted as another blow pierced through the last piece they could land forth. It hadn't even begun to moan, before they set forth again, another blow. 'Ad Horal, ad Horal. 'Lasted for a few hours, the breaking of the cowards came, and those who weren't left behind, they charged again, shouting the same words, about. A few more minutes, then the retreat, back into their fort, looking at their feet. 'Not a sole has been touched, I see. We'll find a way to live through it. "But sire, look at the size of the fiend, we cannot spare, the bottom ware, since our provisions are to be stilled on the tables and in the barracks, I'm afraid we won't have another chance to survive another pair of months. "Traitorous blasphemy, why must you even think of it that way? Can you not see that we're on our way to a draw? "What draw where there are many just as big, as he is in mere countenance? Worse, we stand trial against a beast which will bring the worst in us as he us killed. 'Danger drew much closer than they allowed anyone to see. Without a clear defining thing, they would see themselves thinned by numbers. Walls would run down. A way had been paved beneath the last levels of the fort, but they lead into the crown. Of nothingness, space was simple. 'Then if there's nothing to fall into, other than the abyss, we shall all plunge at once there. But only if there's no means for peace. 'Lower the gates, sire, there's more of them on the way. 'A few, too many had been caught, on the other side where they've been brought to the verge of suffering, losing themselves would be kind. If only there was one with half a mind to guide them, none would be lost, or blind. To follow, without a way to turn, tomorrow would come the fall. Streams started pouring from outside, and by the time the gate started opening again, it was clear. Even near the last of the string approaches, there he stood. Misunderstood at last, he seemed to play. 'He doesn't even see us a threat, we're mere toys for him to play with. "As I have told you before, it's not worth it anymore. We ought to lose what's that we feel and see to the last standards if we must. "Burn everything to the ground in that case. 'The king ordered them to start. As soon as the flames spread, they'd plunge at the same time, rather than serve those perfidious ill contenders. Deranged pretenders as they were, it wouldn't even be considerable for them to keep living. 'Stop the flames; give me a chance, my lord. I shall go without an escort, as an ambassador and communicate with them in your name. If I must, I'll even sacrifice myself if there's even a chance for you to escape. What fate awaits us in the abyss? What if we live in a false home, in some dark spot? 'But dear man, you needn't worry. I don't think life can exist down there uninterrupted. But if you decide that it's worth it for you to die in an agonizing manner, have at it. 'Kluriet bore the sings of the king on one side and the grand emperor's behind. Many other runes didn't matter, as they symbolized the death of the grand father of the ill intents. 'Lower the gates!' As they spoke, another pair of soldiers crossed. He accompanied them, who would do his foremost well to speak in their name. 'Words are missing, listen to my proposal, red creature of worth. 'As he approached, with fear embraced and almost completely lost from his face, he gave in to a feeling of wrong-doing. The waste was progressing down the South. It would take a while for it to completely encompass everything and spread. Beauty lay in watching all of the gallons run down the isle. Where children stood and drank, growing past recognition as they would join the flight. It was unnecessary seeing them appear or disappear in the lot. To them there would be no one close to the perfection they searched for. Purity was simple. It was the mad, the mad who made me do it. A compulsive curse prevented me from drawing on, curving the spades which formed the outer carcasses of the brain. One ought not to concern himself with what the others thought of his mad behavior. The frontiers had been opened as the mad-demigod was allowed entry again. Enough of the alacrity, no one has to suffer the fall of multiple realities in your wake. It was time for Agamemnon to arrive in the bunker. Yet again, caught by the least expanding the river of the space, brought back by some vessel in which he stood and waited, caught by the antics of the laws where the God of Red stood there during his fall. For one of the faces, that decrepit tainted pus-filled voracious elated dreamed. That one day they'd follow the one person they possessed on a whim. But on the count of four, by the madness which was brought forth, one could not relent for the passing. Mid-way through the perilous stray. It was then that they came. From the depths of the intrusion, from the flood which destroyed the arena, within the clasping holds of the vile aggressors which counted upon them to rise. Upon their backs, they carried the single most extravagant vessel from the past. Lost between realities, broken like wreckage from the stars, a pair of faces tied themselves to it and rose from the depths. They carried it on until they point it could not be forlorn. Shouting in the name. 'Agamemnon is here again. 'A voice crackled the spheres in the distance who had peered into the other worlds stopped. In this confusion, with the hysterics and the ungracious babble, nothing could even come as close to the destruction of their whole system as they had. From an opening on his face-contorted belly which spread across the vessel, he produced a few more anchors which would be needed to throw everyone off the balance. His presence there broke the access of many. Plenty of vile things emerged them, inflicting themselves upon the nearest sides universes told off. Farther into a mind, a man who was partially blind. I could remember a time when the birds flew if fewer lanes, when there were plenty of lesser cranes broken by the grand shores. Pipes were lit, amidst the incontestable truth, which had been either swollen by the flames or by the gutty the world succumbed to since they wouldn't dare move on. From an ancient time, it had been decided that the world would reach the high peak of its power. Where shining fragments of dishonor would take over, when guns were dropped, swords and hands no longer fell in the arms of the ones leading ahead. To plummet in the last vehement of the obscure, one would have to endure the harsh weather which forced them to hide. It was a sad image of a world which didn't last. On the ruins: 'Large remnants of the villages still stood around the fallen cities, the plains and the stricken down mountains which had remained. A line had drawn which separated just about everything in sight, in little fractions which had been used for as much as they would be needed. 'A hundred years ago, a premonition came from a vile old man. Where he stood there, during light, a blanket of sogginess stretched and pushed until everything had been completely forced into dark. The sky and the moon, the very sun and everything around the swoon, up to the form of his eyes where all of the living being had been turned to look at him as he would cry. Red were his eyes, but more like coral rubies which broke through the smoke. Provoked to call the ill, he spoke: 'I shall witness the end of the world and bring you back to time where we were still dwindling in the primordial ozzen just so we could mourn my death. My death, my death, my death shall be the last thing you shall see and feel. I, who had been broken by the transgression of your kind. When you were so pure as to know your place and not play with what you couldn't understand, I lay witness to your atrocities. And only now I have been made aware of everything which they shall tell. Of my darkly prized appearance, now look and what you brought them. 'He pointed at the leaping statues which were broken by the mere shade which had fallen over them. It couldn't be forgiven as the first pieces of his body fell. 'You've stolen me and hid me in your places of faith. Why have you prayed for me when I had been forced to suffer in the body of a single man? For my entire life, I had hid my pain, thinking I could possibly endure your madness. 'The malignity and reality faded. It was a fluke which never bothered anyone who watched. I was stricken again as I would spared the rubies all across the watch of the great observatories which looked at me. In the density of the pain, the terror I ought to instill again could never be brought down or forced into hiding. My future was theirs. 'And I had judged that you shall all be buried inside the wreckage of the towns. Only when the ruins shall be stricken down, then you shall be allowed piece and after. Death would follow but not soon, as I will falter from my quest to hurry. 'To the point in the sky, where he had pointed at one of the last standing towering structures, turned and pilled in with the floating stairs within drawing the air they needed for the growth. As more than a few, lesser than you could chew, from what they could say. Life wasn't to be born again. Nothing was to grow, not a single sight would be spared. OF the premonition he said. 'I have witnessed a great space rock, embed in red, just like the rubies of the sea, thicker than our moon, it shall bring victory for those who hate the living with all of their kind and their minds. For that kind vision, I will be humble and lay down, as I wait for it to claim us all. 'Even as he placed himself where he needed to be, he looked above, unable to think of anything which may do him well. Only that would matter, no moment after, nothing could bring back hope. They saw the point above burning and smoldering as it prepared itself to break through the atmosphere. A rain, the clouds would turn red, a rain of painful touches, the torched and the watchful glances now stopped. All of them had been blinded by the lack of hope. Not a single man would wear a coat around his neck as they were brought into stone. Pieces were thrown into bricks, sticks and even some of the strange pets which were around. Willingly catching and watching as their destruction was brought. But even farther in the future, one hundred thousand years more. As if from a reconstruction, where they lay like spirits watching, from the forlorn ages they had waited to look upon the dominant species, they had been greeted by a planet which had been completely scorched. In an age where fire completely died, and there was nothing to be brought forth. Luckless in touch, they had brought in the lesser primeval being from the cracks, their bodies properly merged, converging with the thickness of their bodies forth. Air had entered their rumbling messes, wearing nothing but tribalistic dressed, they came to reveal the hollow spots in their necks, their arms and the disappearing holes which reappeared in distance placed on the nearest celestial moons. 'How shall we judge them after to many passing days of nothing but the disaster they had brought on themselves?' 'I cannot even contend what they had brought on. But I can only see it as a method of coping with the manifesting memories, you see?' 'The ghostly had disappeared, as it had been drawn into the living. 'One day we shall inherit a portion of their bodies and mind. That's what I had told you countless years ago, but you looked at me with the eyes of a grind. 'An inflated piece of the man busted out of his kidney. It looked like a small growth, homunculi, and a little creature that resembled him, who grayed out as he began to grow. From him there, a few arteries propelled and formed an entire blue garden, over-spread and wrought in the anger he produced. It held the bigger man as if a child. Unable to dwell with the heat of hope, it wrought.

The flames of anger turned the world into a great furnace. From above there dripped the metal in its state of undoing, harrowing on top of the veins, coating them in order to be preserved. In the last moments he would be alive, the man would fight against the child with all the power he could muster. It was something which ought to be done. Anger would be swollen. Pushed inwardly inside the rims of the earth, never allowed to leave again from the false agony they had displayed in the past. Memories might fade but from a lesser plainness there came the admirers who behaved. As if they saw what had unnerved their gaze. 'Grand artist, he must be. But where had he found the time, ready for the dime, to hold the entire river Syne?' 'In the river, there lay, the piece of smoldering pain which had faced itself in a battle of reflection. A war of melting, from the desecration of mixing metals, from which survived, only the pain, which the law would not abide for. Was it all in vein? The pain couldn't even match the disdain, being pronounced, in its large metallic horns. Bore forth as they began, pouring out of themselves, in the last moments when it could matter. After the admirers left, from the plains there swept the river, encasing them as well, for the growth of the flame inside the furnace would carry on no more than it was needed for them to contemplate on the moments when life used to be. There. In the armors which had been wrought, out of the bodies and the river's blood. A generation would come to feed. With their openings amid the tatters of the lost world they were in. Thought there wasn't any competition to be had, instead they fought themselves. Sword fell upon sword and no longer would they fling themselves forth against any kind of being to admire. A quagmire erupted of the cinder and the metallic forests which emerged. From the depth of the furnace, a myriad of armies would carry forth the ice. For the ice would not burn, and the ice would turn them back to life. Metal became thick, fat and bulbous as they chipped in the various strange artifacts they produced for themselves. In these they'd find. Skeletons and minds, the brains which were left behind as emotions couldn't be conveyed any longer from the amount of suffering and the pain which had been instilled in them. A whip of terror would sharpen the ice. Every time a piece of it fell, more grew on the furnace for as long as there was a flame for it to grow on, it would be kept alive. No more would be spent; to pull away from those who were dead would mean treason. 'Treason will not be permitted at all. Listen to me servants and hear my call. Allow yourselves to be completely submerged into the ice, only that way you shall find yourselves caught again. 'Another fire got back, destroying a voice which had been lost. But the many cages were still there, despite being pierced into dirt. To an unforgiving girth, one had to find himself digging through his relatives to find, a mountain of heaping plain coffins of metal at that. Put to work, found of no worth, they carried only the last entry the ice would need in order to dig deeper when it could have only went away. What could not be conveyed was the agony. Fear and disease, from the hypothermia which was inflicted by the changing of the weather, uncounted for millennia, unless. One could confess the need to betray everything which would bring the praise of this new doomed plane. A dream had come and was lost soon after. So many memories were lost on a whim. It was almost as if a handful of them survived, each of them still burning with the rest of mankind. Yet a darker place appeared, farther than it would be near. The room was dark, somewhat lit by a strange light which came from below. It was interesting seeing just how much of it started raising the hints of salt and sugar in the air.

Through some senses, one could draw just enough of it to realize that it hadn't been worth it yet. A more thorough approach being the fact that there no immediate pointer to the sounds. I had to wait until I could hear something going on. Two voices came first and they were infantile. I couldn't hear what they were saying if they were even considered to be anything even remotely right. More so, I came closer. Now they had been presented as soon as the flash of light came into my eyes. 'There's a hammer in front of you. Pick it up and hold it. 'Instructions were dictated through the top piece. A voice generator, as I saw no wire pushing through it. All six sides of the devices were held in a small cage at the top of the ceiling which prevented it from falling through its grates. I could not, for the likes of me understand how it managed to bring the interaction to such a levee. I waited. 'Pick the hammer. '

Bolted and trimmed, this wasn't the average hammer, but a block of metal which must've been a relic for a blacksmith or something similar to it. Heavy blows would be maintained. Red light, reddish, orange, or deeper into a blue came closer to me. My senses had been awakened as soon as I could fathom staring around. Just what had been going on here? In each corner and between them were sitting chained men. Their upper bodies looked, as I had sensed, infantile. Children had been sawed on top of the fully grown torsos, or at least that's what it actually looked like. Without a confirmation I could only think this as a birth defect. Or it had something to do with the various wires which were attached to their backs. Pulsating recklessly into them, there was that sick demeanors which they produced from time to time. Coming out of the bald spots, which seemed to grow and pull up their wrangle slacking masses. I knew instantly what I'd be asked. 'Put them out of their misery. 'Of course I would. Without a doubt, to my intention, I had no difficulty into picking up the hammer and doing what I ought to. Misery in this state would be something I could not forgive myself to leave them it. But my decision was affected by a detail I had failed to see before. A turn allowed me to look back. Against the wall I had seen a few resting men which had to deal with this previous task in my turn. They were well dressed but their heads had been completely bashed in, undoubtedly the way these children ought to be done. I didn't show any sign of reluctance as I carried on and crushed every single one in this room. Satisfaction was secondary but I felt it. Less so when they felt like they were less human. Which I had actually found out by accident over the fact that I had felt neither cranium nor any kind of bone structure in their heads. What they wore inside was a mass of jerkiness which made it slightly hard for me to completely break through their spines and their bodies. Despite how much I had actually desire to completely put them down, I would settle down with this. Without any other confirmation, I had to deal with their screams which followed. Headless chicken sometimes live for short periods of time. But this was it for them. No hand jerks, not single body reactions, just the puff of sound which came out of their necks as if a vale had been released, unable to contain itself any longer. I was forced to cover a year. I was partially deaf, which at least excused me of it. 'Shut them down. 'I yelled but the only thing there which gave me any kind of compromise was the box. 'Don't worry now, in case you have noticed, they will release a sound which may be a bit inconvenient for a while. I need you to carry on doing what you're doing. 'But with each strike, something changed in me. I could feel their pheromones spreading across my body. Not that I cared since I was already on track for being a murderer. It's why I was chosen in the first place, as I've come to assume of them. But each time, they started pushing their mass not outwardly, but inwardly, leaving no splash on the floor, the walls or my hammer. Soon, the mass in the other limbs directed inside until they resembled tiny pumping tubes which the wires had still feed in them. A yellow seal of some organic material presented their open throats from spilling out. I kept doing that, crushing their heads, until I could not fathom hearing the sound again. What I would be focused on now would be them. Just their general appearance. Though it crossed my mind that I could possibly just go ahead and bash them into a room of splashes, they had been drawn back. Through the floor, through the walls, into select, squared mechanisms which drew them back. I've done what I've been asked to do. And because of it, I now looked this way. Much less than I had cared to look into it, the door opened and I had been ordered out. 'Leave the room, or you will take their place. ' 'What If I want to do it? 'A voice recording or a signal? I couldn't actually make the difference, but if it were. Well, I hadn't been given the chance to observe my own transformation, so I went ahead. Through the first open, wide room of the complex it would be. Many other rooms were there but I couldn't explore them. 'I wish I could be freed from this. 'The answer came truthfully not with words but with the popping of a light which revealed to me a single adjacent chair which hardened as I approached. For a few moments when the light was shut, I saw the outline and just how flaccid it had actually been. Not only had it been depressed down, but the man who had been tied to it and been broken apart as well. Some unnatural bends and forms would've made him look like a broken doll used for the nurses or the medical students. But I didn't see a man in the light. No feet and hands, but the strange and long brown pointers which would belong to any kind of unnatural creature who looks in fear of the insecticide. For what I could draw from it, I had been somewhat thrown off my track by that. The hairs were not only long but pseudo-organic, so much so that they had a hint of wriggling like worms. They were pushing through and trying to pick up some crumbs of blood from the floor. Parasites? No, they didn't look like them. They were parts of the legs and the others. But what I saw was the fact that it had lost blood, under the bandages. He hid something, a cut, a deep one which may have been the result of having his entire body broken in half. To the victor go the spoils, my thought came. Yet I was to be won, not the other way around. 'Pay him blood, a gallon should be enough. 'Again, another pair of lights seemed to treat me like a mentally ill buffoon, somehow closing the way back as well, to prevent me from trying to kill myself. It would progress. My affliction spread across my face and appeared to have extended my jaw downwardly. It had this effect on it that I could feel every time I tried to swallow. It felt like the jaw turned itself around and pointed its teeth towards the tendons and the inner verge of my throat. But I couldn't eat through it. Pain wasn't what stopped me from doing it, but the pouches I had felt inside of them. I was prevented from even considering this as an option. 'Give it blood, I had, a gallon, and then take care of the rest, caretaker. 'So that's what I was after all. A caretaker and nothing more than that. I was somewhat surprised myself that I hadn't recognized it the first time. But I concur to the fact that I obeyed without consideration. Approaching it was difficult, much more so once I had realized that I hadn't had the hammer on me any longer. Looking back on it, I almost slammed my feet off the ground. 'Damn it, that's still in the room. 'But I haven't even begun to question it before looking at my arms. Of course there were no fingers any longer. All of them had joined together and molded themselves into an extension of my palm. Upright and held to my feet, I had been set there. On path to give him my blood. Two or three feet in its vicinity and I found myself being poked by it. Thoroughly through the chest. Without a scream of pain, I bottled everything in me, waiting for the nearest cuff and cold. I felt like I was being drained. More so, caressed by the other pair of hairs coming from the three limbs which surrounded me. Cuddled like a child, I felt the weirdest phenomenon felt by a living creature, a deep desire to satiate it. By whatever means I could do, returning to a brooding mother who wanted me to give everything I've taken from her back. But I knew that was no woman there. If I were to reach and grab for it, I could know. 'What's underneath the bandages? 'I haven't asked a second time. Instead of doing it, I pushed two fingers towards the place where the sockets would have to be and saw them dissipate underneath the warmth I provided. It was all I needed. A view through the head, which gave me just enough information to understand that this wasn't even a human, not that I didn't need any confirmation any longer. Had it been the first time I had doubted it to be so, I would've been surprised. Nothing in this place was human, not even I. My mind was furlong. I was released but they battered me so. Previously killed, the creatures which had taken my side in that first room seemed to bother me the most. With their heads bashed in, I could have no confirmation whether or not they had been human. I didn't know if I was a human before I had been affected. Afflicted by this, I pulled back and saw it recede under the dark. 'You shall now go in each of the other rooms and feed the creatures in order. Just as you enter them, a set of further instructions would be told again. ' 'If I refuse? 'Without a warning, his head simply imploded it, like a patch of crumpled skin which drew in a flaccid toe, only to pop into a puddle filled with the most repulsive liquids one could draw himself to. A second one appeared shortly after, from another room. Another "caretaker". This one could only be hoped for to have some better sense in his head. Otherwise, it would be too much of waste to include them on. He writhed with a peculiar approach. Moving through his feet and in-between them, there was a concoction of peculiar legs which were horizontally placed and stacked like a ladder on his great appendage. The entirety of his body was attached to it, coiling every time it felt a vibration. No arms were laid but a descending head appeared to be pushed on by a long neck which retracted in the chest-shell. From it, there were two punctured hole which spread a layer of some solid poll. It spread and dripped but could always be dragged back. This layer coated him momentarily and served as some kind of blanket for the soil. From the room it had come out of, it seemed like it had tended a garden where no plants emerged. Instead, from it, to his proper feet, remnants of the ones destroyed, those who could be harvested were planted in. 'Another one is ready to be taken. He is in the proper condition to be used. 'From the looks of it, the self-cauterizing bacteria which had haunted its body still dwelled into the recesses of his body. Body functions would be preserved. 'What must I do with him?' 'Make sure he's properly harvested and planted. We are in need of more of his kind. 'Drawing forward to a point made him push the body on the side, in order for a proper examination to take place. The floor had been quickly cleaned, which in turn left nothing petty around but the strange nature of the place. Eeriness disappeared as soon as the voice had left the complex. Instead of it, another lot would come out. Deaf as they were, it seemed likely that they would be guided by nothing but their sight. Words could not do, as they were illiterate as well, caught inside the frolicking for the arrival of the first written notes. White and flat, behind a wall of glass, they dictated at least, the taste of mercury was still sweet, as they expect. Every drew in closer as they began licking the panel which held the case from breaking. No satisfaction could be drawn any longer from this. It would be hard to govern over the nine of them, especially since they were in this vile condition which jolted them to start over again. As feet joined and clacked their joints, one could not even try to seethe any longer. It was contested, just who would die. Out of them, a selection of four was just enough in the eyes below the ceiling. For them, as they would be shown above the next floor, being kept by long spikes into the air, that food was on its way. Tender meat, well than never to have seen it in the form it had been displayed, for at least a few other unnecessary hinges were worn from the broken locks. An important detail could be drawn from the self-inflicted wounds they had all caused upon one another. Mercury had an ill effect on them. And it couldn't be quantified the least. For the feast of their bodies could only start now. It was unnecessary for them to survive past the initial incision which turned their pathetic looking bodies into the walking legless machines that were connected to the whims of the prodigy of the depths. He who governed in the complex gave them something instead. Walking burrowing wheel cutters replaced them. It was a surgery that took eighteen hours. During the procedure, four of them mysteriously disappeared, no question had been asked about it. Looming forward, I could remember one of them. Belonging to the ones who went away, there was this strange satisfaction I could see while he opened the pieces of him which weren't missing. He was like some key-bearded who had his body riddles with locks. And each open door reveled a dark spot. Tinier than a chamber or than some hole, they kept something moving. Obscured even than the dark, until the shadow exposed those things, as his side extended, below and to the nearest wall, I could see the pointers which made their way towards me. To that, I didn't look. He was trying to push his way forward until he could reach and take my eye. He needed it for the same reason they were looking to eat us, his eyes were missing as well. Sensing them, for I could not fathom thinking of any other way, he expressed only the strangest to it. Licking his closest lips, which were stored as well, in the lower bottoms, had only managed to draw my eyes downward. I couldn't look directly at him, but the best I could possibly do was trying to get a hold of what lay around him. Surrounded by a pair of almost sunken pieces of metallic choral, my eyes were grandiosely packed. Inside their spots, a few of them pushed aside, until I felt them all pushing away. But this fellow was already giving in too much. He had ignored the other four of us. Somehow it was understandable, as I was shocked by the amount of eyes which kept pouring out of him. Not only had he desired to keep feeding him with everything he wanted, as it passed, he also wanted to give us the frame, the entry to join him. Others started drawing out, pouring their eyes as much as they could until their combined efforts gave their way to the broken circle from which the lost member could draw from. Mercury was at fault again, for everything that happened, time after time again. Lurking from the shadows I could even see that gardener who couldn't approach. We were hole, therefore nigh-untouchable. It was something close to some kind of mill-formed miracle that made approach him from the least, the least safe spot. I got closer and allowed him to take a few of the eye-substance coming from my sockets. Shocked by it, he simply threw a giant arm, throwing me against the nearest surface I could land. My skull had been fractured and they didn't care. Everyone was too absorbed in what they were trying to produce to even pay attention to me bleeding. Secure on my abilities to pull away, I grabbed myself and pushed. From the lower trunk, I saw myself being pulled out. Surreal, yet just as I expected, I saw pieces of me pulling away on their own until the very point where I could smell and touch something I ought to think about. They wanted me to see and be disgusted by what I felt going in there. For, if I hadn't, then, fear would be shown. And I could be the next one take alive, broken to pieces and fried. Meat was anything than tender in those parts and I couldn't even focus myself on trying to look away. So much time, so much time spend, wondering what was the purpose of my breaking.

Self-inflicted, though it may be, I say what was dragging me, a part of nails that were thick enough to be poles started dragging me above. I knew what I was to be done with. He had shown himself just when I needed an example for disobedience. I knew then. As I said: 'Ing jgy uhun. 'The rest of them started becoming the skin-shades they were all meant to be once the resources of their bodies had been fully use to nothing. Everyone got eaten there, as a result of the traces of mercury which had been swollen from the floors and the panels and more. 'Bring more of them in. 'A new lot had been brought in, this time healthy, physically at least. Yet they looked vaguely off. Their features were elongated, pushed, withdrawn, eyes would sometimes occupied up to half of the face and they would curve and bend to look as if they had been elated by a flame. Indeed, despite their long fingers, there was this expectation that one couldn't even think of what was missing. It was something they always tried looking for. But this lot showed progress. Intelligence even, as they followed through the instructions and never meant to go away from the stop-signs. Thinking of them as anything but a destructing bunch would be a mistake. Bent on it, they began eating and attacking one another, until they had made pools of blood in which they rolled around, like couples in hay, deflecting to run afterwards. None of these creatures would be contained any longer, for their speed and slippery oils would allow them to move away from the fastest detractors or wild predators which required their deaths. It was now that Jonathan was freed. Prescott Jonathan could not even feel his feet any longer. Missing from him were some pain nerves which had been manually extracted. Looking at this destructive hell-hole he found himself in was dangerous enough. No one painted a better image than the man with a missing half. 'Where is my brother? 'He yelled, alarming just about everything in the distance for as much as a whole mile. It wasn't something he would be willing to discuss, nor would he trust anyone but himself with the need to seek a rust chain. For him, they wouldn't be able to tell of the pain he'd have to endure. Poor Jonathan was too pure for this world, and that wouldn't be forgiven at all. Nothing made sense, the deeper he ascended. Walls wouldn't even be pubescent enough to be called olden. In them, sickening pieces of lost bodies kept everything tight and pushed around. In every piece he could see a body which had succumbed, or was it that every body gave in the weight as it started pushing everything down again? Without a way to confirm his wild suspicions about what hid inside this place, he did the only think he could do best. Picking up the nearest board, he hid behind in, worn by the approaching sounds. It wasn't the greatest spots to be or even great at all, but that had been all he knew off. A few strange sounds happened to be here, near him. He wanted to try looking away, from the man-formed corner he was in. But without a way to push from that spot, there'd be nothing he could do in order to draw away. His mind was somehow met by an indescribably feeling of remorse he felt after hearing the woman cry. 'Help me, help me, help me. 'Her voice then quickly ended. A few shivers as it from a wide strike blew a piece of her he couldn't even properly imagine. He didn't need to, since the closest thing to it had been the realization that they bore firearms on them. A few more shots followed and I could feel just how close this happened to me. It was only a few meters away and a few minutes of standing in the dark until I felt the cold liquid reach my toes. Where my shoes had gone? They had taken them away from me. I used to have a pocket knife on me, but that's been taken as well. No light and my hope were trying to diminish it just so I could make no noise. I wondered what it would feel like, watching through the board. Would I see the gun pointed at me? Would I feel those large and strong, push-on mandibles which threatened to have a bite of me as soon as they'd be done with her? For the next few minutes, I had been forced to listen to her being eaten away. Slowly, slowly, until the very point where I wondered why this made me feel thirsty. Nausea came onto me, but not because what I smelled. Though I couldn't hope to visualize what they were doing to me, a few words crossed my mind. Join them, have a bite of her, you know you want to. It's your chance to fit in and be a part of them, just let them know you are there. I should know better than to even consider. Surprised, more than what crossed my mind; I had lain there without even comprehending how they weren't able to find me. The Board underneath which I stood was certainly shaking the whole time. How come they didn't even sniff me? Sweat ran down from every spot of my body and not even so, I couldn't bother myself to breathe in tones. As soon as I had thought it to be over, I slowly withdrew the board, lowering in slowly over my knees before I pushed it away. I was met by a single face which had been left there for me to see. Unlike what I had seen from the distance, that shimmer of silver, which would've been a bar wasn't what kept her there. Instead, there was the dread I felt. Lost, inside my thoughts was here last vestige of a single tear that crept out. She wasn't human, but a strange, almost horse-shoed face creature which hid inside a piece of metal. From three spots they had gained access to her breathing device inside her eyes and her weird tracts which had been completely pulled out. As of now, something still kept dripping out of her, which I figured to be some frugal blood. A piece of hardened mud lay just a few feet away. Though I couldn't do anything feel it across my fingers, I dragged myself to it with a blind eye. It should at least an impeccable thing. Bloody marks were something of a vice there. There were several chains I could remember, somehow misplaced. You must understand that there were times when I felt cold. In that place, there were some missing memories. I know you prodded where you didn't belong; a finger or two entered my note. Nothing was written on it but you still found yourself digging too deep for comfort. Now you'll feel what I have wrought you then. Closer to him laid the entrance to an enclosed cold-room. It was what they called. Storage would be highly underestimated, to even think about trying to drag each other off that plate. Where they stored the meat and the gate of ice, up and low-going, a bitter snow would draft the first of the sparkling fish. Was it me or him? Whoever tried first couldn't have mattered at all. Both of us desperately attempted to dig through the ice in order to eat. This weather, as it could not be called anything else, I think was just the image of the outside. I was in the middle of nowhere, looking at chains and hooks which never ended. Sent to the depths of the ice-hell. Saying it was merely cold was a hard understatement which couldn't even approach the miserable truth. I looked around only to notice the trails locked in by a machine. A snow plower of some kind, anything would do. If only I could find a way out, perhaps life would be less miserable than what it had become now. Without a confirmation, I set out, looking at the closed door. The complex was rather enormous, estranged from anything even remotely looking like a shelter. I was caught, rather before I was standing still, by the images in the storm. Boulders of ice, somewhere in the frozen lake where the only clearness which could be drawn from it was that, peculiar glassy ship I saw. They were trying to show us something. Us? Of course, I had been followed. A figure lay in the back, farther away by now. I wouldn't stop nor would I slow down. Not a single thought had crossed my mind until I had thought of indulging the creature to follow. After what they had done to that poor, poor, missing heath. My mind couldn't even work properly in that weather. It wasn't my fault, by I felt likely to be caught. As the ship passed, I saw only the rims against the water.

That had gone too fast for any freight to be seen. Perhaps it paled somewhere there in the midst of the cold mountains and the point where weather started to get warmer. My only thought had been to wait and see. Whether or not I would be allowed in, that would be a conversation for another time. For now, I had been exposed for too long and fell. Without fur and shoes, my blood frozen, my numbness made to lose any kind of consciousness I could heave aside. Walking felt like pushing through a grave and after a series of hard moments, I felt as if I would not rise again. That hadn't been what was necessary for me to live. Or to get any further. My graven vow would wait for another day, it would seem, or for at least another night. When fright had met the freighter, I had been exposed to something which made me grow even number. From where I stood, what I had observed now was the fact that I found myself looking and walking in the wrong direction. No creature ventured out. Instead, I felt as if I were met by the man who put down his sails and brought me in. 'Easy now, take it easy, drink as slowly as you can but don't over do it. There's enough of that for both of us, even for the coming of a closer winter, isn't it?' 'They shook themselves more than it had to be. Somewhat afraid and paranoid, I yipped a tooth out, just from the can. 'What have we here, mate? Is he another one who came out?' 'I could only see the light of the frost, the eternal storm which still caught me off guard as it broke my pacing. To even claim otherwise would be mad. Before my eyes adjusted, I felt like an animal. Well studied by the few doctors who were in the room with me, I felt somewhat ill and irresolute. They were treating me unlike what someone who survived. Or, my feet. 'What happened to my feet?' 'We cut them off, we had to. There was the hypothermia and they blacked. ' 'You chopped off my feet?' 'My senses couldn't have returned quicker than that. I looked everywhere around, trashing as I attempted to grab anything in the disgust I felt. What did they do to me? What? What? ' 'Butchers, murderers, what have, what have?' 'Calm down now mate, look. 'He pulled off a red blanket off my lower side. My breath had almost come to the point where it shook itself past the smoke in the chamber. 'I was just yanking your chain, that's all. Don't worry about it; we're only trying getting your blood pumping again. 'They laughed a bit as they looked and judged my reactions. The doctor of the ship. 'I'm Urid, It's a pleasure to see you now. It's not often that we see someone go out in the cold dressed the way you are and survive it. Not in this condition, somehow I ought to think, that if it weren't for your fall, you would've been well in your natural habitat. 'Another one of them and a few more in the githers. I couldn't even force myself to swell a smile and they were simply cracking them as if I didn't matter at all. Just what went through their heads now? Fathomless or not, this conversation could only bring me back once it fully kicked in. My legs hadn't been cut off. The reassurance had to be there. As long as you say it, this has to be the truth; they didn't cut my legs off at all. Perhaps it was in their power to do so, but they chose not to do it instead. Have I been vindicated somewhat by these strangers? ‘Am I to be set free then? Will you bring me to safety then?’ ‘Afraid not, lad, not until we’re done our work here and perhaps caught a few more others like you.’ ‘What’s that place then? I woke up out of nowhere and just came there.’ ‘I’m going to administer something which will leave a shock inside your entire body. This may sting a little.’ ‘For the first time in a long, long period, I have felt pain. Not the kind brought by cold, or the other side which had been brought by brute force, but the other. The other, the pain brought him to back there. Not through some memory, but through some deep desire. I felt like staring through the walls, just at the right spot. My neck jolted, almost snapping itself over the turn. I could see it now. Through all the chaos, only one thing stopped, as he would be trapped beneath the ship. One moment at their feet, a storm ensued in another path. Agamemnon stopped just about the bunker only to have wondered, why was he there, a single mind for all of them now. As the vessel was placed there, it was near. They could feel him. ‘Malt is somewhere in this place. ‘Joy could not even be denied. If so it was decided somehow, one was to try. From the depths of a barrier, in a wicker place, time had drawn a piece of someone who hadn’t been touched again. A slit in the bunker came, through which two scoundrels escaped. The Elegant and the Duke had come, in this closed plane, where none might fall. Through the scent of dread, another being fell through the ceiling as if dead. Mighty Di’Dorko, champion with the name of Gordo hadn’t been defeated yet. The world had yelled and shouted as the mighty trees had pushed Aleksey through them as far as they would be tested by the incompetence of the drunk. For now, a vicious cycle would emerge, as they would all be drawn to the bunker past the turns. Fading deathless suppressors would stand still, unable to suppress, yet live their feelings of weakness. They might lose anything but the light of day. Nothing right could be conveyed as a total state of emergency would be instilled. In the depths of the bunker, still, life carried on. They were relics of the past, lost and set in trance, unable to confine what reason might not abide. From a distant manifestation, through one of the constructed cities below, right where the levels had been broken down from above, there stood the appearing hotel, as if lost. Out of place it was not in its entirety, rather, there was a good reason for it. Relevancy didn’t leave much of it to be interpreted at all. Instead, to the one looking ahead, ajar to some standing. Still. Winds still blew from the North. It was something which happened to be just about the same place, as if it could be accounted for. Now its proper terminus, the cold had completely turned the accumulation of Northern Blocs in a proper ice-city. Where storm would rule, experiments would be amongst the cooling fragments of the mountains and the adjacent icebergs in the area which lasted for as long as heat refused to come. Inside the buildings, life had still managed to survive somewhat. By some strange addition, to this contribution of vague experimental covers, humans had placed various tender blankets of steel which sealed the place in its entirety. Not only that, but most had worked on the long distance tunnels which brought the head from the other side. In forms of heathers, pieces of misplaced tinder and other materials which had been properly used they live. ‘Berjd, I need you to tend the fires now, for at least a few more hours, until the next set of provisions arrive.’ ‘I understand. A break will do you fine Swendin, I won’t disappoint you.’ ‘Better not do that now. I would hope so, since there’d be plenty of lives here to look after. Think of the wolves and the potter, we need them working at an hourly rate if we’re to keep this wing going.’ ‘Got it, there’s no need to keep addressing it. I’ll handle everything, you may go now.’ ‘I’m only trying to help you. It’s not that often that I let people take in the lead. Not because of the danger involved into it. If something were to happen.’ ‘Swendin, I know. I’ll deal with whatever problems rears its ugly head in. Don’t worry about it. As I said, there's a problem, I'll ring or make some noise. Someone's bound to wake you up in that case, or sound the alarm. We'll deal with this as well as we dealt with the swan-song of winter. ' 'Fine, deal with it however you think it's necessary. 'There a slight hint of a breaking tones in his voice. It was the lack of sleep mostly, the excess drowning of the coffee he couldn't let go off for the likes of him or those around him. That would be the death of him, as he was wildly aware. To concur one of the points, he had brushed a piece of his shoulders. 'Only four hours, that's what I'm asking, then you'll be replaced, and then the other man will take his place, then I'll come back. Should we go through the motions again to be sure about it? ' 'No. I think we went through them enough times already. I need to keep my guard up, remember? To make sure not a single hole appear in the hulk of our strata. ' 'We'll deal with it later. 'On his way out, he grabbed a piece of a mug and a warm piece of mead. They were holding barrels around, just to get some heat in the body and the bones. Outside, it had been long-decided that it wasn't habitable at all. Even to claim otherwise would only amount to some mad apparition trying to piece in some wild claim. Weather would not even be tame, for the likes of anyone. And no primate had conquered the North. Where winter was anything but cold, in its supreme living temperature sub-drop, claiming otherwise would be akin to some, some, lost piety. But life flourish underneath the blocs, all the building now entwined, though beneath them, life had been otherwise seen as perilous as the cartels of heat provided. Blood amitosis, fluoric of the bone, packets of heat which wouldn't last long. Junkies of the frost would gather between the cold pillars, in places of dust, where there was nothing but the holding pieces, gray surroundings and nothing which would favor life. Everyone dealt with the problem as they could. Now they had truly turned into a community, a place of mind. Not a single citizen above turned a blind eye to injustice, but here. Word would not be spoken near those who heard and spoke, to carry. 'That man stole my hot-packs. I demand his apprehension. ' 'Piss of now, leave, there's no future for you here if you can get robbed by a single junkie. 'At which the men laughed and pointed at him after the remark. Some wore dark and long bearded of gray or fading red, eye patches of old, to symbolize just what they lost. In days of winter, they hid, alas. Nothing would be safe as long as winter refused to pass. There were plenty of times when everyone stopped in order to reconsider just what the reason for the shaking above was. Seeing constant pieces of snow form or corners of ice freezing inside their holds broke some of the confidence, until they patched it with their picks and small pieces of clay they carried and were missed. Four great corners lay below, where the junkies all stood together; almost fully exposed, giving and receiving each other's heat in order to avoid the fully fledged plea of the disease they carried. A cold would not be suffered, not long after, not for the kind. Turn an evil blind, as some were thought to have crossed the line, thinking of a way of harvesting their organs for meat. Meat was a contender; it was sparse, as the supplies were hard to come by. But it was worthless to complain. Yet, with all the good and the bad down there, a sense of comaradery arose. There were a few things going on there. Whichever was the case, for some reason or another, the whole chamber had been depressed below. It was unexpected. Mightily so, they were actually beginning to make their own lower areas where they rested. Cold didn't travel that far below and this was just another method they could extract some heat from it. Few people cared about what they were seeing around. It was a mess of dirt, which only went as deep as to reveal an entire building and several floors which they could start undoing. It was kept mainly secret since the upper people didn't want to deal with them at all. Life had been settled then, though not in the most docile way. While peace was maintain by the amount of excavation they could get closer to, there wasn't any incentive to do so. It was a time of rest, at least until one of the many locked sides of the perimeter would be brought in question. For that had been perhaps the only thing, which really disturbed the thought, and if it hadn't been a reason for it, then perhaps it would be the dream. Dreamed dwelled but no one could tell what happened behind closed doors and the strange walls. What they masked there was theirs alone, be it another group, a rival gang, or worse. The kind which would slowly roast the brain to kindness. Jonathan slowly walked away from the ship and returned to the complex. The door was open; it would always be open for him. While there, in as close as a dismissal of pain, he walked right again. He was humbly looking for any assailant or a piece of a mark of the woman he had witnessed before, only to be met by the same luckless thing he had expected. Another human who deflected from running, hiding himself behind a board as he had. 'I'll do you a favor and take this away. Don't jump, I'm a friend. 'I tried my best to reassure him the best I could. My intention wasn't to frighten him in the least, as a mere thought; I only wanted to give him a reason not to fear. Something solid to cling on as a standing man, which he took, unexpectedly well. For all the shame I have felt in fear when I had been in his place, this one trusted me with all his might and hand. He shook it as soon as he noticed that the person speaking to him had been just as he had expected. 'Yes, I'm not one of the murderers or the things out there. I don't know what they are, but. 'It was a lie. Perhaps I had known something. I seem to remember a vague shape in the cold storm, which I have omitted from our conversation. But I have come to realize that despite the familiar outline, it hadn't been one of the sailors who promised to get me out of here. Instead, I was met by something of a red dot. He was too busy to notice me now, or the laser pointer which had soon disappeared. Yet the message had been well received, I wanted to warn him, but I was stopped by common sense. 'I must be the only other sane person you've seen a while right? ' 'Sit down; come with me, the board is wide enough to hide the two of us. We can't be seen like this in the open. And keep your voice down while you're here, will you? 'I wanted to avoid this; I had wanted to do it ever since I found myself in the same kind of position before. But seeing how I wouldn't be allowed to interact with him otherwise, I had to contend with doing this. At least from what I could tell, we were in the same spot I woke up prior to our meeting. A difference was key there. Even in the short time we had been separated, me and the spot, a big of it had been completely dug through the wall, or it somehow ended up in a place it had nothing to deal with. I was cold and tired, now of all the times, when I was in the warmth of the complex. I know it sounds strange, but I had found myself never shaking, but falling out of exhaustion out there. Wild claims such as hypothermia there had been nothing more but a wild fluke. That alone ticked me off the strange sailors. Nonetheless, I sat besides the man and waited for deflecting of his message. Just what was I for? I couldn't tell. 'This board is quite big, isn't it? And you found yourself the perfect spot to hide yourself into. You sure it isn't dangerous? I've been here before. ' 'I know, I've seen you, stranger. Walking out of the snow, I was actually kind of surprised that you managed to come back. You were out there for a long while. Honestly, I couldn't even make out how you managed to keep the signs to yourself. ' 'What signs? ' 'Pneumonia, a cold, falling lungs or limbs, anything to even reflect you being out there. The temperature alone should be minus fifty digressing by the feels of it. I'm surprised, since the others followed you out. ' 'Others as well? Were there more than one? I only saw a vague thing following me before I started running away. I didn't think I would be followed by more of them. ' 'A lot of them, actually, not one, you've vaguely underestimated them. But at least I know I've got you to be thankful for dragging a few of them out. About that, I think there are many others similar to them. ‘ ‘What are they? I told you, I only saw them vaguely. ‘ ‘When the cold came in and I saw a piece of light reflected on their leathery skin, I only saw their tails, on which they dragged themselves farther away. That’s all. Something vaguely repelling on their backs, strides or long thinner antennas or a pair of heads held by some kind of baskets they had fashioned out of their fleshy skin. But that’s all I could see from the small gap in my metal board. I couldn’t push it for keeper’s sake, if I did, they would’ve seen me. ‘ ‘But that’s not what I saw outside. What I saw seemed to be more solid, like the figure of a man, trying to drag me back in. Only one, one of them and one alone. ‘I was unsure of what he was trying to sell, as a matter of fact, I had thought of him as nothing but a little vile man. A shade of a thing, which dug deeper at a faster rate than it took him to seethe. Surprising, I was calm. No mention of the guns or what I had heard before. Someone had cleaned the floors as well as they removed the head. Another thing he had either forgot to mention, or withheld it from me. To the proper saying, I would be in awe if it were for me to go away and hide. He wouldn’t be allowed to follow in that case. But there was the danger, as my mind had been skewed to the side of asking, what if he started shouting in order to give me away? It was too much of a hassle to even consider it. A proper burial wouldn’t even be in order any longer as I’ve come to accept it. But a sudden idea struck me as well sounding. ‘Will you join me then? I’ll have to let you know that I have no intention on standing here and waiting to be found. ‘My heart was beating fast, I knew I would be in danger but for my sake, I would risk being shot than knowing that the culprits knew where they could find me. Cowardly hiding under a tiny board of metal, waiting to be picked up as the chance arose for me. To continue here, my dear fellow said. ‘I’ll come. I guess I have a better chance sticking up with your than hanging here on my own. I was getting hungry, you know? And I cannot for the sake of me eat myself slowly. Not that it had crossed my mind for the other way around, you know? I’ve never considered cannibalism as a way of concluding our interaction. ‘ ‘Stop talking and listen. This is serious, unless we make it past a safer room; I’m afraid we’ll just end up being picked up and killed. No more games and no more hiding into obvious spots. I think they know where we are. They’re playing with us. ‘I gave in too much too quickly. A paranoid man, that’s what he most likely, thinks of me now and he couldn’t be right. They trapped us here for a reason I wouldn’t be kindly awaiting to find out. I wouldn’t, for the sakes of me put myself through it, not again. ‘We’ll walk slowly, now, come on. ‘It was in the same spot that we found ourselves in, pushing the board away that I expected to find another head. Somehow surprised by it, I got up and simply walked without trying to pin him down. ‘A spot’s lit. ‘My mouth bit my lower lip, as I had again let another thought slip off. I didn’t know why I had suddenly decided to trust this man, or why I was listening to the jolting piece of mind which went at times uncontrollably on its own, but I had found myself simply spreading a word or two into the dark while we walked. I mention this because we walked. Simply without fear. We might’ve run if it weren’t for the sounds of the footsteps which echoed in there. Perhaps even jogged around, if it weren’t for the cold. Had he felt it? I turned and stopped him. Easily, as I trumped over him with a few good centimeters on top of the neck, where a few good points of his ears came off. ‘You’re a sad man, aren’t you? I can already feel it, you’ve sweat there. ‘ ‘It’s boiling hot in here, that’s why. ‘ ‘On the contrary, I can only feel the cold now running through my bones. I wish this place became a furnace perhaps that was I didn’t stand the chance of running old. ‘ ‘What are you even talking about? You’re. ‘He stopped as soon as he grabbed my palm and realized I wasn’t pretending. ‘I’m Jonathan. ‘ ‘Michk, I’m Michk. ‘A strange introduction brought me back. I could see it from the distance, peeping as a red spot, this time on Michk's head. The sharpshooter was slightly exposed at the area around his head. For what was worth, I had now gotten the clue about the least humane figure which might be presented to me. It wasn't a head per say, but one of many bulk stretched faces on a flat surface, standing on a trunk. The hands were his, but I couldn't actually point out, or even hint at what species they belonged to. Hands and fingers went hand in hand, but the rest of it was too thick and wide-spread to even consider it as anything but what it claimed itself to be. I was dumb-struck my amount of force the shot took of him. Despite the lack of sound and the missing bullet and the fact that Michk didn't die or even noticed the concave come which had been carved as the back of his head surprised me the most. I was a pint of metal which had a pair of jerky arm-imitations which moved and dug its shell deeper into his skull. Past a point, it was pointless to even consider whether or not he had been right in the head. My shock was impartially cut off by the fact that we walked it off with him in front. 'I think I know of a way out, this way. ' 'But we're only digging deeper now, are you sure about it? ' 'Well, while you were out doing whatever snow-play in poles, I was here sniffing around and moving around the corners with the board. ' 'You haven't told me that. ' 'It was irrelevant, you see? It wasn't actually me who's done it. 'He pointed at some other metal boards around it. A few dark and swollen bodies peered out. Their heads were his, but those crumpled bodies, resembling some severely dehydrated leeches bore his appearance for whatever reason. 'They did it for me. ' 'Go there, near the gate, near the gate, get tot he stairs on the right, avoid touching the walls. 'His voice as well, appearing slightly hinged. I chose to omit this peculiar detail he had painter himself with. But now that I came to think about it, perhaps the possibility dictated that it was one of them who followed me through the snowstorm, as unlivable as it had been. There was that detail which still left me chasing wild leads in the snow. MY consideration was left floating in a sea of blue and white. By no chance could I reroute myself to that point. Instead I chose to keep my mouth shut and pay the due. Willingly walking with this Michk, adhering to a strange conversation spent in the whisper realm. As it came to him, there was this jerk which his neck came to be set into, by his own fault as well. I was struck by the way in which he kept pushing through him chest, heaving on each side, unable to yank anything from around him. There were a few other faces which were looking from the midst of the walls, caught in the doors, blocked from coming forth. I drew near one of them only to be met by the falling grate which separated us. What I managed to see in the few seconds I had been flashed by it was the amount of hair which was being harvested by another person which was in the room with that. And the strange addition of the skin bumps of the lower portion of the face which came to look like knocked up bellies. Some way, or somehow, I was entranced by their weird plays. As their grates pulled up and down, I was almost tempted to push my hand through and close my eyes, serving as nothing more but a sign that I was ready to do anything if it meant they'd allow me to feel them. 'Thinking on doing something wild now? I wouldn't suggest you that unless you're not planning on keeping it. They can munch through bone as if it's jelly. And I doubt that'll warm you. ' 'I personally think it might work better than your strange friends. To which, might I add that they're still following us without even daring to pay us heed to what they're doing. ' 'Helping us? You must've spent more time around here than I if you can't even learn to trust the unknown. You'd be surprised on how useful they are, as a matter of fact, if it weren't for them, I would've have gotten this far. ' 'I understand that, but they're weird. I cannot stand to look at them, just sense them; can you do that for me? 'Jonathan didn't make any sense now. He had been caught by a strange imprudent feature he hadn't recognized on himself before. A peculiar way of painting himself as a hurtful man, subdued by mistrust yet at the same time, viciously imprudent and impulsive as he tried spilling everything out. 'There are metal bars and pricks going through their heads and bodies, have you noticed those?' 'But those weren't in them before.' 'Of course not, they've come out of the wall, even the strings, the chains, the scissors and the knives. They have a whole pile they're dragging with them and I simply don't like it. If we keep them around, we stand at risk of dragging everyone here to the noise they're making. It's what they've become now, your own personal sound-machines, with a face to follow. What do you think will happen once they're killed? What will they think once they find the same face here?' 'I don't care about it, Jonathan, what's the matter? They might make a bunch of noises.' He hadn't lowered his voice as before. Confidence had no place here at a time like this. If there was something really wrong about him, it was the mere fact that I wasn't about to even indulge the threat. No, unlike him, I still had the commonsense to mind my own business and see that I still find a way to make it out alive. Otherwise, all of this might as well have been meaningless. To my imprudence, I'd say it was pointless to count my blessing. Not while giving to the blind. 'I don't think it's them. If you look close as their eyes, they've blinded themselves with the saws they had brought from the wall.' 'Don't go near it, I think we should stop.' 'This is the first good idea you've come up with in a long time. Bravo, my good friend, I think we may have found our partnership going places.' 'Will you simply stop and let me think? I can't get rid of this headache, let alone deal with you, them, or my look-alikes.' 'Step down then and let me do the thinking and the lead. I think I'm more than properly endowed to deal with it.' As it may, neither of them was. It was a constant stream of shocks which made all of them be twisted and used. The fabric of metal which could be traced nearest to the walls appeared to have been broken apart into pieces of hair. Trimmed, even, I could see how those weren't actually strands, but highly grown pieces of plump iron, naturally growing, even harvested there. 'Someone's coming; I told you they should be silenced.' 'Where should we hide?' 'There's no empty room, help me force it then.' It seemed like there was not a single closed room. But that wasn't the strangest of things we would have to suffer now. Instead, we looked out of ourselves at what appeared to be that metallic trap in the middle with which we had to share at least a few moments in. To even suffer in its presence was of a dullness which could not be expected. I protested to the man in inquiring just what the reason for being there was. For nothing but a few moments, we were at each other's throats, forcing the creature back, being met by a fat face which paled as soon as it had pushed on. 'My surprise came only when I had met him.' Came a paralyzing tone from inside the forest of metal strings. I could see someone make his way, making his way as in, there was a deep tunnel inside of this creature which only went as far as push down as far as it could. There wasn't any contradiction here to what I thought. I saw a light coming out as soon as I could come into contact with it. To even claim otherwise would be as redundant as I could be pleased to know. Just looking at it was somewhat unbelievable to what I had known. A deranged feeling crossed my mind as I could not feel anything else but the sudden intrusion he revealed to us. 'Hello, hello, hello.' He turned around, as if talking to someone beyond us, or before me, as I was the only one looking down there, only to say. 'Goodbye.' A haggard person, wearing a bunch of worn-out clothes on which his large white beard grew greeted us with a lantern. His eyebrows penetrated his gaze and twisted inside until the very point where they could move his pupils in and out, no that it mattered as much as I had been concerned, as there was something seriously wrong about the way in which he presented himself there. With his pair of fake eyes which glowed too uncanny to be anything else but a pair of fake pearls, he presented himself as he was a merchant of wool.

‘Come to buy something? Only the greatest black wool in town. Don’t worry about it, lad, the door is properly closed now. There’s a device up there which detects human movement, once it comes into contact with it, the lock is set in place and they can never escape afterwards. ‘ ‘You mean to say that there’s no way out for us now? ‘ ‘Afraid not, this is the final destination you’ll ever embark on, I’m serious afraid that you’ll have to deal with it as everyone else who came in here in the first place. With a hook and a sunken shrill. Otherwise, I think we’ll be engrained into watching you behave. ‘ ‘How many? ‘ ‘An entire herd of wool-merchants and not enough of us doing the manual work, you see? We’re kind of a lazy and subjugated lot, but don’t blame of this. I cannot help my nature. ‘He bowed a stricken head, revealing something missing from it, to say the least, it wasn’t only the missing pair he fancied he’d have. Not a single patch raised but went down. ‘I suppose you’re not that intelligent either. ‘Jonathan felt repulsed by the creature as he said it. Not only had it flown out of his mouth, but it had also been accompanied by a general feel of disturbance and disgust he refused to shake away. There was something seriously unnerving about him which he couldn’t shake away. Grated by the only thing he could pass himself as; he barged in and pushed the merchant aside. ‘You’re useless to us; I think I’ll choose exploring my way down there than paying you any more attention that I need. ‘ ‘Without a light?Without your friend? ‘ ‘He will follow me, won’t you? ‘After the first steps in, though it was blurry and somewhat improperly lit, there was thing unnerving stench of a thing, it wasn’t mean to be exactly what he had supposed, or even conditioned himself to look at, but it was something which shook him off. A wondering gull in the sea, a strapped buckle which rested in his waist, going as deep as to push pain he didn’t deserve. ‘You’ll only encounter pain and self-pity down there, you know that? ‘ ‘I can take you; I can take all of you. Perhaps you chose the wrong man, or you haven’t even considered me a man, to think I’d simply waste my time laboring there. ‘ ‘I’ll offer you a great pay. ‘The cretin followed him without even thinking. What was the point of shiny coins if there wasn’t anything to spend them on? What had been revealed to me was truly, their vile nature. It was repelling, disgusting, disturbing. How could someone even force himself to exploit such a creature, even after seeing that a piece of his mind was still missing?Vaguely, I considered going ahead and warning, going as far as trying to get his attention then. ‘Hey Michk, come here a moment, will you? ‘But his eyes were lost. His heart wasn’t his any longer, as he gave in to the promises of the wool-taker, that crooked faced, slightly bent disgusting degenerating fiend, which was barely kept together by the soles of the wires which came in and out of his body at all times. Forced or not, I felt pity for both of them and headed down myself, alone. Hearing only the yearning shouts as they came about me. ‘Don’t you need a light?A light or a fire, I’ll sell you a lamp. ‘The fluke that creature was hadn’t disturbed me as much as his lies had. To even claim otherwise would be slightly deceitful; as I had noticed a series of lights which suddenly came on the farther I went on. A cheat as well, if one couldn’t tell of proper from cold, this place was the place in-between unlivable degrees. The strange surroundings seemed to bring nothing but a solid sea which threw its waves everywhere around, forming wild structures and estranged buildings which were sometimes unreachable. Stairs would grow otherwise the same as men, even bearing the bodies they had bore. Stones-like brooding spiders and plenty of black woolen flowers surrounded the land. A pair of a few shores, sheer platforms and standing upper levels were present there. Neither of them were connected, and the distance below would wager a fall to the point of incidental decease if one were to fall between the gaps. It should be a bothersome process for a few. The pressure was starting to accumulate with each second which was spared. A general area of growth had been instilled by the time he had arrived there. 'Is anyone there?' His voice was abruptly stopped by the mere realization that life had been stricken down. A side of the wool revealed their own standing tuff, in which most of the inhibitors had become unrecognizable. I could see the reason for it, though I had not chosen to stay there and wonder what peril might throw at me. A confession was in order to somehow explain the cowardice which had been displayed. Of the same reason that I have decided it would be right to abandon a piece of me there. 'Why, yes, I fancy myself a cutter. 'With the stroke of one finger, I managed to release a piece of my wrist, just so I could finish this entrance of mine properly. To no surprise would I say that I have found myself sitting around the corners, brushing past the wools, until I saw the amount of fish guts pulling out. And they were mine, though not in the way I could even think of it. An entire digestive system rested in my veins. Once I had expelled the fish out, what had remained instead of it had been the leaping tenderness which came out. A dark bluish green started pouring into the air. 'I should say that I have changed a bit while I was there. 'His voice poured out and he wasn't with them any longer. As for the air around him, the thickets of wool pulled away. In the short while he had been completely changed. For once the pain that has influenced the change had been thoroughly heard outside and appeared to still be going on. After all this time they were suffering past the walls, no one had the decency to put them out of their misery. I was somewhat set on looking around, trying to open the door and see it for myself but for now I had only rested with trying to push ahead until I could try again. My limbs were somewhat ill and I could only push it still. 'Open the door now. 'My voice had sprouted like a spring of hay. Each intonation of my voice had managed to get through the door, eating through the metal, striking with their clapping feet as they marched towards the bloodbath. I had been riding through the masses like the vision of death and plague, looking from behind by my mindless companion as well as the merchant as I made my way not so far. From where they stood, these restless fools could only sit, waiting for my arrival. 'I remember this face. I know now that I must do well in order to put you out of your misery. If you're allowed to live here, you may alarm the others, not from here, but from there. 'Now they came out, surprised at how I managed to rip off the door. Some likes could never be compared with the dreadful magnificence I showed with my countenance and how I was to present myself. 'This is what they made out of me. 'My speech had been completely muddled by the mere fact that I ought not to have survived this sudden reveal. My chest had not been prepared for the image I had shown them. A rundown of scars revealed that something had crawled into me. With my fingers, a strike came over which ripped just about everything into fine motions. Exactly what I had been in need of, I seem to have survived much less and much more than that. But what I hid inside of me was this tiny barbed creature, the hunched back having encompassed most of the body, leaving only a few features recognizable not from a facial standpoint, but from a flat, metal case which had been pushed inside of it. 'Here's the lock of ages. As soon as I will find the king, he shall grant me a key in order to remove the disease from this place, and the complete sourness which crept inside of it. ' 'Who is he? The king, I want to know, who is he? ' 'Be gone, vile wool draggler, you are banished back into your filth-hole where you may reign alone, unable to be set in the throngs akin to the likes of your brothers. 'To which, this perilous thing dared laugh at my face. 'And how will you do that now? I can see right through you with every step and every fancy you've taken. You're no god, nor do you hold any power over me. 'Of course I couldn't claim to be that. What I would do instead would revert to me showing what ought to happen to those who showed disobedience to a higher being. He ought to be made an example of. I approached him, slowly. As if he'd drag his feet off the table, he sneered as I drew near and grabbed him by the legs. 'What are you doing to me?' 'A strike was enough to trip him off. He fell from his high horse, on which he didn't belong, sitting now forever, as he would be dragged on. 'I feared that in the past, you know that? Don't worry, you should be able to be dragged by your servant, what was it? Muck, right, the one who had betrayed me. ' 'I didn't do it in person. '

'Don't interrupt me now, I haven't finished yet. 'Jonathan thought for a moment that his name had become somewhat unfitting for such a great person as he'd be. It would not be in his best interest to wait or even produce as much as single vow for them to hear. As he neared the age. 'Rotthram, I suppose that would be the fitting name. I could see it. 'As he did behave, he pushed out of another door, to steer himself, holding to the edges as he stared at the fall. 'Come here, both of you. Drag him if you must, but both of you need to see this now. 'A field of dead sparrows lay, but a field nonetheless. The sky had been exposed to them, where a giant wingless crow chewed the moon in order to impress the one on the planet, who was eating. Pieces of the ones that were breeding for their master, in the growth between the legs, it would seem likely that there'd be no other way but forward from now. 'I have done it; I have found a way out. 'Getting down there hadn't been difficult at all. As a matter of fact, it was the end of the sparrow line, as it appeared to be. 'You don't need to carry me any longer; I think I'll be able to use my hands. 'The wool merchant leaped as he started going back on it, trying to make a profit out of anything he could get his hand on. No resentment would last. More than I could afford looking around me, I was set to draw some of them out from the hiding. Some of them hid inside the soil. A few survivors made their way through, making it so their presence was noticed. Rotthram nonchalantly peered in. It was nonetheless someplace which got closed on the way back. Where the door had been, where the whole complex stood, reality appeared to have closed its gap, never allowing any kind of entry to be had. It would seem like this is where they'd stand. Lost but at the same time contempt. 'Rotthram, help me get up, I won't bite you, trust me on this. ' 'If this is one of your tricks. ' 'Don't worry, I'm not trying to fight you. I only want a better view of the land. ' 'There's nothing out there, just this endless sea of sparrows. 'They were so little and frail compared to the other birds. Though there wasn't any way of knowing what happened here, with the little doubt in mind that he had. It wasn't something any of us had as little contempt for as we claimed to have. At times I looked and saw them recede back into their sparrow-holes only to be met by the lack of an appearance, the fear I felt overdriving my senses in some distant numbness I could feel again. It's been a while I felt warm and this place was just as hellishly frozen as everywhere else I had been sent forth to. Blue moods were somehow lost to me. 'Hop on; I'll let you have the grandest view you could have. 'As much as he repulsed him, that's what he was left with. Only the three of them remained. Sparrows would darken even more until they looked like the ink marks of a wooden carved spoil. There was a beauty to them as the mood fell on top of them, like a falling mist which dragged from on top the moon. Buildings were sparse and a civilization of sparrows hadn't remained. Instead, we walked, for hours at that. 'You know, Rot, now that I think about it, you never actually. ' 'I know. 'Michk's face was still tender and adjourned. Something about it made me think of home, not where I lived, but where I woke up and where I had been. On the ship I had been lost, here, now I lay at that, near two men I had known close to nothing, to their bitter bones. And strange appearances, I couldn't distance myself from nearing my lost years. It wasn't who I was. For reasons I couldn't think of, I was sad. It was a selfish thing at that, but I let him go. 'I'll strike you again. This should connect your broken tendons and you ought to walk again. If it's by your choice, I shall let you go wherever the wind might take you. ' 'I cannot do with that. Not yet, I think I'll hold onto them for a while, you know? I've come realize that, perhaps I should see the world from where I stand, young one. My wools have taken too great a piece of my life, you know? And I've come to regret it. Even if I don't know anything else I could do yet, I will feel just as lost if I were to return back. ' 'Then it's settled, you shall rest on my shoulders for a while, Wool merchant. If you decide it's time for your to part ways as any time, be it on your own legs, or left as you may, I shall do my best to bid to your wishes as you want. 'Parted or not, I had been set back on track. We were to make it towards the farthest point and walk on ledges and near the hedges of iron and the lost. 'What's that? 'The two of them stopped. It felt like a scene was to be witness and forlorn. Lost to the blasted paces on the piece of rock where they stood. Half a bird stood there, kept in check, as the others pecked at the stone in an attempt to get her back. It seemed like one of the giant feathers fell from above, cutting her in half, breaking the stone. Sharpened like an arrow, but fashioned like a falling blade, only thing reminiscent trinket remained. It wasn't preposterous to even consider it anything but the lost mark of a lost way. But the edges of the gulfs in which the rock faded seemed to be falling near the sea of shone, where glittering corpses had begun to rot, sparrow bones picked up by the ones who dig the holes. Another body was to be buried. 'They would need all the help they could get, wouldn't they? ' 'But this would take us forever, digging so many graves for all of them. We would never get to find out if there was anyone alive here, people like us or even others who escaped before. ' 'Enough. I don't know why, but I think this is what I'm here for. I cannot be certain whether or not this will ever stand the chance to make me feel warm again, but I know nothing else but the need to try. I've tried exhausting myself and pushing forth, only to fall back again. Perhaps there might be something out there waiting for you, but I know that this is what I'm supposed to do. 'Exhausted as they both were, they chose this instead, one using his arms, the other watching and sneering as I had begun. In a distant house, past the frontiers of battle, there was a great view to the great sparrow citadel in the back. And to its own credit, most of the architecture, though it was refashioned in the image of the crow-creature. Fading away. Liberation hadn't been an idea many looked kindly upon. There were a few hours a soldier could look back into without knowing what had happened or what ought to be the grim fortune awaiting those who'd shoot a gun. A man still walked on the fields, watching his guns resting on a whim. He had been called, the Compatriot. Some called him false, to no a single shimmer lost. He rested against a tree on the veil of waiting, down to see. A single town rested down the drift. Cobbled streets and high tops were there, a general atmosphere for smokers which reflected on the wooden hinges and the strange window trances held by the wooden pillar, wrought for work. The city still had one of its great sides under reconstruction. As a way to make sure there would not be any incidents, a few of the troops were set there. It was fantastic, yet deplorable. Too many of them were stationed there for some reason he couldn't tell. 'Stand straight men. I hope you know that this city will not be realized under false eyes, so get back at it. 'He still had some color in his moustache. But his face was still tender. Stiffened by the rain, he rested near a door frame. Humming an old song as biles were being sold, rats, snakes and even frogs of packs. Some petty wolves which were the sizes of the so-called mice, who looked just as ugly, were there. I can still punch one and feel the ribs cracking under each of my finger before I could taste the opium in the waters. But what had put me down. All of us as a matter of fact was that circumstance we found ourselves in. Petty men holding guns, I thought of barging in over the street. 'Drop it kid, you don't want to do it. 'He was facing an older man, someone whom he had some quarrel with. He would make a scene. And I ought to do something about it. Somehow, I knew that I would forget myself and start punching or kicking in. Perhaps I should know better. But I haven't reached that point yet, not while still wearing the uniform. It meant something to be then. 'See this medal kid? If you ought to put one in someone, aim for the star. Each of the four sides signals my allegiance for them. Call them what you like, murderers, scum, fashioned killers, plum men, and then. Spare the man. 'The boy babbled. It wasn't something I wanted to her. Blurred, I jumped over something I wasn't going to indulge. Street messers were now staring at the boy with his gun. Still pointed at the drunk who was pacing ahead, barely aware the danger, I came to realize that he wasn't going to make it. It was a crude depiction of the day to day life there. Painted alcoves in oil, ships going off the schedule, fishermen on the strike and this now. Insurgence on the cobble-plains, and the constant sound of drums going in the distance took me to a farther world, anything to avoid turning home. A few more months here and I could simply get away. 'Drop the gun, boy; it's not worth ruining your life over it. As soon as you open fire I will tackle you down and give you enough of a beating to make that you'll get used to the next twenty spent to prison. Listen to me; you're a damn child, not a soldier. 'I made my way through and gently grasped his forearm. Though I dared not make a second move, not whilst knowing how close he had been to pulling the trigger, relaxing his hand. He ran. Through a smoke cloud which got me going off the yank, the little devil had some assistance. 'Soldier, steady now, steady now! Only the sounds of a gunshot were heard in that emerging chaos. It wasn't something I looked into with pleasure. For my sake alone, I was supposed to go after him and follow. 'To the roof, come on, I know a way in. 'A brigade pushed through the ranks and I took the lead to follow. A few corridors followed and I felt suddenly perturbed by the confused messes who hadn't even come to pass yet. Choking on the streets and trying to stray away had been a matter of peculiarity I refused to think off. We were intruding now, breaking through people's houses, we were drawn in to a place neither of us belonged to. I could feel myself trying to pull off something a cord off the wall, just to follow another track. 'What did you find? ' 'I don't know. 'My hand had slipped over it by accident and I had acted upon the first impulse. Perfidious squares on the tapestry went off the touch as soon as I started pulling, never taking off as much as a single moment before coming into contact with the system. It tore a hole through the ceiling. As soon as I had a proper sight, I could see something in the distance, looking right through it where nothing should've been there. For what I had known about this building, or to my general knowledge of architecture, call it even common sense, it was impossible that an empty space of that size would be there. Standing here, in this exact angle near the wall gave me a good sight to what almost appeared to be an entire whole level which surrounded the building. 'Admiring something, Hern? Come on now, they're getting away. 'A few more floors waited ahead. I followed instead of going ahead to inspect what was going on. If there was a better way to look into it, I would've taken in. But this will have to wait for much longer. More than a few soldiers made their way through and broke the first gate leading to the ceiling. Suffice to say, neither of them were too much bent over what we were going through. An expectation still steeped into us, we were supposed to hunt down and put down a bunch of children. 'They've did a number on the roof tiles, I see. The whole place looks like it had been converted into their hideout. 'We were still carefully treading. Or they were the scouts. Bridges and ropes connected most of the buildings. Some of the older chimneys had been converted into small houses as well, bearing tiny doors which only made them check even further. ‘Empty. ‘ ‘This one is empty as well. ‘Another response triggered something close to a misfire as a pair of cats started leaping out of it. Damned children just had to make their jobs so much harder, aye? ‘Scout every perimeter and find those children. I want to find out their name, which they are and how they got a hold on those smoke bombs and the gun. ‘My first instinct was that they were something close to being strays. I’ve tried to act decent with the boy. Before coming here, I even rushed too quickly without daring to check whether or not the man was still alive. Without any sole confirmation, my mind took to place. From this spot, I would get more than a good view to what was going on around the city scrape. It wasn’t right. Way too many people were gathering around the scene, which hadn’t been a good sight. For either of us, this meant that sooner or later we would have to deal with serious crime rather than some troublemakers messing around. What are you even thinking? The boy had a gun on him. It was harsh already as it was. Going by the same tracks, I couldn’t help it, still, but think about it. Why would a kid like him risk his future that way? ‘What did the boy look like? ‘One of the younger soldiers asked me. I was still in the general area, waiting with the few soldiers between the last level in the building, the staircase and the entrance to the roof areas. ‘Kind of beaten and worn. A white shirt and light haired, light eyed, perhaps some dirt on his face. He didn’t look dangerous, despite, you know. I think it was the first time he had held a gun, and I’m willing to bet that this hadn’t been entirely planned. ‘ ‘So what now? A bunch of stray kids living on the roofs find a gun and decide to threaten a drunk? ‘ ‘There’s more to it seems. I. ‘Kept everything to myself, perhaps it was something I ought to hold it to myself. Unless the kid gets caught and decided to spill it again, I would resolve to wait and look around. This city was dark, still. Smoke was still coming out the walls instead of their working pipes. And the watch was just about to light the fires in the distance and give the general alarm. It would be kind of a sign off the block to look away now. Some of them weren’t actually trying to capture them, but, rifles rested on their shoulders. However dangerous they claimed to be, I didn’t see a point into bringing them there. The damage had been done already. Way more people gathered around the place than the initial estimate carried in. ‘We’ll have to go do something. ‘ ‘It’s early, the scouts haven’t even returned yet. ‘But that wasn’t his concern yet. We went through with it nonetheless. A few untrained men joined us from the back, all wearing the same blue overalls, coated with a white stripe around the edges of their well buttoned suits. Strange almost conquistadores helmets rested on top of all of their heads, bearing the symbol of the vigil-bird. Each carried a small lamp, a knife, a rapier and another smaller firearm besides their rifles. And there was another thing they had on them. Something I wish I had just in case any emergency appeared to be trifling south. Pneumatic packs behind them. Despite ruining their shirts, they were attached to their skins and spine, constantly feeding them the jitters. Commentaries revealed more than enough about the packs and I had come to realize that the risks for using them were associated with the most dreadful maladies someone could think of the top of my head. It was a dead device they had all took on them to carry on with. Everyone knew just what the strange consequences would be. Starting with the mere chance that the packs would be permanently welded to them, feeding not only impulses but shocks from the distance. By and by, not a single man managed to escape unscathed from the weird process they had set themselves against. As a reminder for it, they leaped over the bridges, forcing their extra sensory appliances to give a way in. More effort meant the devices would submit and give less trouble. Some distant time before this, it used to be much easier to direct the men. At times I started to wonder whether or not I was being sidetracked somehow, wondering whether or not they listened to me or the signals they were receiving in their heads. Though I may be a relic of the past, I still had something going on for me and I wasn't willing to give it away just yet. Some time before we penetrated through one of the wings, we have found a hideout. But, it had been a bitter-sweet victory, at the orders of a man I couldn't even find worthy to address yet. He had been still so insecure about showing himself that I had vaguely decided he would be inexistent. A higher up that was looming around, taking directly through their head. Now and again, a soldier would come to me, vaguely addressing what would seem to be a maiden's name. Which I had assumed to be a projection of another person he was talking through and then. The order. 'You are to remain here and avert your eyes from what's going on. ' 'Why would that be? ' 'I cannot stress it wild enough, but our leader has given us an order. ' 'That's sudden. Well, tell your leader that until he comes here and steps in himself, I'll see what's going on around the place for me. 'He didn't dare talk again. I could see something of a closely bidden desire to protest, which was quickly dismissed as I progressed through the broken roof. Though, to be well honest about it, the whole top of the building had been a result of an explosion. Long before we came either way, but this was something more important. What everyone gathered around, just like in another scene, was a boy. Not the same one had escaped but another one. 'He's a blasted orphan, this isn't a loss. ' 'Who took him down?Hell, I'm a high ranking officer of the division, I demand you reveal to me who shot him. 'Mouths moved. A name would've been enough if it weren't for the fact that they all pretended that it was a miss-fire. All of them were executioners from the looks of it. Around the wall and just about two hindrances of the floor, there were enough bullet holes to signal the fact that they had all went in with everything they had. No excuse could lay them off that easily. I had seen plenty of murderers, even child killers before. But they were different. Cold blooded and struck eyed. It wasn't even something they dwelled on long enough before a few more scouts arrived. We were to go ahead and look for someone else. 'We spotted a few more children and older ones in the nearer areas; they might be in league with the one that fled. We should begin our advancement now if we're to catch them in time. 'The despots spoke. I followed. They didn't even give me the time to wrap something around him. Tying the know hadn't been an easy task for anyone standing there. I was caught off guard, staying there, stranded, lost, socket. But I went ahead and followed, like a good soldier. I obeyed. Crows gathered and started eating something off the boy. It was something I barely managed to miss even though I hadn't wanted to have to deal with it. I was made uncomfortable by the stay. We were sent on wild chases which didn't result into use getting anywhere at all. Had they been widespread all time? Had I missed something which shouldn't be there? No one answered my questions any longer. Likely, when they were set on a mission, they simply forgot what the difference between the cordial blocks of stone and I. For I wasn't a part of them, as I've come to know. I wasn't that thing implanted in their backs; I was something worse than that. What I symbolized had become meaningless and lost to the ears around me. Had I even been wanted there? I couldn't think of a good reason for having been sent here. I was much slower than they were, less likely to simply accept whatever order they received and most importantly, I hadn't a simple clue just what was wrong with them, unapologetically shooting off a child. If it were one, that would be well opposed, but they all shot at him without thinking, and I had been merely wondering whether or not this was to be the place where they'd stop.

Small steps, filled with dirt, I've noticed them somewhere before. Perhaps on the streets, or somewhere in the building, whichever it might be. Somehow, this had been made worse by the fact that there were a few dead leads, tracks which were being lost and most importantly, the fact that they crawled in some apartment. 'Join us. 'Came a voice, which I had not know, which had been barely audible, but which could not be denied as to belong to one of the strange children I had been chasing all day. Despite as hard of a leap as it would be, I took a head start and landed near the edge belonging to the sparrow-tiles. We were the ones who came after. It may not mean much to you, or anyone else, but. Piling up everything was a mistake. We were stacking up corpses now, after finding out three more of them in a spot. At least I have. Gloomy as it may be, I couldn't advert my eyes any longer. There was nothing but silence then. No guns, no rapiers or anything on him. The Compatriot knelt. It wasn't the city which was at the cause, it was nothing in particular. Thoughts were simpler on the streets. Wake up, get along, walk over the few stranded feet, and then back to the posts. Accents would rail up the coming of the sun, the piling of the salt winds, which came from the sea, where fishermen dried their leaves, leaving up for the fealty and the displeased Doyle. He had been another victim of another vile circumstance at play. Where he rested now, with an inch besides the grave, he rested on the ground in pieces, toes missing and a fealty as he lost. A duel was a must. And to his murderer, who stood behind him grinning, there was nothing but the slightest wincing. Against his eyes there was only a single cut of the cheek. Just about the only cut he had managed to piece on top of him. With as little as an effort to raise his eyes, the colors of his cries never making through, he saw the ships sailing off the port in a blue of bitter hue. Standing by the edges of the water, where the dense strings of fish came, what lay in them was just a piece of the man. In a few minutes only, he would be done disposing of him, then. He would return, back to mourning after taking turns reminding him of how he came behind the blinds. Striking him one before making up his mind, what could I do to this miserable pest? 'It was just about then that he came across the two others standing nearest to their desks, unable to get up from where they stood. A misunderstanding ensued. He would perform in front of them, as witnesses unable to confess. Under the stress of words, caught amidst the stones, though he stopped his fall as he twisted his own ankle just in time to turn and see his assailant attack. 'It's you. 'The man said, bursting out his vocal chords in an attempt to marvel at the slightest touches, the dances merely being lost. No subtlety was given as he would spend the last moment of his life shivering off in the cold, waiting to be finished by the old man who stared at him. He bore a colt which had been emptied just as he charged at sitting man. A few shots ended up going through his head, pursed by the lip and lost to the tip of the bed. Part of the street they were on had been conjoined by an apparent room which sunk and melted as it had become, a part of the ground, and the missing pieces of the gone shrubberies. The cats which went missing were there as well, lost as they had become a par of the green as well as up to them; they came near, drinking of the spilling as the blows neared. Something of him remained impure, lost to some obscure hammer he carried but fell. Least of all, the top of his head went weeping, out of some contrast, and a loss. To even consider it a fair fight would be an insult to the must. 'I must get away. 'He spoke, but verdure stopped him as his heels became green. A grin emerged from them as well as another hand which pulled him in. Before the quarter of him had been dragged back, he felt the whispers which put him back on track. A piece of the emerging hand had stopped developing humanely at the wrist, being commuted only by a fragment of a long metal blue spear which continued to the marvelous chest, the magnificent jest this creature had produced. It would be immeasurable now, the amount of force it could induce just by the eye through which it came to speak. 'Get ready of the body and I shall allow you in. You know that there are too many people who have witnessed your crime. If you don't escape now, you'll only have to. 'He pursed his lips in an attempt to condense the way through which he had revved in. As well as he could tell, the entire place was full and dull, leading into a twisted realm from which he crawled. An under-turned tourney chamber, which lead to a grate below. From there he could hear the tourney as it would unfold. 'Bring in the others; we want to hear the show. ' 'We need strong fighters to entertain the ones that are there. If you don't join us now, we'll have to go alone. But if you do refuse, know that you'll be hanged, for all of the crimes you have committed now. ' 'Wait, don't leave me yet, I'm listening. I know where I stand. I cannot help myself now. Can't I simply take the corpse in? I'll do what it takes, even if I have to eat it or used it as a piece of armor, or some weapon, anything but don't take away the offer. ' 'First the body, then we'll talk. 'And afterwards, he had been thrown out. Without a second word of going, without given advice. He looked upon the mess and some of the missing pieces which had been taken away by the cats and went back to his doings. It would be the last time he could cross through the street. Paved by his tears and fears of being caught, Voghn got sloppy and forgot just who dwelled there and how many of them went in, nearing the hidings where they'd stand low. It was an uncanny deal which lasted more than the original intention had been. To look at it otherwise would only bring us closer to understanding how awful the menace he presented was. From two steps, into the river he went. A body which, despite the amount of lookers who had seen the act in motion wouldn't even get to the point of walking in again. It was a miserable thing, to even consider going around. I would happily supply the amount of blood needed by the sea. For, by the time the victim had been reclaimed, they had found something quite bizarre which happened in his body. With the marks having been accounted for, it looked like the sea had drained it entirely of all the vital fluid. Indeed, as much as he had been chopped into pieces, picked up by the sailors and the verdict given by the medics who were present there, he had not died out of some kind of batter. 'What happened down there? ' 'Jump and find out if you're interested in finding out about the manual labor. 'I wouldn't last there, but I had to know. Detective or not, this was the task of a humanitarian who needed to find out exactly what ought to happen to the strangers who dwelled where they didn't belong. Otherwise, I could account for nothing else in my mind. At least nothing other than those who strangled themselves in the summer, on the fields. Work was hard surrounding the countryside around the city. It hadn't been any wonder just why there were no children allowed to play in the hay. 'Before you do that, sir, I think there's something else you need to consider. ' 'What would that be? 'Without a shrieking convenience, there had been that story which every man had been made aware of. Rhyme or reason didn't dictate as much as a single worn worm. Which would be enough for what followed. 'I found enough dirt in his pocket to determine from where he came out of. ' 'Spill it then, what is it, man? ' 'He's one of the grave-diggers. ' 'Who? 'He didn't know, yet it was the king of ignorance which would be accepted. 'It's one of the men who works near the hay fields, in the quagmire, where the cemeteries are placed on tiny ships and allowed to go ahead. Usually they'd put just enough coffins and dirt in them, allowing them to sail just about in every place they'd need to be. Don't be surprised now that you didn't know. It's not something we're kindly sharing. ' 'How can a ship sail in a quagmire? ' 'Well, it's one of their secrets, and apparently, I'd say that there's a good chance this made had almost been forced to spill it all out. 'Just a few hours earlier, it seemed like they were both at a bar. A man in the blinds and the digger, trying to get just another drink before going to tarnish the secrets of sailing. 'Another round for the man, it's on the house this time. ' 'Goody, goody, I could do with another drink. Say, mister, will you join me? ‘ He was silent, standing there perplex. Over the counter, in the back, they were working. Office-pliers, who were marking white sheets with black-blooded runes in means to serve some stranger from the watching eyes above the ceiling. Its presence was felt, but feeling through itself, there was that display of a few drunks which had been taken inside, felt even as part of the show. No one wanted to end up in the same way as they had. To even claim it otherwise would mean, it would mean the death of the liver. Whichever eye was his, he couldn’t tell. ‘You’re missing one of them. ‘I told the drunk. He had already managed to stack a few of them over the counter, piling just a few pills to go, sniffing a tiny cup filled with plain water. I felt like punching him ever since that moment. When I had come to see what he had pushed in his cup. There was this strange device which manifested itself through some kind of neurotic-enchanted. He was contently being shocked through the insides of his neck by what appeared to be the whole mold of a hand. ‘I think it’s time to stop, old man. ‘ ‘Old man? You’re the old talking, stranger; you’re much older than what I am. ‘ ‘You want to end up like them, up there? ‘A chair-like tendon manifested, tiniest but overstretches, stacked on pieces of it which had duplicated on top of one another in order to make as much as it was needed. Without a way to look in, he felt like it was time to begin again. It may seem bizarre but the more he watched the grave-digger in action, the more bizarre it had become. A rue-like brooding thing, as much as it seemed, entered him. He manifested a strange persona, all of the sudden, which turned his eyes into the blue-almost silver-like drive which had been present in the opium abusers. It wasn’t just the drink and that. But the tiny marks, like the stings of bees and antlers which appeared all over his arms. From each of them there came just enough wild wrums, which pushed through until he couldn’t count on his own senses any longer. ‘Well, you may be too far gone now. ‘ ‘Here’s your order, sir. ‘A waiter approached. He was a strange figure made out of eight pieces which weren’t tied to his body or trunk but to his head instead, leading out of the neck, most likely directly attached to a brain that refused to work. From his deepest anchored persona-like nods, he appeared to be standing still. Despite him looking like a plastic creature which hadn’t formed itself properly, I was taken back by the amount of weirdness it displayed. Fear and brightness would come as they would pass. From underneath the hole came the strongest light. It poured out of him with a sick radiance which cut through my toes. ‘Don’t let your guard down now, not here, you know you can’t be safe anywhere, can you? ‘That wasn’t the point, it wasn’t the point, I didn’t want to be here to experience the jolting feet which crept to me as soon as I could observe. It simply wasn’t my choice to be here. But I was drawn to him, for the crest inside my head forced me to do what I had been meant to do and kill the man before the sun set down. ‘A drink for me as well, he said, has he not said it? I want a drink, give me a damn drink, my neck is perched and I feel like. ‘Drawing too much attention to myself when it was highly unnecessary to do it. For the same reason, I had managed to convince him to have my drink and keep doing so, despite my previous advice, being seen as only a friendly reminder of the fact that I was indeed planning to play the double. ‘Don’t drink too much my friend, you’d only get yourself sick and unable to go back to wherever you may have went on the previous visits. ‘ ‘Oh but you’re such a good host, why would I decline such an offer now, especially since you’re trying to jest me time after time. ‘There was something familiar about it. ‘Say, you sound like someone who’s been to places, right? Wouldn’t you be able to tell me where could I find the province of Quarkquire? ‘ ‘Willy-nilly, getting us to places, I see, but I don’t know if I could trust you enough. What was that? ‘ ‘The Quagmire, I said, the Quagmire, where is it? The place where the dead are being sent to when they’re not needed any longer. I wish to know, I need to find them in time.

My dear siblings are caught in one of the coffins, placed there while they're still alive. You wouldn't want something to happen to them, would you now? 'But my mind, as much as it was good at creating lies seemed to dwell on a piece, distantly lost in a memory which, amidst the others stood out. A piece of history, of the past was still being watched, even erased, blinded as it would become a mess. It was a catalogue he had to deliver to some hunter that only rang now. But why would it act so sudden without a way of looking back? I was strained, I was caught by a desire to prize myself and run away. No one would catch me if I were to rush to one of the ships, or if I simply were to go ahead and miss one of the beats of thunder, the moisture of the skin which would be cut off and set to plunder. 'Off with you now, I think we have nothing to discuss any longer. ' 'What? 'The reason for his silence was vastly unspoken for. I was sublimely provoked by this man and by the waiter who returned. 'You heard the man, I shall not bring you any drink. Not with that wily attitude of yours. ' 'Enough with the jokes, I've come here for something. 'But the bar was shaken off. I could feel the surroundings being completely encompassed by the gloom. Everywhere I could even look around was unsafe and I've come to fear myself and everything which would even move as much as an inch in the wrong direction. There were assassins here, planted near the walls. I've heard the stories. Don't make too much noise and don't make too humble of an attempt. Later, even to them, it seemed that there'd be no victim which would be too heavy to be seen as a target. For this division and the branch, were nothing akin to those of stories, but indeed, were implants. They weren't human, but tinted pieces of various devices which had assembled themselves into bigger forms. From where they went, ahead they'd snatch, pieces of their surroundings, growing in as much. Brains and through the water, on the streets and just about anything touched. Nothing was safe from this assassination module which stretched as far as its desire to completely turn the world into something new. Something better, a great processor which would dictate on life as it ought to be. Any incompetence would be completely removed from life. Strange as it may seem to be, I could not look into it otherwise. My hands were struck; I reached for the waiter and pulled it off, just the heart which controlled it all. Like a mask, his head would fall. In as much as a few seconds I saw him jerk and fall, with the ones standing at their desks unable to call. Help would be undermined by the fact that what they were doing there was illegal. With the few other words which had been written in, I had come into contact with the sight of the falling debris from above. It wasn't hard per say, but the means justified the ends. It was a creature they were meaning to feed. Had it been the time already for me to go? I couldn't tell. 'Go as you may and take no stop. ' 'We cannot promise we won't tell if we'll get caught as well. ' 'But that man is yours. 'It was now that he started feeling uncomfortable. And the thing is, I wasn't the one who killed him. No, he would've expected in. And it had been in my power, but someone else made his wait through. 'I witnessed the man who had killed him. 'A voice alarmed both the detective and the inspector, who stared, even momentarily at the figure that showed itself rightfully announced. 'Call me whatever you want, but in truth, I'm nothing but a witness to the crime, and no accomplice to him. 'I was set to answer as many questions as they'd throw at me, whatever the case, regardless of the fact, that I were to be suspected for all but none of the crimes I had committed. Rested by the ear, I wouldn't even dare to fear what they'd say. 'Arrest the man; we'll interrogate him as soon as we hit the barracks. It looks like your skinny dipping session will have to wait for a while, now we're. 'We were set, but I had seen enough. Whoever he was acted fast. Both the detective and the inspector had been completely cut into pieces just in front of my eyes. The culprit could be no one else but him.

Around us, not even the soldiers could come to believe what happened. Less than a few seconds in said more about this scene than the other. 'Get away from me, it only wants me. 'I spoke with an inclination to follow them through. Stubbornness took a few of them over, as they refused to give in and listen to the felon. 'Don't you move, villain, I've seen it happen. I know you're the one who killed them just like you have killed him. 'The case and the hook were taken, bait or not, it didn't matter. As long as they stepped ahead, not a single should would be safe from the danger which pronounced itself part the irrefutable proof. I was one of them, lost, walking away. I had been shot in the leg immediately after, trying to get a hold on the only think which remained of my dignity. Despite my warnings they approached and faced nothing else but that sweet agony, joining in their fate together. A single soul had been spared from this cruelty and that had been I. For I alone chose to wait it out, while this happened as far from the place common sense dictated. A fear neared to me as I chose to draw as far away as I could. It was important, to even consider the fact that I had only been allowed to live because it wanted me to watch him change. From that thin pale, nobody which could be as lost in a crowd as needle in a row of hay-land, he sudden imploded from within. Every strand of yellow had become metallic and before the stable master could realize, the horse was choking in needles of hay. By his hands and body, a few pains of hands and arms, and faces contorted, until he looked like a half-wheel which pushed ahead as many features as there could be popped until he looked completely out of place.

Instead of trying to hide himself, whatever appeal this had been, he told me this. 'I shall show you what I am, instead of trying to hid into even more shells of the human body. Know that no one had seen me before. 'To this, what I will say is that I saw the red chitin come out, a strange being reside in that self-made effigy in which he hid. Discarded on the alleys, the skin and features crawled away and one perfect being emerged. A pure reddish-blue seemed to be dominant, equally on just about every piece of it. In the structure, it had been mobile, a quadruped which seemed to beat for each of its legs, all-encompassing pincer like domes which opened and closed revealing smaller domes that were much softer. I could see them pulsating, only to reveal what I feared most, the pupils which would stare. Worse than that, the domed eyes started releasing themselves from inside their holding cages as they would fly over, allowing from a breathing time. As for the other strangeness, I could see them grow them again, at such a rate that I started doubting that it was actually creating them and began suspecting that it was summoning them from an endless supply from another dimension no man had ever put a foot on. I was onset. Onto the fact I'd say, nothing personal to my chest would pump and lay. In fact, I thought I would suffer some kind of stroke unless it stopped this mad ritual at once. 'Please, force yourself to stop. I cannot and will not take this any longer. 'Yet it continued performing as if the show had been paid for. Respecting myself no longer, I gave in, rather than struggle, as the pain from the shot was still way too tremendous for me to fight it off. Endurance would be denied and I would see the eyes cry away as they would be torn apart by the oxygen. 'That's their fate into this world. As soon as I will see reason for a way out, as soon as I'll have found a way to keep them alive, then my purpose should have been satisfied. For that reason I have been chosen to leave. I was to prove myself worthy to be a contender, a fighter, a warrior, someone who could bring justice and glory to the name and to my species. And it can't be denied that the murders that I've committed haven't satisfied me, old man. ' 'But how could you say such a terrible thing? Not only have you caused great harm but you also framed me in the most horrible manner. Why? ' 'Why? It's such a simple question that no simple answer would suffice. I was taken here. Against my will, as I might add. For that reason, I don't need to justify anything. Instead, I think I'll pick the lack of faith through which I shall scour your body of resourced and rip you apart. How does that sound? Would you happen to be squeamish? Perhaps not that great of a pain taker? I couldn't help it but ask, you see? Ever since I was a larva, I had a think for pain. Perhaps I'm unique that way, but I had developed a kind consciousness which made feel the pain of others, which indeed made me wish

I could harm them more. 'It approached me as it spoke. I couldn't even see myself trying to get away from the converging brute which threw itself at me. However frightened as I was, there was this one deal I had almost come to refuse to give away. But I was pressed to do it. 'Don't kill me, I know of a way out for you. ' 'Silly creature, do you seriously think you could trick Quilkszluh? 'That was worth a chance, but I couldn't fight. It tore through me and threw me way back, standing with a gap in my soul and body, sold for pieces, thrown in the sea with the rest of them. 'Now that I have completed my task, it's time for my reward to continue. I hope my acts were witnessed and judged, and I could only hope that my bloodthirsty nature had been completely observed. 'A bitter word followed. Coming back to this world would've been more than a luckless lust, what would be a must might end as a way in, to have ever been a cancer, uncanny. 'Step away, filth, as you've done enough. I have spoken to my master. 'Decided or not, a lip had brought something to him which ought not to be. Blaster awareness, that of a recluse which lost himself whenever it would be important, or when it would be decided. Power would be granted, if it weren't for the mild chop. A blow had been dealt, and he threw the portal back in the lot. 'I'm stuck here. 'He suddenly realized. Slowly, as he had regained, his pacing fell to the strange woe. From now on he would have no other body to hide in or anything else going for him, as he would throw even the highest anchor to the sea. Anything to convince them he was worthy to be allowed to travel there. That sort of escape wasn't meant to last. It was a glimpse of some second, the decades between a lost eons in some time long gone. It was hard to deal with; hence he would turn to his inhumane speed which forced him back into hiding. Never to be seen. Longley lasting, this would be the greatest thing he would be goo at. Hiding in the abandoned sewers, one side of them at least. Some strange folk hid inside of them, in some distant lot. Not there anymore, for some reason which had either been completely unknown of the cause of it had been left there as a sign for the warning. Soles of feet lay there and the other pieces of the ones who owned them were properly and equally spread, held together by jumping cords which had been specifically made for each in turn. Mourning there, a lack of life revealing a crawl of crannies, old women who were weeping into black pools, lost to the least respectful watcher. Lost for words, a space in conflict lay between them. In the muck, they revealed. That not a single one would own the appeal of standing termites, prisons for them. Yet no life stood in them, as they didn't move and barely spoke. Such a solace would still be abandoned, as not a single living thing felt at home in there. To some, these old ladies would be nothing more but animated carvings which were moved by the wind. In that way they acted and reacted to their strangest malignites and the way in which they cradled their children. 'Eat my child. 'He heard, though the wind enjoyed messing with the ear, as it had become much bolder than in the days past, this would be a commentary on the way through which they fasted. It would not last a single second more than it could be expected. Direct by the least awakened personality, a fragrant lack of moving realities moved him away. As this was no normal sewage system, it was much deeper and darker. The rust would turn and flee below, where four semi-circles completely blocked off gates spilled their goo inside the hole in the middle of where they stood and waited. 'We've been abandoned here. 'Leading below, it seemed, there would be some kind of kingdom within their reach. But none of them could survive the hall. A gothic aspect lay to this place. One could see that this wasn't meant to be the sewage system, but a kind of castle which had been completely dismissed for the soulless designs which reigned outside. Since he was there and he could simply set himself into flight, he decided to let them there and dig deeper than he needed to survive this boredom which had been completely forced on him.

Being there was a simple mistake. Just seeing the gargoyles which were finely crafted below was enough of a giveaway for what he had suspected this to be. Lower than that lay a pair of red carpets which had lain unstained. The reason for that was a deviation from the general design. A well had been created for the muck to fall in. Too many expensive and well furnished decoration materials lay there for a single mistake to go undone. 'I see I would have to entertain guests now. 'Wind, for all its worth couldn't even hope to replicate that sound alone. It was a mystical thing of fright, a meaninglessness of delights. Plenty of wicked things burning in each of the strung holes they had dug from them. Mummified, tied and completely defiled, these souls would be tortured in silence. It was completely confirmed. 'We have taken out their voice boxes because we wanted to preserve the purity we could bear for them. It's not something we could replicate with ease, you see?' The woman in her velvet dress, with the lifelessness in her breathe had pointed at her servants, in a gaunter. The laughter could be heard as she pronounced. 'Bring the feast in. 'To which he would renounce himself. There was something strange about the land in which the Carrions built their huts in. For once, in a long enough period of time, there hadn't been any war. No distinct conflict and no kind of feigned interest which took away from their daily lives. Indeed, this had been an age of beauty and of peace. Without even as much as a disturbance in the general on-goings of their kind, one could truly draw hope back to the people. In this age of wonder, the Carrions would go ahead and find themselves just setting themselves in. Observing even the greatness of the great separation from the jungle they resided in from the giant building which connected with it. Without a wonder at the reason for which they were there, no one could draw in just what had happened in the nearest past. For that building there had appeared over night without the least of concern or a sign. I was quite appalled to record everything as one of the great stricken men which had been almost completely submerged into one of the walls. A piece of a pile lay stricken through my head way back. My comfort had been completely diminished to the point where it had emerged through some way or another in the form of a humane corpse which was being recreated somewhere in the back. Most the texture belonging to my skin had been irrelevant, henceforth; it had been replaced as well. But if there was one key factor in my change, it had been the cameras which had been implanted in my chest. Not only would I be allowed to watch and see, but I could finally feed the rest of them as much as I could happen to record. My task had been simple and I was entirely set on it to follow through, for the citizens who were still connected to the feed were still taking breaks to dream from time to time. Despite the chances into the general areas surrounding the place and the peculiar nature it may have had, there was a small change which came over it. The footage had been tempered with. Resulting from that, there was an illusion set in place which made everything seem calmer and more inviting than it should've looked like. During some times, it looked like a paradise I couldn't take my eyes from. Though I wasn't the intended audience for it, I had my share of the view and to that I could firm attest to the fact that I was thoroughly disgusted. Shameful as it may be, I found myself trying to grasp at straws, unable to do anything other than find myself chasing wild critters that happened to be there. Only at times was I able to search for those remotely hidden creatures known at the Carrions. We were aware of their existence and their presence. Why, at times, they showed interest as well, even though the place looked barren and intimidating from where they stood. Most of them were too simple to understand just what was happening around them. In some way, I felt somewhat guilty that I would change them so much. It wasn't my fault after all that the people weren't prepared to interact with anything which wasn't like them. And the way a face would be completely imposed on top of their beaks would be utterly disgusting. I could feel the jerkiness of it fade as soon as I could hold myself there. No doubt they found themselves ever so wretched as to hide themselves. Between this sudden masking and their real faces, there was this disconnect I had been forced to witness alone. Without fright of what they truly looked like, my primal instincts had faded. And at times, when they did appear, I had been given the impression that they knew where I stood and that I was completely recording them. Dread had filled me with half a pint of uncertainty. I couldn't look for longer periods of time, out of the fear I felt that I might intrude upon them. With numbing fingers in the back, the arm extensions, which I might add that they were eight in numbers, I started jolting and reforming my spine. This had been a hobby of him, out of the habit being enforced onto me that I would have to hide myself whenever it was needed. Otherwise, my work would be rather dull and dumbfounded. Now that I come to think about it, I cannot even remember how many times I had come to rebuilt it, through so many hoops and forms, the strange anchoring sessions which had managed to build part of a spire in the back. This is what I knew about the room, or the plane behind me. Where I had been stored, to say the least, there were a few other models I had felt. Past the tube to which I had been connected to, whence I could feel my beating heart and organs, that I had decided to be the storage for my internal organs, there were other models stored. They were inactive, but somehow stranger than I had been. My arms could stretch without limit. And as they had, I could feel and sense their features, only to have been made aware of the fact that all of them shared something with me. A certain angle which they seemed to have completed together. Human features lay somewhat disjointed, stretched and distorted across several bodies. All of them had their share of peculiarities, which couldn't have been revealed to me if I hadn't the amount of arms of the mind which allowed me to figure everything out. Now, with that known, I felt a pressure. Would I perform or would I be replaced? 'Will you come closer?' I asked for the first time, which drove them away. I would not sway anyone with this strange look. After the hours. My strand of commentaries yielded into something I hadn't expected to happen. A few stranger lousy heads stood near me. Just as I suspected them to look like, we shared in an aspect which only drew us farther away from one another. Not that it mattered any longer. What yielded to itself in the distance was that filthy smirk which didn't belong, on the metal body of the unit which had come to the threshold of the new land. From the release, now the ship planted itself in the city. This was the other side of the Carrion life, the great progress, the high-class society, the paradise, the place of gods, where giant statues still rotted despite them being made out of shallow rock. It would be highly intrusive to assume. 'Do you suppose he'll return?' 'You haven't asked me about it for the entirety of our trip, why ask now?' Dour had been completely done navigating through the controls and placing the ship on hold. It was something he didn't expect to be called on. Without anything proper, it would be enough. A fierce abode would carry on. The hold of the tatters would be burn down the alcoves. It was a magnificent place to behold, just by the mere fact that they had shared into their obsession to fashion the tops of their buildings until they resembled them truly as if mirrored. This mania could only bring in the destruction which had been told of, for, whenever there was an object, be as little as it may be, which shared in their appearance, that would be afflicted by the decay as well. Without a way to tell it off, they carried on, only to say. ‘Little he may be, I feel like he had touched a piece of my decaying heart with his wonders. I could only deflect myself in the reminders that he had taken a wild interest into our culture and into our beliefs. ‘ ‘Those aren’t meant to last here, and you know it well. When I joined your people, I had been promised the change to advancement that I may find what I miss one day. ‘And the distant memory of it seemed adjacent to some defeat in the long past. Somehow, it had happened for him to land into some catastrophic even which sealed his fate and those akin to him. Perhaps it was for that same reason that he found them so similar to him, even kin-like or brotherly. Yet this place was no refuge, and it felt lifeless. Simply walking through the streets gave a feeling of the bleakness which reflected not merely in the colors but in the various monitors which had been placed everywhere around. A figure was there, on each channel, talking, constantly, in some tongues or none at all. I could look deeper and see someone I would recognize and I hadn’t any need for senses to know it. My signals had accustomed themselves to picking up just about everything from their general feed. I could not give it to the least of premonitions and to the admittance of the low-lives which crawled from their corners in order to feed themselves with the strange substances which rang up unmonitored. I felt myself being broken by the meeklessness they showed. Not only had they lost their limbs and tails, the wings as well but they seemed too worm-like for my liking and taste. From inside their beaks, they had actually evolved long, prolonged, projected and expanding suckers which appeared to scan the ground and the walls for that muck and muscle which grew just about where the moisture was. It felt somehow sickening to look at it that way. But the feelings which I couldn’t convey weren’t something worth mentioning yet. Glowing signs, and then, what I had stumbled upon was a small gathering of the most mollusk-brained pair I could’ve come into contact with. An old illustration, of an almost a cut-out cardboard lady stood there. It was fully recreated with the help of the signals in my virtual drive. I could see her blue dress and white apron still flashing in front me, barely limited by the whole amount of vagueness which surrounded the place. Yet, the thing she was advertising was a strange product I could hear about from the speaker attached to one of its blunt sides. ‘The space-foam is the future. You need to purchase the space-foam in order to ease your life. ‘Do it, the sign said and the people could only clap and give in. And the monitors revealed something much grimmer, the sea, and the flood of information which changed every time someone turned and listened to another one of them. No carrion lay there behind the feed, but another human face which had been generated and projected onto it. ‘There’s a lot of work to be done here, isn’t it? ‘I could only mutter as I waited for the feed to recreate everything around me. Still, I couldn’t get used to this obsession they had with their own image, especially to this unhealthy complex they displayed. Standing like gargoyles and even stranger beings, they seemed to have completely formed their wild branches and strange trances on top of the monitor holders. Large stacks of metal racks were held below a giant Carrion head. From it there was at least a wicked-looking pair of plump declining strangling bits which drew in and out as much as they could fit in. Fatness at the back of each monitor gave the impression that there were living things behind them. The tubes behind them which were pumping food could only reinforce the belief. But to put it off the staleness of the place, what had been dominant to this place was the weird design and general harshness which made it completely unlivable. From a psychical standpoint, this was a house for the mad, which could only be dragged for so long, until one would start to wonder what reason would there be for placing rails and plenty of standing ledges where bridges were extending forth. And there were a lot of them, which never lead to a straight match, instead they would curve and lead down. I was unsure of the chance in pace they suddenly displayed. As much as I fancied myself a block of the old chop, my mood had been in the course of chiming in. There were a few rude Carrions whom arrived. Dressed in strange, almost ripped out clothes, I came to the conclusion that they were of the second worst lot out there. Unworthy of my touch, they had been repelled by me. Strange, but placed in as much of a turn as I could fathom it, I remain null. Broken even by the fact that there was someone out there, standing in the sky. And everything drew to him, the various beaks of the buildings, even the strangely formed members that arrived. Despite my initial surprise, I've come to realize that this wasn't what it appeared to be. Instead, I took it as it was an error. A signal which found itself there and intruded into me. 'There are others, you know? We've been confronted by a thing called Dour before, who offered us just the pieces we needed to finally get through a whole new age of cognition. With these advancements, we shall finally make the well needed progress to alleviate the disease and finally get rid of it. ' 'What's the cost for it? 'Bird of prey, I see. He didn't respond but snickered at that. 'He only means that, there's nothing we wouldn't give if it meant that we had a chance to get away from it, you know? From this encompassing disease, from which we can't even fathom getting away. We're being taken apart by the second, perturbed. Umbilicol promised us that he'd find a way through his research to get us out of this. ' 'Who is this Umbilicol. 'The word was lost on him. Then, there was the storm. Though this place was well out of its way, it was necessary to admit to the fact that it was in the making. Survival from the supreme kind of extinction wouldn't be permitted elsewhere. Past one the distant nebulas, there was, only a disease which could not last on its own, instead, it made everything around the planets feel as if it was sunken and forlorn. Lost to the matter of disease, pleased by the likens of missing feelings and pleasing remarks. A dark future waited at that. For no one had been safe, no one might care. A dare had laid to everyone in the areas, as they lacked the materials needed for them to finish their trials, brought. Back to their reality as the only fragment of sanity faded. There stood the council of Obsidian. And in their planet, as they had been made aware, there came the Duke in his malignant state. Bowed to him, now came into the light, the hybrids were worshipping the Duke, betrayer of sight. Soon fading, never ending, as he stretched, he had grown enough to encompass just about everything around the planet. Tainted by the mild psychosis he displayed, he spoke again. 'Build be another altar. It is time for my dominion to spread. I had been promised a city and a kingdom for which I had waited to be properly prized; my demise will have to wait. 'Danger would not last, for as much as the sailing would cost them a gaunter, a halt to their antics, as they called. An utmost wicked plan which could not be brought back for their own sake, a plan amidst the reeds being torn, for each other's sake. 'We must get rid of him, just as he, the destroyer had destroyed half of it now. ' 'How dare you question our new divine ruler, out of all the moments and all the insurgencies, this is the one which may not be forgiven. ' 'Listen to yourself now. ' 'I shall know do that, I shall not betray the Duke. Even now, after we've been denied escape from our reality, you still come to doubt their abandonment. Why? Can you not see that we were always meaningless for them? We were only pawns in their games, nothing more. Instead of trying to weep over lost times, this is our chance to get into good grace with the greatest one that shall heave our future from the last eon of the loss. 'To prevail would mean that no one could stamp or tramp their admittedly luckless hope. It was spontaneous that their politics wouldn't matter for what it could invoke. Into his wildly coiling arms, there appeared a spherical pyramid of blinding sightless, formed behind closed eyes, manifesting in the mind like a tiny cage from which he pulled a piece of a shall that formed the sky. From the peak of dark, there came the hue of a violent mix of hues which spread like the noise and the poison brought by the uncanny faces which were bore there. 'I shall call this a reversal of the flood. From now on, all of the sources from which it might spill shall be converted into gas; from within their ranks I shall breed the new generations of flies which shall bring forth what I write. 'Down came the demands, the hybrids writing for him at last. Various stone tablets had been raised for him, on which they wrote the exact materials, the alchemical components, and the ores of clam-iron being in the front. Somewhere in that reality, they stood during the onslaught of the assault. It would be dangerous to face the flying terror of Agamemnon as it rested, unable to be tested for the gluttony it possessed. For various hours, the bitter lowering of decay had brought laziness to it which couldn't be conveyed otherwise. If you were to see, or even better, bask in the presence of the lost hold in which it rested, you'd understand. Various walls, the wings that were not flapping forth started lifting themselves in order to completely block it from ever escaping from the alcove. A grotto of the sorts had been formed. In it he would lay and slumber forth. 'The creature is finally trapped. 'They yelled, and all of the sudden, the various nets which had completely encompassed everyone had dissipated in the air. For all the wicked nets and all the spreading webs could not deal with themselves as the wretched mass of bodies piled. Some hadn't survived the process but most had. It would be too dangerous to assume otherwise. Questions weren't to be asked. But a filthy man, wearing his skull upside down in a bed of teeth which extended from his feet and belly, who had completely lost a good chunk of his back retracted opened himself to reveal. Another filthy eel-like ramming-device which spread in half, pumping in and out as if made out of the softness of an pouch and walked with it head on. He would have to be painted in red and blue aerial-discs, which only crossed his neck as they wept in the various shades of gray. Terror would not be included as he'd say. 'I have become the new prophet, and I have finally come to tell you of the way of the vileness. For I am the descendant of Gvaat and it was through him that will bring on the admission that we'll die, our world will crumble and we shall be lost to the weight their flying fiend will have attained. ' 'Levee your mouth outside, and flee. This isn't the place or time for you to be here amongst us, be warned that there's no hope for live in the conditions ahead. 'Another voice said. It would be highly looked after, sought even by the deaf. Vile words couldn't last evenly say. Some spaced out of their minds, others were lost, tormented by the need for sorrow. Not a brow would be raised for the likes of the Dumborrow heights on which they hanged to ones who had betrayed their loss. In a conclusive decision, they had spared no one from the wild disease which took over their mind. It was still the essence of Agamemnon which only now seeped in through the blinds. Each vision of any of the worlds was wickedly strained. It would be hard to maintain a vigilant eye to something which couldn't not be tried and put in a single place. Magnificent as it looked, only now could the splendors be had. It would drive me mad, otherwise, to know that I have missed so many wild contractions, caught by seething dens. Resting in some of them, likened to the seething beds in which one would have to decide that it would be worth it for them to be left alive. Where the far reaches of the wings ended, a silver live drew back. One day, before all ended, the citadels would fly and be alive again. For this future alone, they all shone their wild lights and peculiar mildness in which they tested their entire beings and their souls. Many feared the rising and the attempt at drawing forth into the sky. Were one to draw back and fling himself into the madness in which a wild cold wind hassled their skin away, drawn to the floating stones in the air, now mockery was fully formed. As the stones amassed enough features, mouths would ring aloud. 'Hear me, hear thee, and hear us say. We have founded the planet, by the name. 'It was spoken just so they could all hear, well spent, the words of the dead. Myrth, the veils of Myrth still lead on. But even there, the visions which lead to the plains of Agamemnon were gone. No one would be drive to suicide, death would be defied again. Wonder and excitement be damned, lost to the mild deflowered sanctity of numbness. How could they be sad if there was nothing to be sad for? How would they think us as stray when the people hated and feared the stones? Despite floating in the sky, lost to the abiding factor that no one would be spared, no one dared to look away. Lastly, they would be uncouncted, lasting only for the bitter taste which had remained in their layer of skin. Citizens would be lost, as they had showed themselves for what they were, underneath the skin a layer of clam metal remained. 'It is no metal. 'The voice spoke. What was this extension which dared provoke the outrage as it drew away from fear? Threateningly, they'd fear the advent and the rage, which would be fully endorsed by the rules in their citadels, lost somewhat in their own mirthage. 'Call him back. 'A strange request appeared thought it seemed that from a house which crawled, which had refused to eat one in all. Koovalhl still lived. He was a survivor, even though he considered going in. From where he stood, there was only a tiny patch of land which surrounded the crater which threatened to swallow him at last. Like a snail, the house crawled away, forgetting about him completely, as he would be left there in despair. It wasn't fair, it wasn't fair, it shouldn't be even decently enforceable to leave him there. Not while it had been so far, as to make it to one of the gates from afar. He feared just what it might mean, trying to giving and makes it through the side of the town. It would be a wonder, if he were to claim he was stronger than that, in which case he only presented himself as a mild fugitive, yelling for assistance. 'Please help me pass, I cannot, for the likes of me, crawl away from this pass. If anyone can hear me, open the gates, I'll do anything. 'Anything indeed, though it may be a dangerous claim of which he hadn't even the remoteness clue what it may have implied, he shook himself over, trying to defile himself ever further as he'd do. Better to hide than go through. I was chased in the streets soon after. Grabbed as I may, my head was starting to take a single pair of bursts before taking itself out. Without the locusts coming back in from below, there would be nothing close to him to grab onto. He would be left completely expose to the infertility of the last. Just by looking down there, it was enough to see that they hid something from the world. If only I could survive the fall, I'd see it. With the orange valleys which were of such a beauty compared with the soulless teal and blue of the clam. Talons of stone could be seen there, just beyond the grinded stone and the fashioned nests from which the dark flier had emerged. Help would not arrive now. Henceforth, it had been the time for me to carry on with my mission and the stroll. Strands of death lay somewhat below. A flock of lily pads were there, waited only by the willow. But it wasn't the purpose which brought it to the mind. Perilous though it may be, no one was allowed to speak of it. Desolate and nigh-abandoned, a despot's place had never even been suited for comfort at all. With the masses marching out of it, the stance of the last atomic celestial body lay in danger. Though there was that strange surrounding gap which held the planet from falling into the greatness of the pillars which held the universe from drifting away from the sight. Upon a small erupting probe, the entire magnitude of the atomic resin spread across the planet, taking the life of four quarters of the fleeing inhabitants. It was a disaster which may never come to be forgotten or dismissed as easily as it had been in the past. What was left behind lay now as the sight of billions of scorched arms which had been wide-spread and left there, unburied. Transmissions would never last, and there was word that some survivors may still hide. But while there was some good news and the worst ones yet, no one could forget just what happened to the masses which spoke of the dead. Punishments would simply be thrown around and used as the useless things they were when you had to dig two feet beneath the level of the ground. We were expected to do so. Those of us who flew back, though we'd be deemed as mercenaries of traitors, or anything which may be worse, I felt like we were fallen from grace. Rather than be exposed for what we were, there was this expectation that we would somehow make it through. It wouldn't even be decided yet. But I feel innate, to my desire to get away. From everything which conveyed our lives on the stars. Instead, I could do nothing but mourn for our losses. 'I found another family here. 'Spoke like a true lost soul who found him digging more than he should know. He was aware of the state through which the family lived. Determined to find out more, he dug and dug until the moment had brought to him the final clues. They lived past the initial spread of terror. Through the fire and the cancer, through the rains of ash and into the new ascent, into this we went. Deeper through the rock, though it wasn't harder any longer, I felt like them. A hand which dug and another which waited just on top of it, trying to push the dirt and sand out in an attempt to get more air in. 'Our suits won't cut it. I think we'll have to wait some more. At least a few recharges would be neat enough to get us through. ' 'Don't bother with them, I feel like there won't be a way for us to get away. We're too deep already to return. 'I didn't know why I said it. But I had to escape this feeling which seeped in me. Disgusted by the means of advancement, this thing had brought nothing but destruction and terror. Yet it had been much worse than this. The technology we carried on the ship and even farther than that far surpassed everything humanity had created before. We were making stars, and filling them with black matter, we have created universal bombs. In our attempt to control everything and bring on a war, we have become the architects which would lead to the end of the universe. Right under our noses, that desire couldn't be siphoned away. I felt it even in me, as the dumb signed up fool that I was. We were drenching ourselves under the moist pockets of sand, unable to comprehend what went wrong. 'I found one, I think she's living. 'Upon the first sings of life, we all moved around and started groping, doing anything to attach one of the breathing device on her face. Anything would do, a pump in the heart, something in her belly, purified water, but. To my thought I'd say, there was nothing to be ashamed off. We realized she wouldn't survive. 'It's I, who needs to do it. No other man needs to carry this burden with him. I'll do my best not to defile any of your hands, as it was I that brought you here to begin with. 'Succeeding the other member of our group, I took one step behind her and flipped her past the broth. In her head there was this strange, almost unnerving thing which grouped itself past her wretched scalp. Someone's arm had crawled inside. She had been dead for a long time. 'What were her vitals saying? ' 'Alive, she was a live a few moments ago; she even tried saying something before she fell down. ' 'Hasn't it crossed your mind that you may record her? ' 'I can't say it had. What's the matter now? You said she's dead. 'But she wasn't so a few moments ago. Nor did it make any sense for that hand to dig that far into her. So well, so-so, spoken to a missing word, I felt like there wasn't any going back and forth, not with them. At least I had been spared, the deeper we went, neither of us had been the same. Again, I didn't expect to be understood. My fingers were rotting; my fingernails had been brought to a crushing point. I could feel them being battered again by a hammer, from an older time when I was tortured forth. 'Don't think about going to the planet. This is what awaits you there. ' They said, and with each word which passed into the break, I could think of nothing more other than the pain they made me feel. For the same reason, I felt unlikely to commit to any of the deceit. It it's for that reason that I came here in the first place. This might sound like a different excerpt. I didn't mean to do it. But, this is what I had become. This procedure took away half of your stomach and replaced it with a cylindrical device which would keep you alive for one year. While wearing it, you could walk through the electrical shield holding everyone back without being hurt. Though, no one from the resistance knew what I had done. Or why I did it. We were standing on a bridge, just near the sealed off control room, wondering now what to do at the dead end. It was the last seal one that stood between the running horse and the walls. To my contempt, I could only look back and reflect for one moment just how I even got here with them. The woman was there from what I could remember. When it all started, life had been simpler, quainter. Without a way of knowing what was wrong, a child could go through life systematically without realizing how many lives had been lost. Class-rooms stood in peril of subjugation. A coat hanger held all but no other design but that bland cache of button everyone was supposed to wear. Walls shared only a color, and from the text books, every word had been rearranged until nothing looked too sharp or might arouse the brain too much than it had been needed. By no means would anyone return to their duties once the first session was over. First session emerged, everyone acted like they were supposed to. It seemed likely that some would be prudent with whom they spoke and what they shared. Mostly short-words, para-phrases, seemingly lost meaning which were passed around during the journey. Initially, no one thought much about it. Special trains came and went, taking the children away in a compartment, supervised by someone. That someone had not been born in the city. A stranger was in his place every single day that passed. Without a mask on his face, without a resemblance or even a sudden shimmer, they all stood there like statues, each in the place where the previous one stood before them. And it had all went just as expected. Lower laborers in another section, farther away, the "free people", which only brought the connection to the high-ends, so on, until all the way to the conductors. In order to avoid some kind of confusion or any kind of foul play, the sections were changed every single time. And they never used any kind of similar method of hiding. Sometimes colors would change, other times they'd use words scribbled on the walls which would direct everyone to the right passages. That had changed a lot from the previous design which granted them a straight line into a system of inner tunnels which were vaguely placed in such a way that they allowed two great areas, separated by a glass wall. Between the places, one came and the other one left. Never had one gone in between or crossed the factions or the station. Factions emerged early on. Some would be disguised as members of the lowest or the highest orders depending on the circumstance and what kind of message had to be carried on. Claiming that they existed was a crime. No one listened. Words had their meanings switched just so they would be allowed to create the basis of dialects, which in turn began corroding society slowly by the means in which it worked. Like an under group seal on the ear, by the abandoned buildings there stood the key to it all. But I hadn't had the chance to follow through yet. Life was scarce past a point, since this chaos of languages drove them on. On intervals of twenty minutes, they would be greeted by nothing other than messages solely created in the visual language. Otherwise, there'd be nothing to work through it. A constant threat to society stood as the data collected which allowed it to survive could drop at any hour. A message lay on one of the screens. I looked at the depiction of the general place where my work building was supposed to be set. Just by looking around me, I could see no one I knew. Instead of comfort, I had been greeted by a bunch of words and phrases I could not understand. Some mutt-like in origin, close to being French, or Russian, combined with a dialect of English where the vowels stretched too far. I could only draw the comparison to being in a jungle; hearing only clicks between people without realizing just what was awaiting me on the first drop. Not many people picked on the dialects any longer since they had completely evolved into a language of their own. Plainly, there had been that strange militant attitude I could feel as soon as I had entered the warden's area. He was one of the many placed there to watch over us. Uncomfortably set around the ribs of the general square, I had been met by small stationed placed around the open area. They were somewhat tall and ended up in a small round filament where the screen went.

Surrounding it was a domed metal head which popped in and opened to drag out tiny antennae which lit from a selection of eight colors. None of them were even remotely similar to anything existed. Or at least I have never seen their shades before. Soon, as I approached and made contact with the screen, a set of options had come into my view. There were different graphic signs which pointed in both directions and started producing the needed effects as soon as I started going through them. My only way of coping through this was the desperate need to get where I had to work in time. Delayed or not, I would get there regardless of how much I had to push through and endure. It would be irreproachable otherwise. Second try, it seemed. It was pointless, going through the motions again. But I felt. Every time I turned my head, another one joined me, another turn, before I even got to look behind me, and I saw a line. And no one bothered to ask why we were here and what the motions were for. I could only think of the buildings and how they were set forth. Always turned, always switched, always a mess. We were placed here, time after time to make as we do. Set in place, I was supposed to go and claim my thicket from a round, falling and retracting man which came from a mechanic staircase. Despite my on-going and sniffing around, I could only come to remember seeing a frame of a blue sword which was supposed to stand by. Will it be there? Not that I suspected anything close to the surrounding area, but I felt like I was looking at fingers comprised of tiny termites who were building their mounts on my hands. They took turns taking them away, until the very point where it was impossible to access the flight suits above. It stood there on top of the highest level, where a strange glass bulwark domed with its high colored vivid pastels. To its appearance, my first impressions had been that of a diving suit which had been highly modified. A few flying engines had been attached to both of its sides. For the likes of me I couldn't know what the reason for it was. For as much as a few seconds in, I was onset to try doing something. My arms were tied behind my back; I was restlessly trying to get away from this dilemma. Why was he lowering himself now? How did he know what I looked like? As soon as he lowered the staircase, why was worked by a few other men, I stared at him. He grabbed me by the shoulder and pushed me in. I remember there being no fence which might hold everything from falling. Parted by a few words, I stepped in, almost in some moronic kind of way. They were drawing again to those wretched words. No one expected it to evolve in such a way. While working down the second level, I have noticed something close to a degradation which reflected on them. The people weren't people any longer. Beasts hid in their skin, a fealty from within degenerated in such a way that I could almost hear it. A certain hybridization of our dialects which were beginning to merge with one another as a result of this frightening state they put us through. But it hadn't been the worst aspect of it that had been what I started seeing after hearing their strange sentences being put together. Everyone in the work area was assigned to something. At various intervals, they were supposed to change spots with another pair, to whom I shall refrain myself from ever advancing and taking them into consideration. It would be as dangerous as trying to paint myself as anything but their slave. Detract or not, from my wild thought, I appear to have been sent on bare feet. It was something unforgivable, at least for as long as I faced myself in that mild creeping growth of plants in the back. It was always strange, how it found itself growing at the most opportune times and in the most awkward areas it could land itself into. I was set on that, thinking about the opportunity of seeing it happen again, or hearing it that I may simply drop off the ledgers. We were each supposed to introduce a symbol into the typewriter. By its simple design, there were letters carefully selected from every kind of functional language. That being a functional language, it kept popping in the mind. I think it was supposed to deal with an older set of rules which worked. We were here for a reason, that being; I think we were supposed to fix this problem of lost dialects before we lost our language entirely. A symbol that would be enough. A greater screen appeared to have recorded a few of them already, out of the progress of a few months. It would be considered utmost necessarily, to get at least one letter of the quota if we were to reconstruct it from scratch. Otherwise, I feared the worst. Less humble workers were in the turn-area. It was hard working in there because of the proximity in which it related itself to something nearing a coal mine. Lungs would stop working short after. Images of the most severe kind were set on displays, having documented the complete perforation which had taken over them. If I hadn't seen it for myself, I wouldn't have believed it. But I was one of the men who worked in there. I've dealt with the fumes for a few years. As the task progressed, we were supposed to adapt a few cords through out mouths in order to allow them to do the breathing for us. Going as far away as dwelling eighteen feet below the ground, it would be pitiful. Trying to stray away from to luckless nature in which it portrayed itself, I finally say some kind of result. Despite pressing some weird combinations of letters, I could not get that error again. That's what we were at the end of the day. Wishful thinking, error-making, mistake finder who were trying to do an impossible task. It was senseless, trying to reinvent the wheel in this condition. We weren't paid and life seemed hopeless. At the end of the shift, we would be allowed to eat during a ballot which made it so we were given the exact portions based on our performances. It was pitiful, knowing that out of all the workers at the square area, we were the least fed animals in the park. What came over me was an incessant thing. The plate fell off my hand, or I threw it off again. For the next few minutes I would be seen again like the man I was, dirty around the hands, picking off food off the ground. Of course no one was supposed to show interest in what I was doing. No one would understand. I couldn't express myself into images, no one could. Volatile images still kept popping yet I couldn't express a thing. And they wouldn't understand what, or why, or the reason for which I. Snapped out of it. Disposed off clothes, stricken past the throng, I was only trying to mutter a word to them. Something universal just so they might understand my frustration with the fact that everything was taken for us. And no one saw us enough of a threat to interfere. Was there even crime? Of course there was, even in a place like this, I could see the substances being thrown down. No work days or set hours either, which meant I could walk out at any hour and take anything I wanted. That broke away any kind of connection I had to the people. I kept walking from task to task, awaiting some kind of sign that what I was doing could be wrong. But they threw me away as soon as they saw me try entering in. It was automated in part, perhaps trying to barge it hadn't been the greatest idea at all. Rather than being set on stairs, the nearest terminals would drive me away, pushing me back to the same job I have been set to at the beginning of the year. I would be demoted soon if I kept leaping over and over, leaving so much undone. Restlessly set on stress, I felt myself going to places. No man like me had any worth. What got me going for a few more hours after that was the fact that I would be allowed to blow some steam off before I could return. Too many of them knew my face. This was another fading thin which wasn't meant to last. Language faded or evolved, but instead nothing was meant to pass. Broken by the chains, a lot of androids weren't meant to look at the pass. It was a complete loss of wonder, even since they had lost him at last. Yet, perfection could still be attained by whatever means that could be contained. There'd be no satisfaction any longer, especially since there was no way out. Without trying to get away from what was going on, there was no hope to hide it. A failure of communication had infected the androids who returned to their basic instincts. It had been a long time since then but they no longer cared about any incentive to do otherwise. Signals would be completely mixed; wires would go missing as well as parts of the buildings and of the junk would be completely stacked over. An older behavior was forced into the rampage, which completely struck a good deal of android at woe. Without proper governing, they would be allowed to act and say, to do as they could possibly convey. No verdure in the metal sea, no junk to be anything but theirs. In the coming of the age, it seemed that this quirk of theirs had affected everyone through some way one another. As one of the secrets had been revealed, the building which had their appeal taken from them had been completely regained. It couldn't be contested, nor wondered at. For this reason they started moving on their own, promoting their grouping in the accolades of Hun. This didn't take long until they had all come together at last. Without even prizing themselves as anything but the contenders of heat, world would fall under the seethe. Far distant wonders came, as the materials started moving again. As soon as the buildings got stacked together with the help of the underground system of rails, they had exposed themselves as pseudo-trains. Musk and smoke came out at last, but no one noticed as they had prized themselves inside their homes. Unable to comprehend this sudden change, it would be time to look again. What had happened above? Where the lights were fading again and the ground was shaking as if worn. I could see the movers join together as well in an attempt to redirect the amount of strange power which had been emitted from below. Without a single question in mind, this was the time. Brave as he may, a man shouted. 'Let me be the first one who breaks the walls. This divine sign has granted us the hope we needed to seek a new future in the midst of chaos. 'With a single pick he wore, to some unknown ancient task he bore, the man began striking it time after time, until the very point where it couldn't be denied that it would be hopeless to try again. A wall had been struck down, another followed and after that, another one came around. 'I am Ekarius, pleased to be acquainted. 'This burly man with a giant chest, who fashioned himself a fighter, or some warrior, a builder who was properly tooled, presented himself in the spare of time. Not to mind going around and saying things which shouldn't be. But he was the one who got everyone around. 'Join me; join me into ripping the wall. It's ripe for the taking, don't be mistaken about it. For, as much as I wonder, who's the strongest here, I shall abstain from trying to test my might. For this delight, I cannot wonder at what's going on. 'For the roles were properly spared. No one knew why they were there. For some reason which hadn't been told, they had all picked up their various tasks and held them underneath the welding zone. It looked like a work of art. Where they had placed their remote-machines and the rods and the various other appliances they were supposed to work at had ended completely welded as some kind of weird fountain from which no water came. A strange pseudo-fish had been there, which could not be anything to be seen, other than the unfair magnitude of watching. Snatching from their eyes, no cries had been taken as the delight Ekarius felt couldn't be matched by anyone else. ‘What am I to refer to you as?’ ‘I am the Paul, this is my wife, and she’s Nameless.’ ‘And I am Quentin Bloc. ‘They were a queer pair, even from the start. Strange clothes which were shared by all three of them gave the appearance of a ghastly rag which switched between them. It hadn’t been the strangest of things. As the metal didn’t look exactly like metal. Its texture had been that of a burnt wood for some reason I couldn’t even feasibly look at or point. To ever wonder otherwise, what the reason for it was would be a total blasphemy from which I couldn’t even turn my eyes from. Lit by candles, my approach was vile. For each step on their side meant I would be defiled. I knew if for the very same reasons I had suspected them to be. Not of this world, not of any. It would be a burden to turn away, knowing that I have lost contact with people who were in need to be saved from whatever was happening around here. Broken as they were, in some way they were still human by some way or another. Their ancestors were min and features we shared as well as the peace of the mind. I couldn’t even be denied as much as I could spare myself off, henceforth, I chose to come forth and say. ‘We need to work together if there’s any hope to be had. ‘I was alone there. But I felt already changed as soon as I crossed sides. Not only had a part of me died there, but I felt defiled by the were air they were breathing in. My colored clothes, in bloating hues had turned gray, darkened by the ashen which conveyed the mood. This would be mansion which would spread. As soon as I looked back, the metal hole I had made with my pick had turned into the broken area of a house, planks which were ripped at last. Balaster would pour out in a slimy manner as of oil, moving like a sponge, alive, driven by a need to repair. Yet not in the same way, as to seal the return, instead, the blaster would create a door. ‘Our movers are now part forever. For this I think we ought to reward you. ‘I could feel my clothes drawing in. But it wasn’t the rags alone; those had been what drew me on to them. IT felt like a piece of my soul had been completely molded in it. By danger, another stranger had arrived. With pity, I couldn’t turn back knowing that I would lose too much, as my countenance dictated, I had emerged victorious in my attempt. ‘Very well, if this is what the future tells, I shall join all three of you, Nameless, Paul, Quentin. I shall do what I must if it means preserving humanity. ‘Even this. He said, with a bitter mark on his lip, seeing for the first time what the lack of hope had made of the blind. All around the bunker, so it seemed, slowly, the age of metal and advancement would fade, instead, they would be replaced with the strange materials brought from the other worlds, a the infection kept spreading, trying to get itself in by whatever means it could. An explanation was required, but the mad ones admired what ought to happen to the creation of those who tried playing the gods of the underworld. From farther above, he still blocked, the only way out, which surrounded the outer rims of nebulas, of galaxies, and universes which drowned in the same color of red. Far distinct than that of the others which spread. A fiery eclipse would soon be dead. In the vilest of wonders, none may question the advent of the depths. Far from over, the deceiving manner they bore could not be torn apart. ‘Draw away from this, Malt. ‘The voice of Agamemnon faded. And as it had, for a moment, so had he been pulled out of the edges of the world. ‘I am here again. ‘In an empty hallway, waiting for his daughter, after the other woman went missing. This was the only chance he’d have to make everything right by some means. It couldn’t be anything but the hardest task a man could be placed to. ‘Talk to her, and we shall see. ‘ ‘Whether or not you deserve to be. ‘ ‘Sent back into the place, where your dreams lie and where you ought not to be held. ‘ ‘I don’t understand. I was there for a moment then I’m here again. ‘ ‘Malt, but you know that’s a different universe you were sent to, not this. There’s too much chaos going on there and you must know that you would not survive. ‘ ‘Too many dangers lay ahead, a war, an insurgence could emerge and in that case, not even our likes could prevent your illness and the fall. From which not even us may draw you back. ‘ ‘Was it all intended, then? Was I meant to get back there? ‘ ‘It was a miscalculation. ‘The truth came out of one of the Agamemnons, to, be called so. Despite the various malignancies they bore, it would be unnatural to claim otherwise or to want for more than what they were getting at last. It would be unnerving, in the least to even consider what that meant. ‘Before it fully spreads, before there could be a future in the Bunker, you need to solve this now. ‘ ‘You cannot escape us, nor can you flee from your destiny. ‘To which children fled, out of the classroom as the future said. For him, there’d be no expectation but that, of him, finally be forced to take her back. It was unnerving, frightening, trying to skewered the feeling away, to hide them, unable to convey what emotion he held to himself. After so much chaos, he could barely hold himself still. Seeing so many things turned him almost to the point of no return. Where he could flee and not seek a way back to mourn. All of the children got away, leaving nothing but a single girl, a proper lady making her way out of the classroom, standing still at the sight. Of the single man who would not be denied the visit not this ventures. It would have to pass, he would have to meet her and talk. For as long as it was needed, she rushed and grasped his leg. ‘So, you’re taking her back home, I presume. ‘It was the woman who was there. She was holding her daughter near her warm breast. She saw how uncomfortable I felt, and yet decided it was fair. ‘Take care now, will you? ‘There was nothing colder than that. Being left to deal with that child, during a long and confusing walk. I felt like she was doing what I ought to have done. Prying herself away, pushing past the awkwardness in order to grab my hand and convey as much as a single feeling she felt. Warmth lay in the touch, and I couldn’t stand watching for too long until I decided I had to look away and hide. She didn’t deserve this, not I, not someone who denied her even the chance to visit. Every step felt something closer to some block of iron pushing through the melting depths. I couldn’t fathom looking around and saying anything yet. ‘You’re much taller than I thought you’d be. ‘Her eyes fashioned themselves there, in front of me. I felt like I was staring at the inception of two dark globes which would pull me in. Yet there was nothing of the kind. It was a tremendous task I couldn’t hope to undertake. I was being stared at, looked upon, and almost caught by the antics of a child. Had I known this feeling before, perhaps it would’ve been much more different. I couldn’t look away from it, for as long as it stood there, this sudden paranoia struck me. Whether or not I could confront it, this was not the time to think about it. Driven to an uncomfortable position, I chose to stay. ‘Say, does your mother talk about me, sometimes? I know you’re a child, but, I’d like to know if she does. ‘That was it, though it may have been more than plebious, I could feel like I was about to get somewhere. It was a distant call to the way I had been used to talking. But I would have to hear it from her now. After a short thought, she looked around to see whether or not there was anyone around us. Afterwards, she only nodded. I couldn’t even explain what went through my mind, though this would be enough. Claire had been worn out the last time I laid eyes upon her. Unsurprisingly, I thought she would be just another reason for it. Quite a charming kid as well, she seemed. Seemed, what was I thinking? Again I would imagine things happening before they even had the chance to foretell. With every turn, I would look away, then back at her. This girl. ‘Lilly, was it? ‘It was shameful, not even remembering her name, though I hadn’t the well to do idea if that was her name. Nor had I crossed my mind to write it down. A jab in the dark had only whistled another nod. Either she would be courteous or I would find myself chasing wild goose, unable to understand what was happening for her own sake. ‘Let’s talk about something, shall we? I don’t know much about you. So, what do you like doing? ‘ ‘Drawing, I like doing in the breaks. ‘ ‘Will you let me? ‘Her backpack got off easily. I didn’t have to intone it again before placing it over my back. Again, I was lost for better words. My lack of reminders brought me here, thinking about someone who was in the same place as her. ‘Say, would you like to walk around the blocs? It’s still sunny outside and I think your mother wouldn’t mind if we deviated a bit from the track. You’re free to refuse if you don’t want to. ‘ ‘I know. ‘Had she ever taken her eyes from me? This shy kid couldn’t even stretch as much as a sentence yet, before I felt like I wasn’t meant to be here. If anything, I was doing her a favor. ‘Are you going to pick me every single day from now? ‘ ‘What was that? ‘With as much as a single entry, she came again and asked me still. I wasn’t one to make promises since I knew there wasn’t any way I could possibly keep them. Unfortunately, I was setting myself to something as horrible and disappointing plan. I would leave her. ‘I don’t. We should make it to the green door. It’s not far, if you don’t mind. ‘Just a few more feet away and we could make into the sun. Perhaps that should release my nerves. She was there with me now. After so many years, I finally stumbled upon her. ‘Was that a sparrow I saw? ‘ ‘They’re always here after two. An old man’s feeding them on one of the benches. He’s a friend of the teacher but he isn’t speaking much I think. ‘It was one of the blind ones. All of them were abandoned in a corner and left there to tend to the birds, that’s at least how I saw it be. ‘Wait, Lilly, where are you going? ‘ ‘Come on, let’s introduce ourselves to them. ‘I followed in the footsteps of the child. This was definitely not what I had come here for. A loss of mind came to me, as soon as it would be. Fiercely I obeyed, trying to convey the least of an emotion as I could hope to paint myself with. For some reason, out there, I could only feel as if I looked out of place. No one greeted me like they used to. Older people or not, they seemed to each pay their minds elsewhere. ‘Hi, I’m. ‘With a turn, she looked at me again with those eyes filled with expectation. I couldn’t understand what the reason for it had been. But the smile and the complete naiveté took me off guard. ‘I’m Lilly, and that man is my father. His name is Malt. ‘If there was a single blind eye in there, it would turn around and look away. This was, unreasonable; I didn’t know what to say. Other than the weird pacing I was producing, I stood there like a lout. A straggled who couldn’t even shout off the top of his lungs for the sole reason that he didn’t know what to do, it was just an impulse, but I came near her, placing my hand on her back. ‘A pleasure to meet you, sir. ‘ ‘Clockrow. ‘ ‘Mr. Clockrow, you must excuse my, daughter. She’s, I think she’s. ‘ ‘It’s fine, young man, there’s no need to be ashamed. I can see that your daughter here is as gentle as one of the cutes sparrows I had ever seen. There won’t be any need for you to say anything; I understand that you’re not much of a talker, Malt. ‘Difficult as it may be, he wasn’t unreasonable. At times, I felt like she was doing most of the talking for me. With each phrase. ‘ ‘Do you often find yourself feeding the sparrows? I think I saw you here before. ‘Despite what it meant, there wouldn’t be any difficulty to express. There were some times in which I couldn’t even express how I. I had to settle with watching her do these things on her own. My chest had been constantly beating ever since grabbed a hold of me. As soon as she was done looking for her sparrows, the strangest thing happened. I refuse to think this was anything but a higher thing at work. ‘Could you carry me for a while, dad? ‘ ‘Sure I will. ‘The motions were in my mind. Just place your hands over her legs and one across her back, don’t let go afterwards. ‘Tired already? You sure you don’t want to meet the other people? ‘ ‘It’s enough for today, I think. ‘My face was almost completely blank, as what had become of my mind; I couldn’t even draw from it. Not a single image stood there. For the same reason we waved and turned back. It was pointless to even consider trying to do anything but walk away. Tiresome as it had been, she had done a lot more than I had. ‘You don’t mind me calling you father, do you?’ ‘Of course not, whatever makes you happy, that’ll be. ‘I could feel them talking and rubbing it over, even from their windows. For some reason I couldn’t even hope to excuse the fact that they were trying to peer where they didn’t belong. Why had it been that much of a thing, me being with her? This wasn’t worth it spreading rumors over. At least not until I had found out. ‘‘We could stay there for a while. On the bench, near the maple. ‘‘Sure, anything you want, Lilly. ‘That must’ve been in, I think, her name had been somewhat obscured to me. I couldn’t remember whether or not it had been it, but I could feel myself drawing away to anything which might be helpful. Unlike her mother, I wouldn’t. I wouldn’t. ‘Let’s just stand here before anything else crosses my mind, all right? I don’t mean to be awkward or weird, but a lot of things happened. I haven’t hurt you have I? Perhaps I have held you too tightly or maybe I? ‘‘It’s fine dad, you haven’t left a scratch on me. I know you wouldn’t hurt me. ‘I know you would not hurt me, she said. Take it off your mind, she’s not Ivan, she’s never going to be him. Don’t treat her the same way as you had. Would it be fine if I? Even now there was some difficulty trying to get it out of my head. I was set on doing it somehow, even if I had to go through the same motions and the same plays of lips, one flap after another. ‘Could I see them, if you don’t mind?’ ‘‘You want to see my drawings?’ ‘‘Only if you don’t mind sharing them, I don’t want to force you if you don’t want to. ‘Anything to distract me from the empty stares, not from her, but from them. They weren’t accustomed to seeing me take care of be around a child. And how could blame them? As I certainly wasn’t. Perhaps it may be out of place to say it, but the strangest thing had occurred to me now. Lilly was actually talented, for a child of her age. There were a few faces drawn and a few pictures of the woods and the sea. ‘Where have you seen these?’ ‘I imagined them. It’s something I enjoyed looking into every time I’m done reading the stories our teacher asks us to. ‘‘And you’ve never seen them before, have you?’ ‘Head shook on both directions. I couldn’t even face it still. She was such a peculiar creature. And I wasn’t disturbed by no face, no vision and nothing at all. For this I would be welcome to try. ‘Perhaps we could spend one day, just the two of us, reading or drawing. Or doing anything, only if you wish to. Would you like that?’ ‘Anna, not Lilly. ‘‘Right, Anna. ‘She was named Anna, of course. I forgot that for a reason. It was made on purpose, even though it may not seem to be that way. Perhaps or not, I should’ve pressed on with it much sooner. ‘I’m sorry, it’s just that, I’ve got a lot going on, you know? And it was already hard as it was, trying to get over your name and find out about you. ‘‘There’s no need to apologize, I know. Just don’t forget my name now. ‘‘I won’t, Anna. ‘Her eyes warmed even more as I said it. It was the first time I had promised her something. For the same reason, I wouldn’t forget it. It was getting cold nonetheless, and we were to head in. Four more cycles away. Two third of it in the Bunker. For as much as it could be counted on, there was a direct opening which had lain on each side of the levels standing above the main structure it bore. It would be entirely useless to consider ignoring it entirely, since there was something of a turn. One would have to consider this, lost billions of planet sized stars away there stood a single space rock which held a tiny hole in the middle of it, which had brought onto itself, only the pieces of a broken mind. A brain had manifested there, giant and enclave, spaced out as it was spread into every direction possible, in an attempt to give birth to the next descendants of Ikvor. The more it spread itself and tried, less of it could it be denied. That the worth of the vileness brought the peril of disease as it was forbidden for it to be pleased by the birth of other. Madly caught in its own trap, look at that creature and laugh. For all the wonderment in the way it approached, a disturbing pair of vacuoles threw themselves forth and spread ahead. Nothing more or less, the wonder, nothing would grow forth to be stranger. It would be less than graciously caught. It was pointless. Life refused to grow anywhere else but that spot. And it was, and cold, not as in winter, but. It would be hard to explain. Every endeavor ended up in the same place, a failure which could never even be taken to best them. Off into the space, where there was only one open door, one gate into a world where something of worth could be made. From the depths and the space eroded and for whatever reason, the stars imploded, he stood there. For one last time, a father and his daughter, by the ends of a river's side, thought it may not be seen this way. His emotions may not be conveyed, yet he chose to be there, amongst the reeds, standing and watching past the chip on the shoulder, wondering whether or not he would get to see her grow. This change in the body had been the only thing which made sense so far. It wouldn't make a difference, it couldn't. How could still place even stand after so much time? Without any kind of interference or mold, without the advent of anything from the world, how could it stand without facing immediate destruction? Years wouldn't sway a man, for he could no obey what order had been given then. Past their bounds when one could see, there's nothing to see. It was hard being there afterwards. Once everything was said and done, they simply did not return. The bloc in which Malt stood hadn't even been turned that way, to face the lost. Instead, he found himself back into an empty chamber where life would be just about the same. Empty and docile, not a single vile thing there, undisturbed yet, alone. It was just about how everything ended. And not a single minute passed without questioning how much is this going to last? How long until everything might just lay abandoned? Without anyone passing by; I have not spoken to anyone at all. Yet with each beat of the heart, he felt like passing, not from a stroke but of something way stronger which threatened them both. A realization that he had refused to take in. Factually caught by the fact that there was no way out, he considered the only thing which had taken him aback. Anything but this loneliness, anything at all, and it so close. Only a few feet away from where he stood, past the openness, and just around a corner where the drop should be just far away to out-do her need to see him once more. Claire was there with her now. I was here, irresolute. Without a way out. Anything would do, if only things were just like they used to be. My memories were still there, with her. Regardless if they had been alive or not, I could see us walk and explore. We were there and we didn't have to grow old. It was gone. To claim otherwise, would only prolong the waste of time. Much of the room had been in a poorer condition than I remembered and the only thing that crossed my head was what would happen there. It would be this or that. But for the likes of me I couldn't take what I said back. Instead, I'd walk out and close the door, making for the last turn. Now, I could see them go. 'You've lied to me. 'No one heard me in the hall, no one important in any case, to see them smile. Just the thing that I suspected, for the likes of me, was that I was never to return to that place, never to see it flourish or change. I could never see the people or talk to them again. I didn't know what to say or why that had been it. Why would they do this for me? Without a single word, one by one they simply disappeared, pulling away, losing whatever presence of theirs spilled in, never to be conveyed by the luridness they disposed off, right until the last one. Though it was silent, in some way, there were so many things it would want to convey. There was something I wanted to let him know. But he went away, and that's how I'd like to remember them, everyone with whom I've been. ' 'Malt, good evening. 'Barnabee passed and behind him, he carried and ashtray with a lady following back. There were others soon. Coming closer to it, I've seen them as they were. Looking away as if from the other side of a glass, never asking why this was the reason for their stay. Not to draw too much away, but It was time to join them at last. This would be my final entry, as I passed, alas. The room was warm. Elsewhere, perhaps, where there was no flame to bring in heat, it seems, like the only necessity would've been for them to carry on. Roads were in need of construction. And. A wind passed just along. It was rare for anything like that to happen. To even hold a candle by one of the windows during the night. Whence there was noise, now came the silence. Though it may have been abrupt, a part of this world died. Without any kind of explanation or visible effect to be reclaimed, this was something which drew in just about everyone who felt it. Like a prick into the beating heart, iron melting that organ of wrath. It was unexpected, but it seemed that even the cold machines turned and having seen it, wept. With the rest of the devices turned, just for this one moment forth. It couldn't be explained. No one knew why this happened, or why it had been the time. Sleep wouldn't be delightful, not would it happen for anyone else to try, taking away whatever was lost. Memory alone could not conjure him back for those who happened to have stumbled onto him. Yet he was there, with them, still. 'There were a few other things I had in mind for the place. ' 'What would that be? ' 'Interested to hear more about it? How about you join me in that case? 'A table for two was set. Another day passed since there was something remotely well to look at. That would have to be the case anyway. I was onset to look at them from other angles, thinking of a way out. Nothing really mattered any more and they seemed too much like celestial for any kind of bore to be had. One thing, if it didn't matter counted for whatever else faltered in the nearest atmospheric lies. With each falling layers, they danced cozy in their weird surroundings, holding everything apart, the popping them off as if they were nothing. As much as I admired them, I could see that something was wrong. Lean and falling, the heads were walled off the rest of their bodies, shooting long conduits which dreaded themselves as to release the dread. I lost control off everything, even of my gaze. I could stand hours stumped over the fact that I was lost. For better words or the lack them, I felt like some sort of disease which leaped from rock to rock in order to get a better view. Just who were they and why were they there? I couldn't be anything but an inconclusive thing, oratories they claimed themselves to be. 'Watch us go, play with us, why won't you join our session? 'Feeding with the deceased carriers in the sky, the ships started moaning as they were being brought back to life in order to be used again for feeding. It couldn't be anything but a strange desire to keep going. As for this quirk I couldn't stand for a second more. Not while I was so distressed, unable to set myself looking anymore than I should be. It wasn't something I had been proud of but I couldn't complain. For the lights which went off from that creature were even on both sides. Two bulbs by the sides of quarter-moons had been completely encompassed by the blobs. From their backs, large distinct heaps pushed on to form some bizarrely shaped wings which didn't need to flap away. Instead what kept even their bodies in the air was a constant digestion which continued long after they stopped living. By digesting the oxygen they had managed to completely endure, what they had completely aggrandized was the filth which had obscured most of the organs in the rise. And the advent of the great system which had turned the planet into nothing but a stream of nigh-invisible webs. Everything had spread from their insides to the very point where not even they could prevent them from communicating to the living cores underneath the spreading floors. It would be unnecessary to believe otherwise, or delve in the depictions they showed. Out of the thin air they showed the previous goes and getter, the ones who had come before us and had died in for the better days. It would be uncomfortable to believe it happened otherwise. There was no way to come back from the meeting with the higher power. That's the hierarchy in which they distilled their ranks. Though I may not have been aware of it otherwise, I had come into contact with the only thing which made as much of a difference as it could. Now it came to me, I wondered, what the language had been about. From the distant plains of the entrapment, one could sign the language and know what it had been about. Collroy stood there, understanding. Despite not one speaking to him in a while, he hadn't defiled the meaninglessness which entered his mind, instead choosing to do the only thing which would allow him to stay. He would join them, now of all the previous times with something to his mind. There were other things I could do here. Perhaps push for progress or alter the others of what we were making. But this whole utopia was nothing but a sham. This is where the main system lead to. And for that reason I had been spared so many times from ever daring to ruin everything time after time. I would be welcomed back without a punishment or a bad sign. All because we were actually creating the language of destruction. For this was the main process which begged the mere fact, to our own peril. Speech had been taken away from us for this whole purpose alone. It would be self-defeating to claim otherwise, for the need would set us forth. Undoubting on anything other than this, I joined them.

After realizing what this place had become, not a prison but something worse. A factory which only produced, nothing but the useless to be prized and put on dead markets only to delay the grand paradise. In it there would be nothing but the pleasing song, the bitter gongs and violins playing in the distance, wronged and pushed on the sides. Ready to die for a nation that never stood by the cries of the ones who were working in the lower zones, where they would be enslaved and cast into the coal. Burning with the endless masses they fed, as the animals would take in. Only for a time as well, for this joy wouldn't last either. Most of the cardinal points would heat in such a way that life would simply vanish without delay; this even would only be given life by the advent of the language. It couldn't even be denied, that no matter how hard they tried, they would be put back into their pins. Stricken down until they marched dead with the victims of broken words. Everyone spoke but no one heard. It was the one thing which could've saved them. If anyone knew about the messages they carried. If only there was a way to understand what agonies everyone was carrying with them. Then, perhaps there would be hope. Otherwise, life was wasted, classrooms filled. No one understood what the teacher was talking, as everyone was highly confused by the myriad of strangeness he spoke. Those weren't human words at all. A frame of reference would be just enough to draw in that there was nothing going there. No structure, only gibberish which spread lies and cries, and defiling worms which hid themselves in the young minds and the children's woes. No one knew about this. For a good reason as well. Reasoning would be forbidden otherwise and no thought could be freed from the malady which would provoke. Even the highest defilers would know what happened of the old. Farther away, in the sealing area they stood. Some workers saw but no one would say why, why were they making buildings out of their old bodies? A thought like this had been completely broken and somewhat systematically torn apart, until it couldn't even be recognizable anymore at that. Dormant or not, they would be brought to some knowledge yet. In the bottom row where they were somewhat connected with the slightest appliances of meat, there was the one rock which brought the derelict. Strange, so it may be, there were so many shades moving in it that it gave the vague impression of power. Not even that but that was the reason the language were being brought back. With each new discovery of a letter, a rune appeared on it. Not only could it dictate the hour and speech for the end of an era, but it appeared to be a doomsday device from which a single crack revealed the other people who would replace us. It was hard to look at them, even by the eyes of the watchers who were there. Workers would be denied, no more ongoing on the job. Something about them was uncanny, the way in which they passed through one another revealed far too much about them, which shouldn't have been surprising for creatures which defied the laws of physics. Through one of their eyes popped a hand which extended the entire of the head in an arc which domed across its body. Many more eyes and head popped into this ever-growing and spreading soup which kept popping in itself. Nothing could be seen until that very moment where a piece of it threatened to pour inside. And as it opened itself veering mouths to speak, a plethora of voices cried out in no speech but an intonation of pain, agony, the vein would be transmitted to them. Torture would be welcome otherwise, anything but this, as no human being could stand hearing their wicked lies. Some would recognize at least one of the hundreds or the thousand voices they created. In that building, as soon as there was a chance, bleeding would be highly pronounced and observed. For that reason, no one could defend it any longer. The way in which the rock grew stronger was by the blood of the people, which was rightfully theirs. Creators and deities which hid inside the rock of words. None would dare as much as spend too much time around them. For obvious reasons, they were seen as something close to being untrustworthy and even ratty by the looks of it. No others reason could fall into place. The lack of any movable spaces was a dead giveaway to the fact that they moved from side to side in search for something which would take them out. But where? Sometimes, dwelling around this place was pointless, as no clear exit lay. In as much an indefinite reasonless wonder, there was thing strange happening. It couldn't be described as being anything else but that. Judging by what was happening around them, one could draw the conclusion that they were taken elsewhere, in a place where everything was out of order. Claiming otherwise would be uneventful, stricken and plastered to a pint and a mind. It was unnecessary to explain how the transition occurred or the bodies slowly turned. But the old had come to change into beings which couldn't be explained at all. Intimate changes lead to the strangest thing which was bringing in the dead. It wouldn't even be as inconclusive as the fact that the stone disappeared in front of their eyes. Only a circle was left below of it which had been finely placed as one might say. Other than that, there was one thing which had been brought to the worker's attentions. It couldn't be anything else but those beings in their place. Larger than the human bodies, they seemed to dwell as wide and high as gorillas, to their bodies notions of empathy they bore nothing of the like. Instead, their limbs had evolved for battery and assault, which was vaguely displayed all around their bodies. Plunging limbs distracted from their smaller heads which had been given free reign now that they were trapped. Attached to the long necks no longer, from those empty throats popped out their heads, moving with the help of some small, ever encompassing long and bifurcating graspers. They pinched at every piece of their struck bodies, giving the impression of a moving corridor which made its way on a planet of dirt. Darker than the normal thing, they seemed to be spreading within the looks of their giant green eyes. Those grew along and seemed to push on ahead for as long as they could be used again. Small slits lay in their eyes. From time to time they opened and gave in a wink from the inside channels which dripped out. Smaller compressed mandibles lay inside which were over encompassed by the eye nerves strained and pushed away. Soon they'd freely fly and levitate throughout the room, pushing as much as a single finger which had been reclaimed carried on from their graspers. I saw another finger then, and a piece of the neck, but nothing too heavy they might be able to get. Not only had they not the strength to do it, but I somehow doubted that there was a chance for them to do anything of the kind. Blindness was overdue, seething through the strangeness of the walls. Inverted thralls started coming through the gates. By that, it was only meant that they bore some false ingratitude. A way of seething through their crude surroundings which had shaped them again and again. It was a problem being them, for them at least. For being there meant they would have to stare at every single creature, which reflected on their overall vestments. They equally spread their limbs into smaller pieces, turns and twists, pushing through the ground even, like big bot flies which had grown their heads, spread their winglets into their encompassing faces. Despite the spread, around a circle they went, making it seem that they had too many eyes to count, even though most of them weren't functional. Too many limbs which were too weak, and overall weak thin incisors which would be highly incapable of doing anything but scratch bits they were in need of eating. It would be necessary to believe that these were somewhat catatonic, after breaking through the mold of the ground, they stopped. As much as we feared them, as they'd draw near us, I couldn't stop but wonder why it that we were brought to yonder was. In this place there was nothing waiting for us to do. Only to tend to them, as I alone proceeded to do. My name tag was still there, reading Eckard. Lt. Eckard, a name which was soon to be forgotten on the other side. Not that it mattered since I doubted anyone could read it at all. But I started pushing through this thick atmosphere which surrounded us. I couldn't think of it as anything else, since with every push I found myself surrounded by a layer of some thicker air which gave into my solid brain receivers. Had it been only incontestable, I would've said a thing. Lost to my seething was the fact that my arms could completely encompass eighty inches inside his body. For some reason, it felt like I was pushing my arms through a barrel of oil. Hardened by the hard shell upon which they fell, I understood just what the skin on their face had been for. I could shapen the lump of fat it had been and even touch and rub in through. Not only had it not made contact with the oil, from what I came to judge, but I thought I would find something nearer the pulling back of the liquid which was felt. Without a doubt, I felt like I had lost something then. Pieces of my skin dripped in, drawing away and pushing through the last ganther that drew back. Its insides were fleeing from my touch, for a good reason as well. Though I may not be able to tell it otherwise, I felt that it was in my power to do as much damage as I could. Nothing would be forgivable or forgettable for the things I've broken there. Not only had I found it. I think I have. 'I found something. 'Without a doubt, they took this as some kind of warning, either because of the pronunciations, or the fact that those creatures were still trying to encompass the air. It was their nest, or their place, or their hidings. We were the ones who intruded and obscured our intentions through false speech. Enough of the detraction, it was time now. To see what I had picked up on my way down there. A feeling of total dismay caught him there. Pulling out of that almost silky cocoon was a man who looked just like his father. Eeriness crossed him then. Seeing his old man suddenly age in front of him until nothing but there mere crumpling bones and a nest of skin and bitterness remained. From that nest came a hand witch extended and arm. He pulled out of his father and threw him down. An almost naked man had come out, still bearing some resin which obscured his chest and the rest of his body. He was lean and strong, a muscular build, an eye green and the other missing. Instead of it there was a tiny black sphere which pushed away between the two sockets in circular motion which crossed around his skull. They would change back to green again and then, he passed over. Wondering whether or not he was a danger, we circled around him, trying to figure out this man's intentions. For the same reason he was here, we were here as well. Everyone was trying to look after their own, unable to comprehend what was going on. Not a single word spoke, and it had been enough. We were brought back and from the stone, which wasn't there anymore, we drew this. He was here to say. Though he had kept his strange appearance, and the way he behaved made us paranoid, we chose to leave the building immediately in order to avoid danger. Otherwise set, there would be a kind of danger which would turn us all ahead. Stripped of the skin, sent to an uncanny plane, unable to comprehend what happened or where the stone had disappeared. Something still dwelled with me. I could see a language appear on him. On his back, without a proper track, there were just enough letters which had been there ever since his conception. I knew that alone, without a way of going home and checking the photos, that he had vaguely resembled a younger version of my father. Though it was not him and this mold had been planted within us for a reason. Two more marks past the signs. A representation off a popping hour would come during the mid-day. It was time for a grand break where everyone was set to return to their homes and serve the time which had been put worth, while the second shift was there to take their place. With as little as a single word, spoken of little worth, I finally saw it there. Past the pastels of pollution, in a starry sky of bleak green stars in coal, I saw the watcher long forlorn. He had vanquished the only thing which had remained, of our living hearts at bay. Dreams were dying; we were lying to one another in the stations. Everyone began to talk and in their broken dialects, something could be drawn. Another symptom of the speech infection could be long attained. Time would be altered and nothing would remain without a way of jotting everything down. It was dangerous then; it had become vaguely inadmissible to look for the culprit of the dead roses which grew. In each man's neck, the children would be hatchelled and placed into the intruding bolvoid that came, in their large suits which were made to exploit the radiation the men gave. From the roses, a pink spread throughout their necks and bodies, much pronounced over the olive and the light skin they displayed. Yet not a single soul was brave enough to give in what they snared. Onto them, they had trapped the essences which were brought from a place their minds could not feel. Change had been too sudden to reel in. Clouds amongst the minds, blind people lost their eyeless dormant servants who were supposed to follow then. It was just another evolution of the language which seemed to bring then in as they would bravely take over the world. An impartial thing, the words had come to draw from within other worlds they beings known as caretakers. Need it be addressed more? Little was known about their real consciousness or whether or not they hid something in their suits. Instead, it had been a strange thing, the way in which they encased their children and took care for them not to be hurt. A spray had been used on their bodies which turned them numb. Afterwards, they had been properly sealed and left there to stand and watch. Nothing but the dark could be seen and some colored lights which drew out then in. Without the bitterness of watching, the snatching figures could not be held. Would it be unnatural if one was to cry of laughter yet again? Pulled from their bodies, something was as close as being repurposed as one could fathom loosing their minds. 'Those are my children. 'A woman shouted, but no one minded her at all. She tried to draw them off, but failed. Their mere strength and resistance was far superior than she possessed. It took the repeated struggle she displayed for her to be joined in the station, of four other men to restrain the creature. Moans were heard, hits and blows, all so he would be made to kneel, hardly being kept there at all. Eventually, it relented and got up, unwrapping his satchel in the back, releasing the children at last. Reunited at last they left and went on their venture. This had been only one of the incidents which had been remarked there. Remembering the darker days, a few feet, where the other side appeared to dwell, the first errands were: To peel of some of the growing carapaces that began spreading just about every spot of the body, where it wouldn't matter who would watch, to the one contender, damned he be. Looking ahead, one could see a large bridge, in the middle of nothing. It was made out of metal, crossed beneath not by a straight metal side but by crises-crossed metal strips which held the bridge connected by the chains which held it dangling from one side to another. Watching it go would be like trying to catch falling edges. Metal wedges which were there as well. One visible side had been that of a giant beak-like torn atop a standing structure in the dark. Approaching it would be vile and dangerous, as well as that strange and incomplete defilement of the melting iron coated icebergs which were starting to drift. As soon as walking could be achieved on this dangerous trap, you could see, just by looking ahead, a standing staircase which stood on a giant wall. If there was one conclusive and decent thing, that would be the color read which sprinted with the defilement of rust. A test was taken as the few anchored men revealed their feet at last. From the countless generations which bred there, they had not only evolved their strange eyes but were somewhat everywhere. By that, it could only be meant that there was something to them which had kept everyone back. A disquiet which had brought back the never-ending wonder of hiding in the metal clutches of the depths. Some would be stored into one another's colorful worn ankles. Carrying each other's biomass, and bones at last saved into small bags they had made out of the excess of nails and skin. AN eye had been exchanged, better than to die off, as a sign that they were part of the same tribe and there could be no question about the servitude and the way in which they'd throw the throve. A bitter hope emerged as soon as they could see. People were finally seeing. In the first encompassing tenderloin, which, as a structure, resembled a curved dome which pointed upwards yet still managed to shoot walls from within, stopped a few meters in. From them popped others which continued the same process until everything gave the vague impression that there was a texture which didn't belong there. As much as a few feet away would revealed some scolding troubadours sculpted in them, even some tubas as wall which were cleverly designed to produce as much sound as they could when someone approached. Before it may be asked, paranoia wouldn't last there for long. 'Greetings. 'It said. This was during a time when language could be comprehended even by those who didn't understand why. There were no dialects at all, yet the way, in which they produced devices, those mechanical wonders spoke through some archaic wilderness which may not be recognized any longer. But this wasn't any great experiment or anything of the kind. Instead, one would have to look deeper in order to find out what was going on. What would be wrong? And why would it push on until it might swallow. One of the members of our people had been sliced and elated with his back as if there would be no borrowing of guts. Brought to this conundrum they drew around the thickness of the gate, which still curved and continued in this weird place, only to have called into question just what was going on. As for one who had been headless such as I, or him who was missing his mind, I had regained something which would change the drift. Why, I have stolen the head of a human and put it in. Though neither of us even resembled them by the mere fact that our bodies were made out of some heaping mass of moving body junctures, it couldn't be denied that some of us had desperately tried imitating those things. Not in look but in the way we acted. Our fires were grand, we were finally fashioning tools and waiting for the dark to settle. Even there, everything was hanging in the air as if they were being held by something which couldn't be anything but undeniably set to an amount of despicable things. On their heads rested the vacuous holes which threw forth a pile of incredible growths. Each of them spread an unfathomable amount of limbs which shot forth but stopped soon after. Without the proper touch, one couldn't take away that they completely died soon after.

I would have to add, as being one of the few survivors there that there was the grand head of the metal slaughters.

Properly after, there had been one quick touch, brought by a hand that came as last which started caressing everyone. Slowly put to drought, they would have to endure through it, soon and stricken, pushed into the vileness of the standing pincers which dragged on from the ceiling. From them, crystals would pop on, dragging broken knuckles, pointing above. Soon they would be powered, stricken after the hours as none could wander any sooner, from the frontiers which were looked upon as the rulers would return. Another pair of minutes would revealed that an entire ceiling which connected with the pincers in the front. From them, there could be a way. It was much better than that. The fact that it was drawing near like some spiked floor which threatened us to go unrow. Waiting for too long would bring up too much of a threat; to even face it would leave the raw, unable to attempt an escape out of the pure stress which threw itself at them. Death would follow through without a second more, the adaptive properties of one of their hands started taking in. As they fell out, driven by a primordial fear, they had closely prepared for themselves an escape route. This escape plan had been nothing short of a formidable thing. To even come with such a concept was nothing short of being miraculous. Yet, down there. Beyond the it would be kind to asume there was a reason for them being there. It could just as well be below them there lay danger which couldn't be met by any resistance at all. What lay between them was nothing. Each step felt bothersome, as to what was going on there. It felt like the belly was about to turn its sneering waves upward and farther away until it couldn't stop its advancement. Tumorous gangrenes shot from the waves, drawing on until they couldn't be defended any longer. Self preservation would be damned; instead, one could only give in to the torture which followed there. Not a single man could take that leap without losing the grips which held us placed together. We only embraced one another in the warmth, dragging on until our bodies approached the dawn and the change. From the steaming metal only I could see, the thing we did was close to a tainted effigy of pain. Our hands were somewhat sacrificing a part of themselves in the very strange case they had pushed in. Rust would encompass skin, drawing near the thinning match. A batch of pump rat-fat ropes came from down there, revealing the servitude and the similitude which allowed us to get away. Otherwise, what else could we do if not convey the very strange appliance of guts which carried on? As much as we were disgusted by this sudden deceit and the change that were to come, I couldn't deny the fact that it was the only way out. We started ripping ourselves open, connecting what was inside of us, becoming one. Only by this was could we escape the sudden fall of the ceiling, succeeding by what we were met. As soon as we were wrapped by the ropes and made it down there, we all saw the bones of our ancestors, spread apart. The reason for which they died was because they had been divided. Instead of leaving them be, I could think of nothing but what our sanity dictated. This way and only this way can be the one true path which may save us from destruction at last. In that I say, let me convey only the part which followed as we surpassed the gate. Rolling on its various lumped and raised slides, I felt as if there was one way out. Death would be imminent and lost. To even claim otherwise would be agony for not a single cost. My bones and guts were for the taking now. I sacrificed everything just for this moment when a break ensued. Justice only allowed me to rip a piece of myself for a moment and see something spilling out of it. Undigested and promoted as a kind of filthy pox object, I saw him emerge. He had been a human man after all. Though missing from his chest there was a good part that entered itself, creating a lump of fat where everything had been store, he showed us the way. In which only the brightest of visions could fully convey what he'd done. From simple tricks in which he spilled out a younger version of himself, what came out of him enfolded the essence that stored everything. Everything down to the first primates and the first men, the ones up to the present, which had been completely copied and ready to replicate. In that pink transparent bubble floated nothing but their DNA, swimming and twisting, yearning for some release. Wherever they might lend themselves upon, no claim could possibly lay to waste. Deranged or not, he brought this on himself. A curse of tiny metal caging spirited followed from the rims of the dark in which they hid, readying themselves to strike him down. Soon his skin, the last retriever of woe sinned as he gave in. By now his piety turned him into a broken soul which would dwell the lower depths underneath those of our own. I could not confess that his sacrifice impressed me, for I alone felt no connection to the race and replicating it in its entirety without changes. If anything, if that were us, we could've turned ourselves godly even worse than that. A race of defilers, creators and dreadful creatures which were meant to pray upon the weak. Seek only what it's called. A voice called at last, and the threat carried on. Strange, how the ash fell. A fire had emerged from the world above, most likely from the coming of the magma and the hellfire generated from the essence of the Klyrhire. Vile, though waste no thought. Don't mention that. We rolled and tried getting away, with hope that we may survive whatever lay forth. Coming forth, as we advanced, the ancient kingdom lay in ruin, blasted past the rims of an ancient destruction which came and thinned the population into broken statues which were fleeing away. Nothing but expressions of terror could be conveyed on their faces, unforgivable by the likes that placed them there. Alone we were, stricken down by the final blow which put us on our place. A single metal pin shut us where we were, standing as if we weren't there. Listening to the humming of a giant carved, who was there only because he had come to harm us. He was a giant, bearded and meek. His face was almost bony from within. He opened a grin with so many broken teeth that it couldn't be denied that what he's done was agony at that. There was no joy though. Only the business of twisting it and pulling them out, then eating raw, as the purpose emerged, on the verge of the kingdom, he had seen if for what it had been. Wild horizons lay themselves bare, unable to come after what they had to spare. In a mind, bitter chimes awaited to reveal another reeling block which pushed on ahead. It was the eight one which had come from the world above, pushing forth in search for something to feel on. The pincers like the rest of the mass had been completely poisonous for touch, tempted as one may be, they couldn't be eaten or even enjoyed for what they claimed to be. Here, in this very spot, attention could be drawn to the one thing which pushed him own. Words were spoken backwards in his case and one he was fed he spoke from the many faces which grew on the back. He ventured farther away that the place they were set to meet. Four of them, empty sages with their bodies fit for some kind of punishment they carried around with them. Unpleasant though it may be, there was no reason for them not to look around and be surprised by what was going on. Each of them took their turns in order to replace what went on ahead to the are where the inverse happened. By then, the filth which had dropped from the ceiling over the various sponge-like blocks that crawled away from their strange masses fully infected it in its entirety. A strange type of infatuation could be seeing there over the fact that there wasn't any clearness as to what they were exposed to. It couldn't even be perceived as something painful or even malign but a strange cut in their hands and legs, their movements being imitated by each other as they drew in and changed their faces. Soon they would turn away and walk, permanently brought to an unsatisfactory amount of tendrils in their backs and strange legs which had stretching crow-like tendons. It would be almost impossible to draw away just what was going on in their new wholly changed perception, as they eyes were first to go from their skulls. Only a slight hint of a wallowing piece of skin stood there, stretching until the very point where it couldn't be brought to fruition. As for their almost primate-like bones, the middle part of the spine stretched to the point where the lower side from the basin could only crawl and be dragged on the ground unlike the others. For this result alone, there could be nothing set in their minds, only the stretch of pushing dead toes ahead, one on one. Better than none of the growing tumors and masses which were pouring from above. It seemed like the living ceiling was afflicted by the toxin. That could not be mistaken as anything but the flight of stairs, the pair of hands one of the sages started spitting awry. 'Filthy rags, I should've roasted your skin when I had the chance. 'A terminal effect came to mind despite this sudden realization. It was the mere fact that he knew that this place was a ticking bomb of growths. What they packed inside and what would grow could not only be dangerous for themselves but for everyone around them out of the mere fact that they were to be set to lose themselves in that myriad of talons which raised the ground and flattened the mounds. Some structural integrity would remain but only as long as there was a chance that this place would be thinned again. It needed to preserve whatever sustenance it might and for that alone, some sacrifices were had. As this progressed, the immovability that they would be met by the giant sponges came. Toxins would kill everything, without a doubt, until some resolve came and they found a way to either fight them or win at that mild unawareness. Woe to the one bringing death. Unsanitary to no closer end, there was this one thing, the inadmissible called from within. The sage which had eaten and digested the men had been called Myrthodion. And he had returned to his abode, ready to be forlorn again, stretching his vilest meaty bead which held his belly from falling in. His attempt was one of the first to be followed through as he decided, the only way he could be encouraged to find a way, life would convey only that filament of disease, to rip and open, shove inside. AN organ which would prevent death from happening upon touching the toxin and dying, it was the only senseless yet decent thing one could aim for. As it happened, all of the sages carried the same burden, trying to mix apart and do what they might to mix the chemicals and the anti-toxins. Burdens which would breed and spread the lookers of the dead could not even claim to be compatible again. First result of such an experiment was the strange apparition of a small fetus-inbred, beetle-formed child. He had been fully grown yet showed only the signs of the first conception, with all the body functions being replicated and yet strayed until the point where they had been completely laid together. From the signs of life which it had shown, there was only a sudden pump which stretched its many appendages into his every organ. Yet for the reason it pumped inside of him, he couldn't possibly tell why. No reason could lay for this dismemberment he felt. In some way, only this life could be allowed to live and grow as it would give him a chance to know just what might happen if life continued in its track. A lack of mildness carried on. He would have to return to the point of inversion, that tunnel or hole which floated in the empty space. Contoured by a bluish hole which crept on until the very point where light felt unwell and at home, it was a strange apparition, a malign nebula-shaped, almost orgiastic thing. That had to be the reason for their sudden change, not of the body but of the mind. Perhaps it would also be the only way they could find a way out of this mess and survive it. For that alone was the ultimate appeal, finding a way to wake them up from the waves as well as breaking the seal which kept them dormant. Younger generations lay under stasis, hibernating as they lay attached to a feeding station below the ground which had been completely and generously struck on making sure everyone was properly fed and put into the greatest condition known to the mad. As their brains thickened and ate through the bodily masses they showed, there could be nothing to stop this process. Even more, there was a suspicion to the lower beings that dwelled in the kingdom as well. It just may be that this sudden thinning was caused by the brains and their cognitive templates for the sole reason that they had reached a nigh-dreaming awareness which woke them up from slumber. Their constant feeding frenzy would drive them to consume just about everything around them. But that vile image could only be tainted by the sudden transparency would make even the bravest minds sneer. Yet, this was only the water source which had been converted into their nest. What lay in front of it, past the water-gates had been the ancient constructions, the houses of Sischelleout, a dreadful appearance being brought to mind. Blindly torn apart from the rest of whatever this chaos could be classified as, there stood nothing else but the chimneys of the living crematoriums which kept everything in place. Not to be confused at all with the rest of the sea which was thinning as it would be crushed, this kingdom in itself was outset on an area which would ensure its preservation from this cataclysmic event. Entry would still be forbidden to the sages who were still seen as criminals by those they lead. It was touching, for a while, trying to fit into the ephemeral grottos which stood about the place. What had been properly was the sudden interaction between the moving metal pillars around the open square. The whole area was stimulated by the strange movement generated. Though it may have been a struggle to keep on driving them awry. A few of the pillars were showing some strange laceration from which pieces of the inhabitants hid inside.

From each of them, a few guttural sounds could be heard, like shouts pushing forth some unnaturally plump marrow-formed condines. Long and spread just about in as much as eighteen precarious openings, they started producing an oozing blood which threw on stranded people, saved for woe. Known only in the past, walking back home. Coagulated blood stones formed for them, allowing them entry into the world. It was a matter of preference that he appeared there. It was an incessant desire to break away from the brooding of the fire which kept the incessant stole of the machines still popping on. While no memory could last forever, this would be the grandest approach to the last of the most incessant lookers which doesn't even take it into consideration anymore. This was a sign of the past, as no forgiveness waited for what was said and done. As much as the part which spoke from all of the remains that were there to begin with, I couldn't take away from this mess. Would it last longer? A sermon would be enough for everyone if they cared even for themselves. I couldn't hear them from beneath the trap door. Exactly fifty feet below it a staircase lead down the place where I rested. The reason for it was exactly that, I gave up too much of myself to be able to return there. It was a mistake, thought I was one of the many miserable creodonts who hid there, to even hide. It was never coming, despite the promise of release, that there would be a growth of the great atriccot in light. Of what was happening, there wasn't any denying to the fact that accumulation of contrasts which went away. Even thinking of a way to pray in their lungs would be disturbing at last. Think of me as thine will never look away. Only a few words could be said about this whole instinctive lack of bitterness which crept on. There were other high towering figures which emerged as well, revealing just how much of the place had either been completely enveloped by the lowest levels where only the last blast. So many dying breeds gathered here. Most of them had filled in the roles of those who had given their uncherished lives, fulfilling the last order of the great Empatriarch of skin. His words stood inscribed on one of the far gates, resting just as they would, bred out by the vileness which would be misunderstood. Over the very fact that there was some woe. Spilled as one may, the bitter walker who came out of the depths revealed lost stratagems which had been quickly unrolled from their filthy scrolls, in as much as a good piece of the known ground. A molder of disease pushed away as each word that had been placed there had been completely made out of rat skin not out of ink. To sink so low, would have to deal. 'It's real; I have seen in with my very own eyes now, the last temple is somewhere deeper below. There the last parchment lays hidden, resting as no other priest might reveal what's forbidden. 'No eyes would be interlocked sooner than it should be brought back home. Deepening through the gate, for the grand chair had been pulled, dragged by ancient tools which still enamored the onlookers in disguise. Had it been so long as to feel the last reeling of the lost beheaded fiends that came out? For, their marks couldn't be held unruly; truly they would be unforgivable as they came. Fighting amongst one another, there was only one emotion they could convey, rage. In as much as a few moments in which they started off their inside engines, it couldn't be questioned again, just what the reason for attacking one another might be. A fist came upon another, they stroke their bulky bodies as their muscle mass pulled out. Their tinier heads were dropped in the back, resolving to avoid any kind of damage they might achieve. For their bipedal nature betrayed only the vileness which spread around their red bodies and the blue crones which spread around, moving even as they produced about as much energy as it was needed for them to survive. With each accumulative strike, out of their bodies something was left out. From one such fight, which forced them to get as far away from the vicinity of the grand chair, they pulled out small cogs, filled-out giant battery blocks that could've killed anyone else, in order to sustain, the mass which would prevail. As they leaped and fell, nothing remained whole again. Fists would soon become bony and even stricken to the point where it couldn't even be forgotten anymore. Dread would heal no wounds, they would fall in and then, a blow and a swoon. They ripped each other apart, arms and legs and bitter heads which had been thrown out and bounced on the nearest floor. Not only could it be unforgivable but tainted as well and the faint would give the false impression that there was a slight chance that one of them survived. 'Another grand show for those who want to come below. 'A voice came. Inviting even for the peculiar lookers who wished the best, for those who wouldn't rest in awe, a bitter quality to rummage by. Words spoken, lost to the unspoken. Unprovoked by none, what followed through after they were gone would be the shout of ages, bitter spades calling in. 'Follow us through if you want to side yourselves with the great Collroys. 'Factions are named, better than the ones that sullied away. Some drew from their opening holes in order to search for a single way in, unable to understand what was to be called and who would snare himself up to the dark callers. Never to rummage through the broken streets or the feet of the kingdom in which nothing remained, they low-lives took this opportunity and refrained from staying in. 'Dark or not, be weary of that, trust no one down there. 'An ancient crone spoke, unable to provoke anyone to any kind of blessing, for this mission couldn't could them for its mildest kin. It could be interesting, just peering in and what had been done. A static voice called. Somewhere in the city, during a cold day. Shades of gray never came back; instead there was that weird thing which kept popping on the walls. Like some signs, no one who came into contact with them knew what they were about. He had seen it early that day, the way in which he'd die. It was thoroughly planned and hard to talk about. But in an empty chair he sat like a phantasm, an afterthought of what had to follow. In either case, this wouldn't fall through. The way in which he had imagined it, with a pair of scissors in his hand through a heart which would be spent. Alone, as he would bleed, looking away out of the window weeping. No one should notice him for weeks. Too many years were taken off guard. Life had taken them without daring to pay back. Promises would fall by the rinds of the autumn summer where they looked past those who died alone. There were darker days now. Streets were empty, lacking in odor, in them lay only that outstretch from the spots where spiders lay. Light wouldn't travel that far, a mistake couldn't take away from what came on them. Lost at for the touches, steel lances would turn as they peered in from crooked worlds. Without realizing yet, what came forth was a couple which couldn't even comprehend what was going on there. Blades of steel were overstretching their bodies in an unnatural state. By and by, already there wasn't a second thought to waste from this miserable state in which they began drowning through their own carved guts. In front of the few children who presented themselves there, there wasn't any hope from escaping the sudden. Attrition would suffice, as they fell to the first anchors of the ground which came as soon after there was an opening for them to draw in before it would even be remotely right to chime in and grasp. For the closest one staying ahead I have been properly trying to find my way in before one of the closest neighbors watching could cross in and enter. I had been dispersed as soon as I was looking by for a way in from this chaos. Cowardly trying to get ahead had been perhaps the strongest yet the weakest thing which may apply. My hands were trembling as I was waiting for the on the run. For the few moments which were as much taken as everything around us I could clearly see a way out. From the falling of each dead man, there was another one whose consciousness could draw in to the point where it wasn't even necessary looking forward any longer. As the toes to each hand started snapping one another by the mere staunch of the ones which were trying to get away from most of the unsanitary and decrepit stalking watchers. As a master of fact I was more than set on trying to get away from all of the disgusting and staunchly knives which found themselves underneath my door where nothing but the most inconsequential pains could be fathomed by the rows. One of my neighbors somehow made it through and in the process of doing it. It was an indispensable amount of his suffering that came on the other side and I saw, out of the likes of me something which may not ever be approached. For my sake alone and that of the others who were in the same room, I had heard the shouting which follow through the trails. 'Close the door and don't let them through no matter what they might tell you. 'My ears were shot my acoustic spear which made me want, to beg for it to stop under every circumstance I could get them on. I felt as if I was readying myself to ask for another touch, a march which would have some cherub-like remorse from the staunches which made their way in. Without a proper explanation I could do nothing but fathoming no less than it had been asked for meant. Proper ends would suffice, at the end of the day one could show the young what was going on there. On the fourth row of the watcher's creek, a few feet away from the building in which we stood, a reign of frost dropped by, carrying dead crows from the sighting fleets which passed from South. From them I could only comprehend the fact that there was a way to be worn and lost like a fleeing pig brought to its lost feet. Dread spread through the air, unaware of its own mad scent which did as much damage as it could be allowed in the span of time going back. A few steps, other men fell to the dreadful cutters which brought nothing but the swelling of the house. Soon to be coated in blood at last. It was highly unfathomable, even claiming it otherwise. Spared of everything around us, we were barren, left so out of the lack of clean blood which had been quickly replaced by a digressed replicant fiend present there. It wouldn't even be possible to look at it any other way than what it'd be. Seeing it be spared, of an existence out there. By the various torn static-like pieces which were spreading akin to dead locusts in front of the ever rising pillars which followed here, being formally known as a place afflicted. It wasn't going to be easy in any case, making it across the street. Even opening the door would be more than dangerous for someone unprepared. Thinking about it brought only the lesser thought which it had been. Skitting across the eroded guts they had gathered inside the room. Why, this had been a great idea. Merely throwing them across then leaping from one to the other brought in the chance to achieve such and no speed as no one might be able to get. Dispersing of the wrong thoughts was easy enough. Thinking of the wonder and the reason for taking the trip couldn't have been easier than it had been before. 'A mere thicket forth and I shall cross the bodies as my own. 'A pale creature which was a poor imitation to the one man which was looking out appeared to be parching its lips. Though most of it looks somewhat similarly to some leather balloon which pushed in and spread its rubbery outside as the mad coal like drawings of eyes, nostrils and a mouth peered ahead. It would take only a few more steps to take in and start plunging the few knives which had been acquired. 'Take care, Roger, it isn't safe to go outside. You should at least take a coat; I think there's another rain coming by. 'So much so, looking at the clouds did more than enough to reveal the sharpness of iron which started amounting inside of it. But that hadn't been the source of the knives. Instead, I could only fathom something as weird as seeing weird stars being chosen in order to be thrown or wasted as much for a single wonderment of messing ways. First, there were lungs in them. I saw one of them expand just out of its metal collar. Clouds would be breathing at an approximate state of fifty breaths per minutes. A grand thing, just to think about it. Another thought emerged. It may be long and even bitterly prolonged, but this speech, the written things, the language which had been given the power was there. This reality had been created by one of the most malign signs of the worst possible set by the likes of speech which has ever been merged together. Even out I would feel unsafe for the slickest of reasons. Thrown by the vial, nothing but a set of defiling woes would last. Blasts of gibbering remains would be thrown out of the gaseous traps, coming at last to the last trap. A giant fiery lock, or it may not be called so in any of the cases, as much as it could be counted back on. Sneering and peering back, from it came out the cremated bloated slug-like filled cherishers. Beings like cherubs only in the lingers most spatially defying nightmarish ways. Lust would be brought to mind after each leap which could leave one wondering just what went by. As the first heads started paying attention to what was going through, sinew became of the houses. Humans became cells, or similar things that hardened soon after the coming of the dead feeling of the brood. More of the imitations, balloon-like inflated cries could be taken as no surprise for what was going around them. Over more than a few minutes, Roger, the poor man stood there, unable to move his stiff neck. It had been broken for a while, removed from what kept it attached to the rest of his body. Unable to decide if it was worth to keep him alive and well, there was the one deciding factor, of the faction, which called for the stop. 'Save at least one of them for later feeding hours, when the children need to feed out of the bodies of their fallen brothers. 'Of course, it all made so much sense now. Inside each of the people living in this neighborhood, there was this strange incentive to suddenly form themselves inside of them. It was hard to even image the strange creatures which slowly materialized from the other worlds, as the forms they took weren't necessarily to be held to the heart. Locked after the rapes that followed, through the smoldering bodies of the shallow corpses, now came the first of the brothers, grand Illigh. Pricked from within the man, there was an opening as that of a glorious pulverized bloated train. In more than a few standing followers of his, this giant twisted trunk which bore no working block on top its neck revealed as much as two lines of teeth which pushed on. Less than the time it needed to take out and form itself as a single emerging blade, be wickedly obscured as it'd be. Another voice yelled. 'See? I have told him there would be danger if he went as far as that. Did you not believe me then?' 'More survivors? I thought they had all been taken care of before. 'To the one missing pair, they looked upon the despair they could show in their bitter memories. More than enough skin blades had formed, decaying and forcing the various tender alarming changed to occur. Harsh though it may be this was the new way of life; however one may look upon it after the dark of days. Better ways could be used, to even consider the dread which may be loose from all the battering rams that came out of them as they would be more than stricken apart. Toward the crystal palace then, from the crystal silken road which lead farther ahead from its cold gates, cooling as the weather stop beating around. Its arches were drawing farther; the glass ice-bergs and the ice-snow would slowly recede until it couldn't be livable any longer for any but the people in the crystal palace. It was a wonder whether or not thing were going like they were supposed to go, out of the mere fact that there was nothing but the snowstorm resuming in the most promiscuous manner. On top the throne a queen of olden days stood there with no emotion well conveyed over the fact that there was no Courtesan to join her now. He had been the one to appear, out of the snow drift, near the closest principals of glass, who would stray and catch the pieces of glass fallen out of her garden in order to bring back the rejuvenating sight she had looked upon. It wasn't a mistake that he had ended up there, without even a word spoken for those who were there nearing the age of their deaths. Stranded cold beds would suffice, and in her court, the dice was thrown, landing on xis, six times in a row. Of course he had been completely covered in snow. This was an escape from his mad form, another breaking by the surge which had come from the barrier, throwing him forth into the unknown. So many of them were lost now, undecided whether or not to be sided with the one who gave birth to them all. Yet he spoke in intonations, bringing forth some kind of missing alteration of fire, the warmth of the living having not belonged here only gave itself away. It would be unnerving otherwise, just by the looks of him. Compared to the people in her court, who were all made of some fashionable look-through glass, dressed in blue and white robes, he seemed to be solid in all the meaning of the word. Not only had he a weird appearance given form by the fact that there was something wrong with the armor beneath him, but he also barred the one thing inside him which pumped constantly. It was a trinket he addressed only on a constant beat and the coming idea of her mild deceit. 'What is that you're wearing? Around your neck, underneath that veil of smoky-glass, that mass under the snow. ' 'A reminder, your majesty, I've brought it here with me for reasons of my own and nothing more. I dare dread any explanation which may not suffice your majesty at all. For I am silken by the looks and feel and this tiny thing protected me from the reeling of the cold which inhabits this castle and this world. ' 'Where did you come from? And would you mind revealing it for me for only a second? 'The request wouldn't suffice unless he went on with his guise. Ticked by the second he revealed a piece asking to some red eyes stuck together, hundred of them, crystallized in some stone of their own making, caught inside a small depositing unit made out of metal, yet clearly working off some power source which connected his body through the various pieces inside of him underneath the gaps. IT was interesting, simply observing it into action. From a single flicker of the hand they all began jerking over and melting into a red haze, a mist which suddenly surrounded him, melting all the snow. Even from beneath him, the marble floor reveled the ancient iron, carved into the dark surrounding of a bitter corded snare. Alas, the Courtesan had realized. It would be my chance after all to reclaim a kingdom as my own. For, this sudden appearance of one of them here wasn't by chance. It had only been the result of the vileness of Agamemnon who took a stance, though it may be interpreted as foul play over the fact that it wasn't the Duke who'd hold this place. Instead, there'd be no wonder, if he were to come after and dethrone whoever he might, this wasn't exactly right by any means at all. Bloody and forlorn, there would be some silence made as the song stopped. 'Silence in my court, you shall all silence yourselves immediately as I dare say this is not the time not the manner to carry on with. 'She was vile, as this haze turned back into his device, proceeding to creep in the reveal. It was an unappealing sight she wouldn't hope to stand for long. It brought too many whispers and talk between the two rows of citizens which were in the room, at all. Outside they'd die, as uninhabitable as the world would fashion itself, there was this one thing which stood at chance to ruining everything for as long as there stood the chance to do it after all. 'You still haven't told me where you came from. 'I was merely contemplating on it as I still remember threading through a barrier and somehow ending up here with no explanation at all. Excuse my imprudence your majesty, but I would not dare insult you by any means at all. I'd simply like to state that I am lost without a way to return from whence I came. 'How could you say such a thing after revealing what that blasted machine can do? Dear knight, whatever you might be at last, know that you're somewhat of a threat for both me and all of us at the Court. 'Not to reveal too much fear, as if it hadn't been obvious at all that there was some fear there to be had, yet no conclusion could be drawn as far as it could be. Would he be dangerous or plains, was it even fair to attempt prodding into him if he was there to last in any case? Blasted be the piety for those who watched hadn't a single care to judge for them what was carrying on there. No word would be broken, yet, they spoke freely as a group of four priests approached. 'Allow us to test him your majesty. This would rule out the entire conclusion and allow use to find out whether or not he's dangerous to keep. 'We could find a great deal by simple observation and our mere calculations would bring nothing but the most dreadful results. 'They spoke and never told anyone or anything of what they shared in as much as a few second they spared with one another as their tongues provoked no discourse to be told out loud. From the time they spend in there, I couldn't even draw what they were working at. It felt dreadful, trying to see what they were preparing underneath all of their purposefully hidden cowl. Not only was there an opening but the Courtesan had decided that it would be much simpler if he would draw near and start his device. Without having to worry about the guards who surrounded her all of the sudden, one release was enough. He puffed out of his chest and seemingly came to his damned senses. This was simply how it worked. Just by the mere scent which perturbed everyone standing around them, there was this sodium nitrate which didn't belong there. Before anyone could as much as approach him, there was only one great explosion which went as far as to ruin everything around them. Words couldn't even handle drawing on before this new hall had been revealed. Just by the amount of smoke popping out it would be clear enough that there hadn't been a single surviving object or creature regardless of the pace they had attempted getting rid off. Jest or not, this would suit him well. As he found himself standing in a much grander hall than he had been accustomed to, sickened by a single portion of mental disorders which went by, it was time to remember. Most of what he had in his head, including the nearest recollections he would come to look back upon were those of the Duke. 'I am the Duke now. 'The Courtesan spoke, somewhat caught by some strange antique which had left him unprovoked by anyone. Of course, there was still the problem of the weather outside, once or twice spoken, and thrice said, it would be done again. Somehow he would find a way to control the weather and make this land habitable through some way.

Fancier things had been there, for some reason, yet. He couldn't understand where this red gift had come from. It was a mere companion of him, a tool which had fashioned itself out of nowhere in the most peculiar manner he could count on. Despite the sudden show of the near damage he had produced around the place, there wasn't anything to spare. Doubt inhabited as much as one could throw upon. Worse than the defilement he had managed to produce in as short a period of time as one could steady himself upon; it was obvious what he was after. A gate, a device he had made which brought him into the other world. There he could find his servants and bring them back home. It was time for him to finally succeed with the plan, brought by the mind and that which sought not his destruction but the eternity he looked for at last. Damp though this place may be, he started examining it, searching for some reason to the fashioned floors and the peculiar walls which had been encumbered by the drift of cold. From a rift of the iron he had done as much as it would be needed for him to carry on with. Thrice he stroke one of the walls with his fist, to reveal a secret passage which lead down below. 'I knew you wouldn't forsake me now. For what I've done shall not be forgotten past the crown. 'His legacy would say, that even after his ascension into it, he would go ahead and reign. Past ventures would carry on, pursuing the mad. It would not be right to intrude upon what was going on past the sutures and the sad part. Looking forward at what would last. Stairway leading to the lowest levels in the hold, broken and spoken for, it would be unnecessary to simply accept that this was the final descent. As in that secret chamber there laid a few half-bodies which had been brought from another portal, alas to the admission that it went on. He couldn't simply believe what had been brought to him on. Lesser beings would suffice. Outside, the winter wouldn't last. Weather would start drilling as the many long faces and their staunch bodies, legless but planted into the earth would start howling for the taste of dirt. It was a catastrophe caused by his advent. He came into this world corrupting it, as the red crystal in his chest gave a scent which activated the planetary formation. Striped of blue and red would emerge, this world would be wrought in iron as the pillars would spread, arching as if they were of his world. Though he had been highly unaware that the dreadful plants inhabited this world, there'd be no concentration to the damnation brought by the ages in which they hibernated. Not only would it not be forgiven, nor would it be allowed to last, but this blast of uncertainty would bring a wave that cast the land into the obscure. No end could be seen in sight, but a swoon as the dust settled. From beneath the earth came rising platforms which mechanically brought buildings and structured from beneath the earth where they had belonged for the rue of unearthly delights. Disturbed metallic ghoulish souls would rise and spread, bitter but not dead. Shrapnel and led would inhabit their minds and soon the illusion fell off. There hadn't been any crystal kingdom where they had spared the works and the doings. Instead, there was only a fashionable look of the ancient onslaught which took place before they came. A nature so stricken by lings revealed that organic matter still grew and spread. Set in flight, the delight of flying stacked creatures revealed a relationship of disease and of missing feet, propelled by a domed wide-hole which shot on as many perilous long tails as they could fathom creating. From the tip of each, amidst the passers, one couldn't even observe what the thrashing of the masses might add up to. Fiercely they would fly like balls of yarn, but ready for some unnatural fight to be forced into. Jealousy would be lost, a blast for the broken hearts. It was dangerous thinking about it. But the pleasure and the danger associated with it couldn't have been greater. Such a weird and peculiar time as it had been there, stopped. As far as he could tell, something of the statue was alive, kicking, or barely trying to push itself away from where it stood. This centurion moved on its own as soon as he commanded. 'Step aside. 'The Courtesan demanded, as it cleared past the ribs. Nothing would be spoken afterwards regardless of what had been promised. It was still burning by the time he had gone there. It wasn't a simple crematorium, but an appearing gate which spread the crosses evenly in as wide as it could possibly envelop on its own. Without as much as a single wonder there was only this vengeance it had thrown against another world. What had been worse was the fact that the graves weren't filled with corpses either, but their graven leftovers. It wasn't the place he was supposed to be in, for plenty of reasons which couldn't be disclosed at all. To claim it so, as much as it was important to see what had been thought of him, the various ashy remains had been completely forced to form small portions of the land that were already set on the disquiet. Soon, it all resumed. An endless supply of labor never set on a time to stop. What had been completely set to a single stop was that shattering of the plane that came as soon as he had entered it. 'Greeting, Duke, we've been awaiting your for a while. Plenty of us would be glad to accept what you have done. ' 'And what would that be? 'This sudden promise of servitude revealed only the false advent which far surpassed words of dead. It couldn't be achieved again, for the fifth' gravedigger came. He had worn some robes which had not only been completely falsified from those of his brothers, but he alone admitted as such. 'Many of them are lost, you know? 'This man who came, the staunched back and missing reins revealed much about himself at the entry of those standing spades. First of all, he contained within himself only a few perilous tools which didn't inspire any kind of trust. He would be lost for the likeness which bred the dead that follow through the winds. 'Blast them; I lost a few more of them earlier this morning. I cannot help it. No matter how hard it comes onto me, I find myself staring as I let them go. Not a single cloud made out of the fallen returns, could you believe me if I told you that? 'Another aspect that was revealed, just from his sudden floundry, as it he was intentionally showing me what he had underneath his eel-cloak, it came, never to be trusted yet again. I saw that his body was just a simple extension of the chromatic cremator, burning inside him still; bodies shiver and gave a feeling of unquiet. There was this vague impression he gave that despite how many people had entered the confines of the trap inside of him, not a single one survived. From his face, I could draw a pseudo-beard, made out of strands of burnt paper, written over the ashen ink as the one cremator said. It the back from whence more of the piles came. 'This one was expected to come. You must give him what he wants. ' 'And what would that be, oh God-forge. 'From one of the dampest piles which were moist from an unfathomable amount of water which hadn't even a place here, there was this sickening appeal, the plea which had no place to be. Dread wouldn't be counted on, as it would be decided. 'Bring it forth and let him send on what we need. ' 'A deal it is. 'As the great grave-digger Esepchalliot spoke. In a vile amount of tones which came together, stricken by an unfathomable gaze that refused to go away. 'Careful now, runt. I don't take kindly to those who want to trick and harm me, regardless of how you present yourselves, I couldn't trust you if you were to give yourselves away. I don't know what this border world is for. 'Other than the obvious reason he expected there, something about the orange in the sky and the ashen forests of crosses, the perfidious structures in the distance which never passed to any avail. Just what was this place? 'Another hole in which we ought to bring everything from the worlds, flooded and broken, diseased and other broken souls. ' 'So it hasn't stopped yet. ' 'Indeed it hasn't. I would've assumed you knew about it by know, after so many damaged creodonts that would give their lives to save what they could, you'd be surprised about it somehow. ' 'I've got no time for this at all. What I wish to know is the reason for me being brought here from the cold. ' 'There wasn't any cold hole that from which you came. ' 'What do you mean? Would you dare call me a liar? ' 'Not a single change, but say, what have you conveyed there? ' 'Listen you miserable grave swollen, I had to break the crystal block which had guarded the trove which was a castle for my own desire. Crumbled under my will, they had all been completely destroyed for the likes of the appeal dread carried on with me. But the ice and glass and the mirrors they carried with them were all destroyed after I revealed to them the force I carried inside my crystal and my will of steel. ' 'Oh but you are wrong, Duke. Know that you were deceived not by a creature of glass but one of gas. It may have taken a few swollen forms in order to trick you as if bred of old. But it was nothing more but a fleeing ghost, a dreadful apparition made out of some vile gas. ' 'How do you know all of this? 'Inquired the Courtesan, as he approached with an unknowable gist. It couldn't be that he even considered it. But the lack of marks or even glass which melted, or any kind of remains seemed to match up with the fact that it may be alive. Somewhere, free to flee as it did before, fashioning a trap with nothing but its trickery. 'Say, in that case I wish to know. If you're known in what's been going on inside my new kingdom even before I came forth, show me where it is, tell me if you'd please and I shall properly dispose of the intruders at large. ' 'But I shall do you one better. With the gift of the cremation, we shall make it so you'll draw the better of their life's essence, the bitter memories and hardens of life. In that case you may become stronger and even get to bring down sunder. 'There was the appeal of a strange deal he seemed to possess underneath the coat. It was a strange kind of perception to even think about, but having come back onto it one could know just what the case for it had been. From underneath it, there came a pair of bubbling, constantly inflating irises which drew forth to as little as eight fourths of his body. 'I maintained them for a while now, there's no need to be concerned about it. 'Some vision were vile, closely as he could be, it was obvious that he wasn't even considering looking down his proposal. Of the various bursts which came, each pop gave him just a vision of what he might. Sides were plain; the beast lay clearly in pay as it was stranded ashore. Bore would the cantor say, for the mild illness it threw forth. Proper tools would've been needed for this vision to even draw near the point of being conceived with again. No conception of the surrounding of the area could remain for long, over the fact that something was drawing in back from whence it came from. Thirst couldn't progress any farther until it had been the time again to scavenge there. From his silky, pristine long body, a living liquefied skin shot from across its body forming a bridge which fell. Soon, unless ought the blind to look ahead, there was the insight which called forth the unloving to be called again. It dragged itself slowly towards the only way one could deny the existence of such a staunch creature that found it rotting away. Bloated even as life itself couldn't convey what happened. Throwing forth even more gaping indulgences, came to it a few smaller gnomish-looking small human that were in its service. They were its accomplices, as well as it could be called into question, with an uncountable loyalty which spanned from a tiny white glowing bulb, tiny as a pea which took control over their minds. Not only had they remained as frozen as they might convey as less of a single shiver which came from their lord, but they also threw themselves forth until it couldn't be sustainable any longer for the few promontories it exposed. What it took for it to display its might may as well had been only the dreadful psyche intrusion which converted a fat lump of their brain into a usable asset that slowly crawled inside their spines, going lower until the point where they had lost their influence and power. Towering over them now, what was observed would be pure fear. It was this fright that gave an opening to signal for itself. As their chests opened and from them bursts large antennae that were needed in order to communicate farther into space, suddenly, they had been completely closed for whatever reason that couldn't be called forth. Whatever it saw there, it wasn't worth threading over. Not a single second could be spending that way, suffering by the way, similar in kind to them. Looked as if from one of the long telescopes of glass, it saw for a single second what awaited out there, past the outstretching galaxies and stars. A thorn which kept breeding until that point of no remorse when nothing would matter any longer, as the universe flattened forth to its magnificent weight. By now, it was late, perhaps too late as the unholy being which had set itself against it, though he may have been known as a necromancer, died. It was a fell swoop that suddenly devoured most of the brain mass he may have hid through some day. Disgusting and repulsing, ever encompassing in some pucker-planet he may have inhabited now, what remained of him was only that growing Laplander which returned, to the orbit of home.

Wherever that may be, so many days had passed since it would matter. On their tiny tribe, and the strict bodies which held them down, there was this. Messages had been communicated for their chieftain, brought back from the ones which were propelling themselves into space with as little of the indoctrination that remained. 'I am the Chalk.

First of the tribe, I may therefore speak of the problems we ought to share with the newcomers from the. 'Voices faded. Their voices couldn't be heard. Overwhelming, as much as it could be called into question, there was thing disinteresting aspect which kept beating away, drawing as it couldn't be conveyed. The power which lay still in that face, the winterless peer which chose to draw away all the hatred and the vileness, lack of hope, dreading to come forth. His pox-infestation now affected everything in the most atrocious manner. It was inhospitable, that's the only way space could be called now, as a result of the fact that what it managed to do in as much as a short span of time, of a millennia was the conversion of the original plan. Drawn from one of the vessels he had posses, Agamemnous had managed to transport this information from one to another to another, so on and so forth until the very moment where it wouldn't matter as well as it could be counted forth. One eight of the eternal celestial body it wrought for itself appeared in such a manner of disease that it wasn't his. It was given forth for one of the most stricken visitors that were there. Having nothing to do with him, he was simply there. By the time of the inception of the universal heap of biological organisms, he came. And it developed its cortexes as the infants which were drawn away. They had become a layer of armor. What followed it was one of many machines, drawn from every place where technology developed on a whim. After that, the seal of words, everything being thrown forth just for that chance to avoid detection from the mad disciples of disruption. It wasn't even worth looking forth. It wasn't a choice any longer. Trying to get through the shallow chambers below, where the conduits were being attached to their bodies. Could you simply believe it if you came to see it happen in front of you? Just a few months earlier, of a greener field, a beast had started pushing through with its furry coat and broad sinew of pink charred sides that were coasting its body. Not only had it charged through one of the nearest villages but somehow it had become also apparent that the village as it was being destroyed. After a fashion of lost songs, the villagers ran back to their houses, lost to the frames and the strangeness of the plays. As much as it could be excused, the various disused songs appealed to no man, as the beast came out of its den in a mad attempt to find top one who awakened it. By far the appeal was lost, at the cost of drawing away and pushing through the nearest heaves of metal plates which occupied the entry into town. It had been dangerous to be there, just in the streets, as everyone would more or less fall prey to the ones trying to get away from the deciding courageous thundering roar, the boar-like head revealing the body that wouldn't snore. From the mere fact that the only pieces of it which appeared to even remotely start pushing some kind of deformity out, from its back came the anchoring looming trunk, chaining by itself some kind of spherical demigod figure without arms or head, instead it popped out some kind of double-triangular carapace which almost threw the rest of the body out. Just by the mere force in which it strangled everyone around it without even touching them, one could take away that there wasn't any fair chance to convey. 'Stay away from it. 'A woman shouted as her only child seemed to lose itself to death. Without the countenance of words, the straggling words would be missed for the paying. Straying from defiance, an appliance of disease would only throw the others where they pleased to be. Four more patches of skin fell off, revealing a skin which had been completely battered and smashed inside it. At no point had it revealed anything of itself, from the way of gathering the townsmen during the night, against the glares, to grow its body taller or wider. To the very point where the pattern of blue diamonds came to shine brighter than some of the flames that were on the display. Each of the diamonds started drawing it, coating the normal skin of those drawn to it with the same color, to bring them closer to the pain. Egyptian-like symbols came from one of the antique shops. In those things there were scarabs riding on bats from an old animal nesting lot. IT was time for them to be released, as they would simply chase the pigeons and give into the alarm. 'Make haste and wake as many man as you can. There's a complete state of emergency from which we cannot draw away. 'Look at the flames, they'd say. For nothing could be altered any longer for the sake of no one. It would take nothing more but a complete runt to see what was about to happen to the beast at last. From each of the eight legs, metallic prison bars shot out at curved towards the head, in unison, after the side. It couldn't be called as anything which may be. Other than the way in which the bodies taken in started acting like livid corpses which wanted to push onward until neither of them could suffer their persons anymore. The mere fact that was there was a pure ingrained mist which came from its pores or something similar to it. Not only had it not spread, but from the looks of it, plenty of other nail-figures pushed ahead. Nothing but the lightest of birds could follow through as they formed their lances, bitter dances following through as soon as the knights charged and swooned. 'Prepare for another charge, just like we were taught before. 'It was strange, after the dark chaos which had emerged just a few months ago. Simply taking it back, just looking at the empty crater in which the castle had been and with them mourning the king and the generals, this would topple them again. Pain couldn't be used to satisfy no one for all the likes and the bitter stories that were told to grimmer tales. For each time they had been charged against, there would be a sudden turn, as they'd flee. Knights had become petty and cowardly as there wasn't any value to be maintained any longer with everything which happened in mind. Archives wouldn't speak, but spat on them as they had, the old tavern broads came to their senses and closed the door back. 'Back to the action, you've got children and wives to protect. Defend the families at every cost. 'Another bitterly knight came forth, a pair of some. 'Elizabeth of the madly torn roses. 'And Lord Trian, who was nothing more but a deaf mute, blind and senseless who was guided by nothing less than fate. Know the fate and know it well, for it was the ones who guided his well being. No jest would suffer any cowardly approach. Poisonous toxins would creep ahead, never to behave, as the upper plains spared no view. While they were busy fighting with their pints and medieval artillery, flying machines would borrow views, looking at them from the highest peaks. Never to reach anything on their own lost to the powers of the clouds and the throngs of the sky. Living free and never to be caught down there with the lower men for the grandest treasures there were.

‘I feel as if we could’ve helped them in some way if only we were there in their place. ‘ ‘It’s late for that, go to sleep. ‘It was time for the slaying, the quay being drenched into the blood of the beast, beaten by a pair of faltering fists did more than put in down. As the knights fell down their horses, injured still by the mere force generated at a whim coming from the beast, it had become apparent, that this creature’s lamentation faded as soon as some of the blows landed on top of its skull. Seated on top of the beast, they cheered as there would be no way to appear pure. Soaked in their blisters, the citizens yelled. ‘The beast is dead, the beast is dead!’ Yet not a single one could tell, why the wonder at it. It felt too easy, too benign to be simply ignored like that. Doubt sparked at the knights parted, pushing the maidens away. ‘Step away from it until it’s confirmed. We’re not sure yet whether or not it’s gone for good. ‘Misunderstood, they only appeared to stray and crazy. Quays would be out of place if not for their likes to appear staunch between the sewers, shallow as their apparitions were. Whatever had infested this land couldn’t do anything any longer but mess aside. Not to abide the amount of strength by the muscle which stretched, pushing ahead a kind of dread which misbehaved. ‘What do I see, at a bitter angle no degree or amount of growths. Their tops have come forth, moving to an appeal. ‘The degree that they progressed through could be felt like sharp razors cutting forth, felt. A child came by one of the green growths, and as he did, a piece of his made a guttural noise that dealt. With the pain which may not be conveyed by normal means. Instead, it seemed likely for him to give in and follow. For, he wouldn’t wake up tomorrow in the same place, instead he’d seem lost, in some narrow crevice. In which he’d rest, like some root which spread, underneath one of the houses, lamenting like the beast as it house. Bitter coals inside its guts. After the first initial cuts the squires made, they filled it with something which would make the beast too heavy to lift back. Not only that but if there was even a remote chance that it might come back. As it was. ‘Dig up a hole, yank it by the big shoulder and throw it in it. By morning we shall have a feast. We shall clean it afterwards and eat. ‘ ‘Won’t the coal and the heat and fire ruin it? ‘ ‘No, the insides are too hardened for that. Here, look at it. ‘Braver souls looked away for this reason alone, as he came on and started striking one of its livers with a blade. No scratches and no marks, nothing to symbolize the amount of hits justified this approach. And the violent thing only continued forth, trying to shove away as much as it could bay. But no one noticed yet. It was timed, for the blind spots were there, and no one could even hope to be aware of the slight changes in its face. Regardless of the openings and how many of its organs spilled out, it would somehow remain alive. No amount of force could push it down. ‘Roll it over then; we have to make sure everything goes according to the plan. We could risk something here, I’m sure of it. IT would be tempting to let it out in the open, perhaps leave the harpies or the vultures have a pick for the bones and meat. ‘He knew of whom he was talking about, and to be fair, they all knew that there were some out there who might see it for themselves. As something to grab on in delight. The boy, focus of him there, as one of the many rooted ones which were swallowed by the puckers. As soon as another process was done, this extraction would have to be properly hidden from those who’d sniff about the placed. Otherwise, the risk of discovery would be too great. Enabled now by a deep desire to be safe, the green muscle on top pulled the iron grate from behind, careful making itself appear like the grates of the sewers. Towards it there’d be no question any longer as to what would be possible to look at, as if it would matter. Logs would fall, the bitter sky eruption after the dices fell from a bitter howl of the town’s walls. Still in construction, yet they demonstrated to be thin. Nothing stopped the beast from coming in. ‘We need to do better the next time. If they keep coming in. ‘ ‘Dorhun, I think I speaking the best for all of us when I say, we'll do fine. We handled the beast and obtained a feast for ages. They'll speak of us for weeks now. Can't you see that this can turn into something quite profitable if we're paying as many good hands as we can? Just listen to me now. If we're working on this for just a longer while, we should have gathered enough followers to finance a new order. We wouldn't be remnants any longer, don't you get it now? We could be recognized. 'I think this fight got over your head too quick, you're drunk also, I can see it by your feet. Shaking and stirred, the young man had no idea what was about to come forth. Even with this small victory, there had been wounded men who couldn't walk any longer, or so it seemed. By midnight another pair would have to go outside and stand watch. 'You know, Kayoing, I can't stress this enough. But I think there's something going on in the country side. For now, things had been. 'Dorhun paused, to look around at what was going on around the tavern.

Tables were occupied at too fast of a rate, the Templers were getting smashed and trashed by the ale without questioning the consequences of doing so in a place like this. I was to wonder as well, what the reason for it, if any could tell. Who might be the one to unite us, in a while. 'There's word of a war coming, in order for a succession to be made. Now that there's no king, there's the problem of taxes and of the ruler of the land. You know, when he disappeared, all of the king's descendants went out with him. Not a single baster exists up to date, from what we've been made aware. I'm surprised of this thing as well, but there's a bleak future ahead. Our order is the last thing which even crossed my mind now. With all the chaos going on there, I'm surprised there won't be a turnover coming from the farmers and the countrymen who might arm themselves and be crowned as well. 'A peasant king?

What kind of insult is this? 'Well, there's the alternative which I cannot help but stress enough. 'His eyes were now approaching a level of unnatural movements that made him feel like he was trying to strike for silver or for gold. It was something which made him inattentive and lost, the cost of it being inheritably wrong, caught off guard and stricken by the side. Not a single waste of thought remained as he spoke of it again. 'We might be conquered by one of the adjacent kingdoms of Ghunghn'Ur. We could be drawn into an alliance with the Republic of Turn, or even worse, we could be completely swallowed by the bandits who might come from the East. Even the assassins from their nations of their Enclave. Though I have a feeling. 'At that it was already late for Dorhun to hide what he was about to say, as a few men gathered around him, trying to hear what the fuss was about. It was indeed something which brought only the fear of fear and of rage. Thinking of the distant memories where he went around the world and saw something much viler than he could recollect. Vile pockets of smoke, dark Carrions who hid in distant forests yet claimed to be of other worlds. It was so overwhelming for a single knight, to face so many threats during a drunken night. 'That it might be a band of evil things that caused all of this chaos. King or ruler, wherever he may be now, I cannot shake the fact that he had too many enemies. Shed of them and nothing remained; I could only hope that there's a better place waiting for those like him. 'On the likes and on a whim, there hadn't been any question from within the ranks. With one exception, which drew back. 'What do you suggest then, captain? 'He looked at the young squire. A lad by the name of Sesk, bluntly put, and shaken, very much misunderstood by his people, peering ahead, lost even for the very likes of words that never found him. I could see him trying to push in something of a word, anything which would even remotely make up his worth. 'But I am lost for words, and only the coming of the days will tell. Until then, we'll have to keep bringing in the dirt to fill the crater. If we're left undisturbed, then we shall somehow build something better. Otherwise, I couldn't tell of a brighter future for our kind. With all those who are against us I couldn't even say in doubt that there's something great we might be approaching. On the contrary, we should still ourselves for a war. 'A war in this condition? But not even our walls are prepared to suffice. 'We're no kingdom any longer, just a petty town, I know. But that won't change the fact that some will take the opportunity to strike at our hearts and take over; you should know a lot better than that. For the very same reason we were brought back. Not officially, but we took the mantles of the knights' order for a reason. To protect the people and the future generations from the chaos that may be. 'Wits were for fools and no one wondered just what the reason for them being there might end up leading to. No concern for any word had been spoken by those who had not even the remote idea what the future has in store for them. Foraging even farther, the mines would bring us just enough to take them through a few more years of wonder. 'I think we'll have to wait. 'Then, it was time, for farther way, where the land was stricken to the ground. A few meters below, where the agony of picking up cherries of wooden longings, the brothers of the disease brought something pleasing. One of the warlocks had thought that the best alternative to hiding was to lay with the dirt itself. His underground moving fortress had been a giant mole-like construction which spread eighteen legs in both directions but never dug up anything for its own. Instead, from those giant and long absorbed limbs it had produced something magnificent for everything which even peered on. The amount of dirt which came from it caused the surplus to cave in because of the mere fact that this dirt was alive. Not only so, but it could eat the other fragments of the soil, growing and falling below, drawing near, ever since one should know of the doings of the caves. Wrought by the unnatural verdure which was lacking, the plants couldn't grow any longer, other than the snatching of those who had dared betrayed. The warlock hid them inside rooted canals where they would live for days until falling through. It was strange kind of living as the moving fortress was horizontally inclined, moving to the sides, unable to pull out of anything as hard as it would even try. Least of all, one could call it a draw. Living there had proved to be as hard to function normally there. Just by looking around the various spoils he had collected appeared to put him down. Some of them had been rather unpleasing for the various amounts of stares they were trying to spoil away. It starter withering for all the living foam that was brought in by the mold that manifested in each corner. Delightful or not, brought by the disease of hushing tumors, there he stood, stopped as he should. For as much as a few passing minutes and the hours that drew on, he couldn't for the likes of him understand what was going on. 'Bring me one of the tablets. I need to write a message. 'Spoke the upper voice. To his voice cords there were as much as it could be allowed, a way in from the shouting hanged servants which were pulled by the rails above them. There was a desecrated amount of spoiled limbs. It was harsh, trying to push through and spend all the time alone. Realizing that most of his servants were unspoken for, which left him stranded in some way. Without the presence of the opportunity to speak with the other warlocks, it only meant that he would be alone. He had just a few more challengers who found they trespassing long before ages had been known to happen. Properly dissected as they stood now, it seemed that they gave him the look. Something about them made him reflect on how well they might serve him eventually if one withstood. Power and glory for the rest, dismissed even to the test of some woe. A grim reflection came from one of his connected mirrors. The room he was in seemed to bear the wideness and turn of distant and open venues, like twisted amphitheatres that were spent, turned and twisted to no end. A blend of many pillared crusted teeth of green dampened marble held everything from falling over. No intrusion could last. Latter than the ones before, life could continue no more, despite his attempted plans to obliterate the land, he had somehow skipped over one great detail. That being the fact that not even he could deal with his force that emerged, like an aura from all the objects reflecting a piece of his grim soul. Mostly the mirrors faded and show the old truant. Brought to his attention was the fact that a pile had even dared move again on its own, in dismissal with his choice to tie them down. It couldn't start faster, could it? Movement may be slow, but one that would matter. It slowly moved, making its way through the broken and ill-formed chests of wood, and the catch-a-knee, to the broken degree on which he looked ahead. A servant returned in a matter of no minutes after a shout was heard. Not only had it been completely concealed for reasons unknown, but it went forth to inspect the area where he had stood. Nefargo stood, holding in his hand the body of a lady he had kept and hid under the sunken replica of Luna, broken and cradle on the wall he stood, he couldn't understand what the reason for her leaving her spot could mean. Celese, young and pure, mainly preserved and kept before the sight of his attunement to the broken swoon. Regardless of his attempts to hide her away, he'd put her back in vein. 'Begone servants; I've got no need of you any longer. I'm to spend whatever I have left of my time with her, do you understand?' No ducts filled with tears and no tears at the place, only he remained with his dear wife embraced.

Would things be different now? As soon as the fortress even showed the promise of returning back where it belonged, there would still be the fear of the outside which couldn't get away sooner. In was one of the old storage cells where a few of his stored elixirs wasted. Exhausted by the stay, Nefargo dragged himself forth to the very spot where they've been brought to the only standing locks that faltered. As much as it had been important to look back, the past was gone. Brought to the cell, as much as a few feet could tell of nothing going into circles, damned be the one corpse which found it standing there. Mouth agape, pressing ahead with the few drops in it, for the sake of what would be the kindness less embraced. A faceless thing from having ripped itself asunder, by the drinking of the plunder. Foiled grease in a glass that almost turned itself fitting into some gas. Braced fore the impact, he shook himself until it would be safer to get him away. Bowing to the prayer he conveyed, only the upper piece came unscathed as the body imploded and a fire extended. Not more than a few feet away, it had spread into as much as what would be, an only the steps, you'd see yearning for scrape. By a mere change, he had escaped with a few burns and a contradiction which pulled hairs, unable to repair what was taken from him then. It was a miracle that neither of the other flasks had been destroyed by what was going on there. An escape wouldn't even prevail to the ones ahead, coming in. Feeling what had happened within the proximity of their master, they stopped. Simply as he'd be allowed, to regain what he had lost on the ground. Ears stood on the farthest edges, a nose and a piece of an eye. Eight fingers and a cut from his chest which let just enough to have been known and tired. In a pile made from them as they gathered in order to spread what they could save, there was that. The only arrogance that could be allowed. 'Leave me be, I said, I don't want to be greeted by you, my servants, not in this way. 'Stricken down and beaten now, he chose to crawl away. Back to Celese, to plant him in her chest, near the warmth which he denied to the day when she had died. What a mess his fortress came to be. As soon as there was a weakness showing the walls started releasing as many chains as it could get. Regardless of the passing and what could be told, there wasn't anything which could bring her back home. From each hook attached, there were some brats of skin which promised to snatch as much as it would be derided. Caught by nothing, this liar faded. Only to appear again. 'Having trouble now?' Nefargo had been asked yet. The being standing in front of him was ill, fat, lumped, made out of big bodies shaped like exaggerated spheres that could only draw on. Death would come from it as soon as it opened the broken mouth. It was through the horns that legs drew on and walked, like pints of ivory which shot. Nothing would be brought to question his drawing eyes, small like ticks or the fragmented hilt and helmet which peaked at its massive shoulders it shot on. It was pleasing, having that amount of hope which had been displayed there. For the same reason, one of the contorted spine which dangled between their wastes, diseases lungs sprouting between the chains.

‘I got your attention now and for that I cannot even focus any longer on anything even near the. ‘Sounds couldn’t even be comprehended anymore for what seemed to go on and on, close to what would seem to be the track and the dragging of the age. Those organs were not only culled but they almost seemed to be desperately swollen by the amount of blue air which drew in. Some symbiotic liquid resided inside of them, ever growing up to the point where it couldn’t even be called for any longer. A made growth pushed onward, drawing forth until it had revealed. What the appeal of that almost growing radiation had been, it would start pushing out other species which didn’t belong.

Such were the bird-like beating filters that came out, which only server for the making of the giant, slowly as it would be reformed out of the many pieces which came forth. Undornth and Creppert, Llorth and Smondrr were some illiac names, given to the ones that tamed this fiend. As corpses gathered, brought by the device, the servants acted in the mad name of their bitter shallow mage. ‘I should advice you to draw them back if you know what’s best for you. Otherwise, I shall decide it’s time to part ways and you shall not see me again. ‘ ‘Who are you and how did you manage to intrude my fortress? I assure you that there’s no possible way in. ‘ ‘Would that matter for someone my size? ‘What was the even talking about? Just by the mere denomination of what it looked like, this was obviously a dark figment of what appeared to be, the disease of the mind and the lack of access, whichever it’d be.

But not to go ahead and strike, he would be useful as to pull be back. ‘Help me get up then. ‘ ‘As you command, warlock, but know that you’re rather heavy. ‘ ‘Don’t insult me so. You know I’m unfit for anything but what I had been trained to do. ‘Both of them could barely be there, in the same area with the growth. For the same reasons that had been listening before, agony and fright, it was evenly clear that there wasn’t any way to understand where they might be able to draw the line to the blunt stone of white. Might they not realize it yet, but it was starting to draw on forth. The one which had been locked for far too long that his mind was no longer any kind of delight to be seen and held. Better to the ones who never should’ve worn himself through some kind of battle, or to the mutterings that came after from this grunt. Just how many living things were there to begin with? Just the other day, he had heard something close to some kind of intrusion only to realize now that it had gone bad. In the gut. For him and for the one that didn’t realize it was time to move away. Not to overstay the many infantry units that he brought. Those small insect-like pins of overgrown shrapnel, wingless but stuck in air. Like pieces of debris that all group together but spread as fast as in the blink of an eye. Not a single one gave in to what had been the culling of the fortress. ‘I could see why everyone has taken upon themselves the desire to destroy me. Perhaps it had been a mistake to go on the other days. My past still haunts me and the future may not even be conveyed any longer. ‘ ‘What had you done? ‘ ‘It was in the night of the fire. ‘To which it had been started by one of our own. Responsibilities akin to it would be immediately shared just to spare one another of the pain betrayal would bring. Ringing in what we had counted to be one hundred men who had been slain, a number including the deaths of the guards, the city watch, a few drunks, the citizens who had nothing to do with the event. Worse even, would be the animals inside their dens and their master’s children playing in the streets. But that had only been the first part of the augmented fire. What came out of it would be in the very fact a dreadful kind of predicament from which neither of them could come out from. It seemed like time had been frozen to them. As the flames completely charred their skin and bones, the living fiery liquid which dragged on would be quickly forgotten, brought to a stop. In as long as a few days, praying wouldn't even convey what was carried on. Lost to the souls that were brought back inside a standing altar, dedicated to a machine cancer that devoured technology, the broken screens filled with static would forever play the images of them burning. It couldn't even be accepted any longer that there was even a chance for them to have made it to one of the many heavens. Or through the purgatory which was known to be something in the similar vein. Instead, they would live forever as memories as the liquid made out of the burning embers and their complete water-bodies would survive the worse outcomes of them all. Stagnation would be perilous for them. Not to count as long as they would fall for what was coming for them, but wonderment would be disease. Pleased even by what seemed to be the coming of the pleasing song. Though there were no lyrics and no woes to be spent by the machine, what it had brought from within were networks as vile as to learn how to defile humanity in a continuous rage. A sham, as it had been, the souls would be turned into machines, eventually. The entry into their society was hard to achieve. Simply by bowing to their large over encompassing robes you could gain their trust. A pure nuance lay on top of each of them, as if it would matter, just to be caused. White gloves appeared to hold their masks but there were no forms and no vile coats underneath them. Greeted at what ought to be one of the grandest balls, they would throw themselves. There are those who wonder how we got here in the first place. Water kept dripping in for a reason, coming from one of the upper floors. It managed to encompass the entirety of the floor in a short amount of time, yet no one had even been remotely surprised by it. How could they? It was a wonder whether or not they still functioned in as much of a way as they had then. Prior contact had been established but even that went away. I sit alone and wonder at the bubbles popping. Just what lay beneath the floor couldn't be anything but the result of some stricken otherworldly bit which sunk in and wanted to draw away? A bit of some land, a great part of it which didn't exactly fit in but wanted to have itself there, closer to some kind of bedding. Where would they be hiding now, if not underneath the soles of the fish scales? They grew if not erupted from the various fish eggs that alarmingly spread somewhere they didn't exactly belong to. Each of them carried a few others from the previous generations. Generously declared, they were already painting the rooms in the absences of the lower-sides velvets. As one may look into their strange appeal and draw near to as many of them hiding inside the remains of those who died, were dead, or seemed to mimic the feeling and the constant depressions which buried underneath the skin. Where water was, those velvet beings followed. Arriving just in time through some stricken holes between the scales of fish, drawing away and pushing through them had only shown the insulting woe every single one of them had gotten through. It would be of no use, trying to find out what they actually looked like. For that alone would not only be insulting but it would also reveal from how far they had come. Travelling through tunnels they had wrought by themselves wasn't easy. It couldn't be satisfying, looking at then static for hours. From standing prisoners, they had carried through, moving through their head whilst breaking through sinew. By the end of the plunge, there was a connection. Water poured through their bodies as it would be so easy to absorb them. Delighted by nothing more than the look of the shallow behavior, they had come to seal a deal with the mix below the floor. Not only had it not been water, but the simple combination, in order of the mixing chemicals to even ingratiate them with both the poison and the diseased notion that there'd be a way to feel the scents of the devouring needle-wrecking vapor, there was that. A stop to it. This had to go slower, unless the lord could be distracted from their ball. In that case, there'd be no way out and no way to push ahead from what was going on. Without even a way to track the various ways in which they were making the noise, so many infections would freely start breeding as they were being fed the perfect component of all. A vile of water-waste that touched their bodies from above. It would be cruel to think of it as anything else but that, that. Cruelty could be called into question, as a sort of famine emerged. Despite the entire room being unlit, one could plainly spot that there was a hardening which outlined itself. But that wouldn't even be close enough to allow the water to rise. It felt on it like a man of the dunes. Unable to grow further, as it was aware, itself, from the various amount of chemicals which gave it a fluid consciousness that they could track it down there. From the raft beneath it, the creature immediately destroyed a good portion of it, revealing the giant gap which had encompassed as much as a few feet beneath the ground. Though it may not be that surprising to see or even give into it, there was that. A view of the bodies which were buried before the ball even started. Not of their own, but some of the guests who had shared a few of their races to them. Of course the darker ones would be too unpleasant to be allowed to live. Furthermore, they had been skinned alive and tormented for hours before they had been put down. In as much as eight quarrels, they had been eaten. Various extremities such as long legs pushed in and started digging until it had been close to touch. Bringing what must've been the least interesting of them all, the roots that went that far revealed a way out. A mighty tree lay somewhere, somehow inverted to face and dwell deeper into the ground where nothing even mattered any longer. Once the realization came. The dead remained there for too many centuries to call, and yet some of them still moved, as if their muscle memories still kicked in. Desperate or not, they'd be brought to know. 'Listen to me, that who tries rowing into my head. I had been made aware of your intention and for that I must admit that I'm displeased. I wouldn't like to have my body thinned of the sustenance which kept my brain still going on. For that I, Lord William Crottsworh would kindly suggest you move around. 'From his nest of this strange being it had become rather apparent that it wasn't to be advancing further. Instead what seemed to be that case was the very face that it actually started giving in. Better opportunities could come, as for now, he seemed to be pointing at the drawing mass with as much as a single sharp bone fingers. It seemed likely that it could cut just about right, around the edges and at least deep enough to force itself in without being absorbed. The deal would be simple enough, it would only have to avoid touching him at all cost. With that set, there'd be no way out and no jerkiness to it. As for the dread, something was spoken for. In the few minutes in which they showed up, the guests trembled at the sight. Each of their slow but precise movements would be felt throughout the floor at a rate which would not even draw on. Deathless stares followed as it was decided, that the oozing block would split, right at the dead man's feet, as it drew on. Uncalled for what would be as much as few moments there. Looking around anywhere would reveal the ravel of the seething scrapes. An unfashioned amount of bitter touched dirt spades crossed everything which had lain around. What was bound to be touched longer would be that strange apparition that crept stronger as it slowly ripped. The aura which had been generated from it could only draw forth most if not everything of its worth until that break. A slippery cheerfulness which drew on for its own sake, now the corpses sang as they were thoroughly coated in the watery essence, orange but closer to the guttural mess it had become. They were pleased by this even as they came on to see five great forms in which the heap split and started burrowing themselves in order to escape. It hadn't been felt yet. As strangely deranged as it had been, most of the guests were unlike the others who bowed down to their feet. For change, they know this was a ball, yet their masks were something which didn't fit the theme at all. High worn armor, they were the destroyers. What had been conveyed was the spirit of their sake. A dread for the matter, something that would falter after, to the point where the one slip actually came to their feet, one they drew their blades, their spikes were filled with rage. From just about every corner of their vaulted helmets, pointy shoulders and seemingly hard cuirassed scaled rings, the ones that were fashioned after the metal plates found in factories as well. Others produced a strange king, made out of steamy hit, produced on top of the ceiling as the rain stopped, that's when the music had been brought to a crude loop that wouldn't last. And these lords or beings, couldn't even comprehend, what was going on there and why their ball was crudely stopped when they had done nothing at all to awaken. Dreadfully taken by surprised, as they approached, there would be an infanticide coming by. Each strike against their might robes revealed what they hid beneath them at the strike of a rose. Giants yet infantile, which had plenty of cord splashing, eating and drawing from their sustenance, waiting. For what they've done, no man could look back and wonder at his sins as they yelled quickly draw aback. 'Spare not a single soul this night, we shall raise their hold down and bring it to the ground. 'As the order had been given, it was a curious thing, just looking for another way in. For each dreadful command wouldn't even be called. Into action, no reaction had been given for the unspoken words. Stranger woes couldn't even be called into action, as the pieces of the robes lay scattered in the lost corners. Steel would not appeal for all the water turned to steam. 'They're boiling me alive. 'One of them shouted, stricken in the head as his masks and hands departed. It would curious, seeing it again. How those who brought their large hammers with nails. They would bash and bash until there couldn't even be a survivor called into question. No direction could lie in their path as this pact of vileness was brought to the other chamber at last. What had been discovered there, on primitive chambers which could be found just about anywhere, were a few changes put of for a supreme act of torture. For each man brought it was obvious that about three quarters of them were kept in a state between decease and the breathing. This was unacceptable, just seeing them exposed like that. Robed beings were kneeling in their dark chambers, candles might be lit, but the signs beneath the red flit couldn't even get close enough. Brought to what had been the shout and the cowering corpses they had abandoned revealed many of their intentions. Be them vile; be stricken away, no emotion could convey the loss of thought done by the crying and the laughter of the infantile creatures abandoned after the fall of out of sight. Some still moved but it was only now that the intruders heard their cries. A memorable image, which would haunt so many nights, nightmares, would be welcomes, to possibly escape what was going on. 'Slay them as well; leave no survivor that may haunt this place. Fires might begin but let them not devour them from within. No doubt as there is, we may be approached by the disease of change. They're infecting us as we speak, for we were never as deranged. 'Second of four legion spoke, but he hadn't done so unprovoked. Nor had he been properly right, as what he had believed didn't align to everyone around him. He had seen in as a mercy, as did they but no one else had claimed that otherwise they weren't as bloodthirsty as they used to be. War was something that went on. Another man came and strokes a hammer into a pulsating child. IT was undefenceable, looking after a way to understand how the entire manor darkened as soon as there was a way to know. To throw out those who had no place in the world. To stop these vile experiments which were nothing but ungodly in a world which didn't matter at all. No consciousness would last for long as they all tried outdoing one another with the slaughter. Four men charged into the room, crushing the robes and the men which had been cursed upon the tables as strike after strike ripped everything in halves. Not only would it be upright, but the lack of touches brought to their own. Scorn devoured, fire bothered as it began. 'Bring the pillars of this place down. Make sure everything is broken down. 'The fire wouldn't start until they were rightfully gone, but they would have their sickly surmounted fun for as long as they could bash a skull. Not only had they drawn to the point where it was dangerous to stay, but as the steam continued, and the others pushed on, they yelled again. 'Stop the water from flowing, we're going to completely scorch this place and leave no survivors. 'What hid on the higher levels were nothing but some who dared give in a lust which had no place to be there. Though they way of interacting hadn't been through normal touch. As their lack into the members which allowed them to do much of what of what was missed. They were annoyed and pricked, pushed down and replaced by nothing short of falling beds, carpets and rugs. Everything was coming down. When they tried getting up, the same treatment had been given up, nothing short but an attempt to escape revealed the broken fountain from where they came. 'They need water to survive, let's break it in that case. As I said, we shall not allow a single should to escape. 'No doubt about it, as it seemed to be a simple case of understanding what was to be at their feet. Corpses wouldn't last for long, as they grabbed a few and smashed them under their metal boots. Masks shattered revealed that they bore skin and muscle, even a brain. From their floating robes and their gloves, more of it came out. It was obvious that they could feel pain as in those tight halls, the echoes of their pain couldn't help itself but shatter. Long after it would even be comfortable to look around, they'd be bashed again and again into the ground. Not as fast, as to be breast, after. What followed was only a way through which they couldn't wonder any longer where they had failed. It had been planned so well. Most of the human guests had been taken from villages in the west, where no one would miss the obscure. And no one could fight against that which hadn't been understood. 'Why must you intrude on us now? Can't you see that we were merely trying to have our fun? ' 'Abominations such as yours shouldn't be allowed any kind of word spoken to us. But since, I see you broken, standing with a dead infant you've probably stolen as well, I'll tell you this. Vile thing, you shall not curse this land any longer. Your vileness ends here, and as you near your end, I'll send you back to your shivering hell where I could only hope you'll die forever. 'In this shocking end, the bitter words had been spoken and came to be lost as well. Second blow of the foot, brought him down to the point where he couldn't even hope to soothe. Most of the inglorious strikes, which broke through the ceiling, another king of steam got released at last. Not that everything was stopped, a few of them had been prevented the escape. All of which surrounded and got stuck in a giant empty fountain which promoted nothing but what they waited for. 'Look at how their backs are exposed, crush them here and there, let's turn their water into blood. 'Sword and war-like hammers came crushing against spike and bitter spine fell on as they were being drowned instead of fleeing back home. It had been magnificent, seeing them struggle that hard. Struggling to see, this was the time to be alive and breathe into the musk of air. 'They're starting the fires, fall back men, before we'll be caught in it as well. 'Fright couldn't explain the rage through which they broke through the gates, through the stairs and through the valley. But it wasn't fire left alone, what they had planted there were living explosives which threw the venture as it drew on. 'Everyone's here, captain, it's time then, isn't it? ' 'It is, from now on it's time to bring actual power to our conquest and show them that there's no better way out. 'Other than this show of fire and explosions which brought the great destruction and the bird of a gigantic smoke king, bred out of the steam which symbolized the great conceit, they had smiled; they had dared face the vile ones and got out unscathed. 'It was a slaughter. ' 'This wasn't a fight. ' 'We want more. ' 'The night is still young. 'Without stopping, they pulled their mugs and rolled the barrels back, drinking as much as they could grab their hands one and carried on in search. For others to move on to, the band of mercenaries carried on. As if called by the winds of fate, they couldn't even hope for a way out. Brought about the deathless gaze, in a maze of broken circles where there was nothing to carry through, disease wouldn't be counted on, as well as they faltered through. A great standing pass, waited for them at last. And in one of the spikes which stood near one of the bridges it seemed that only a pair of corpses even mattered as they pushed in until it was uncomfortable for the villagers to say. 'There's something there, on the other side of the forest. 'A callback to the only thing that mattered for now, in the sunken piece, the better parts of it being tainted by the scourge of the drought of bones, latterly brought to the moot. A few things were taken into consideration for everything which had been worth. The power was so strong down there that one of the vessels gave in. Without a single amount of perception for what was happening around there, it happened soon. The bunch known as the Agamemnonyi started planting themselves deeper into it until it couldn't be caught any longer in the next surge. A power which went through the barriers emerged from them and suddenly they formed a few circles around it. Deceived by it and what they had promised before, this hadn't been clear any longer. Reality was somewhat sealed into everything which happened around. Bound to a promise which was there, from their strange ritualistic misbehavior, they've done it. It was dark and sudden but what they had achieved was agony from within. A miniature tower had manifested in their ranks. Though it couldn't even be believed any longer, this is what it had done. With the ephemeral link between spaces, far succeeding everything that lay forth, a single start had been taken through. Guided by the coat of red, this tiny miniature of a dwarf broke through the various shells and never came back into space. As it passed through, every hole sealed with the marks of a long and prolonged gathering of iron, steel and other elements which weren't bound to touch themselves, feeling touched and brought to the uncanny look. A filthy thing, misunderstood. 'We'll draw too much attention on ourselves now, do you realize that? ' 'It doesn't matter any longer, here's our new plain. ' 'And to him, my friend Agamemnop, I say, look around at what I brought to your gaze. 'For eight five spears came, all of which were hidden and spread. With the cogs and metal shrubs and everything which pushed them around. Now, the conclusion had become supreme as their numbers thinned one by one. Brought to them were the bodies of the suppressors, of which duties ended, never to be called. 'Now it's time to fill the gap. 'From that tainted area, where everything went about, just as it had been intended. Gravity had been quickly conquered by some, who had planted unwholesome beings out of this world. It was them who managed to put everything into place, making the celestial bodies harder than they ought to be. That's how they fell as the faces stuck themselves on the surfaces which couldn't flee. It was tainted, a destiny which never could've been achieved. Lies would fall with gluttony, rust as they couldn't even wager themselves out of this. They even dared paint themselves lower than what they were. 'Let us live, faces of filth. ' 'Perhaps we may have misunderstood you some way. But do not punish everyone for the wrong doings of a few. ' 'Silence suppressor eighteen. You are to be stripped and removed, forced into the water and sink in with us. 'Submerged by force, this glorious show couldn't go farther than it had been looked down upon.

No amount of fear or distrust could make up for what was going on. An after image with many of them appearing and manifesting in. Other versions of Agamemnon fell within, sent back. Yet more of them joined their ranks. Sooner as it happened, from each of their mad dimensions, the projections started being shattered, faltering to the power they could push ahead. Without certainty there would be weakness. A weakness which had been exploited as they planted their unsanitary ways, undisturbed by the deaths of the lower beings which surrounded them, for each death ooze into a pox-face which rested around them. From their insides there was this filth which wanted to go out and fill the world. Another wave, which mixed with the bleakness which poured from the stars. From other realities where everything was bound to be infested, the geometrical illogical forms suddenly took their appearance instead. Life would be stricken instead of being allowed to continue undisturbed. From the bones of the creatures that fell in, the first wave of suppressors thinned as with their numbers. Not only would they not be allowed to be seen or felt like. As if swollen after dark, stricken by the mad, it didn't matter what went on. Luck was only copper now, iron for steel, ice which become skin. Like an effigy of their doing, they embraced it, forming various gaps of guts that raised themselves and started floating in. Portals of meat which swirled like vortexes filled the place, which dragged on what was theirs. For the guts became harder, hardening to the point of them being used either as anchors of some kind of weapons of war. 'We shall cherish them only because we admire what you've done. Without you, we could've never faltered and be done. 'With that, there was only a way out. As the great city started being destroyed by the architects who saw no way out, the flood would waste through the gaps which were reflected on top and through every hole of the arena. Until then nothing would be brought to action and the remnants of the white beast would spring to life, part of the anchoring pillars which had been sent to one random location multiple times. Division had been laid supreme. Without a way of knowing, their generations thinned in the most precarious way. Diseases wouldn't last; guts would be blasted back, as for it, the one who generates the planet of Cleth'Anor. From the depths in which they sent just about everything which would be sent, arose the one great divider. Its planet had been split in half by the appearance of this Goliath sized, brunt cheated, like a smaller core, made out of organic materials which had been left over from a previous evolution that shot. From his back pulled out multiple limbs that didn't belong to it. Which hadn't been the worst thing about the creature, this god, but the fact that he bore, their symbol no more. Instead, a faceless mark stood where his head ought to be about. No more would it stay there waiting as it charged through space. Having attained travel through the outer rims of endless profanity just by the mere fact that it willed itself into existence, this divider would be sent. Seeking for the thing they detested but were too bored and perplexed to attain. There somehow, they would speak. 'Find the Thorn and break it from within. We cannot suffer its existence which might parallel ours in some way. Make us proud no matter how hard we can try, we'll never find it on our own. 'It was that voice which stroke the deal, the appeal of which couldn't even draw forth. What they were interested in was the one fresh paleness which inhabited a lost piece of space. Drawn into the two dimensional world which was thrown forth by this wicked looking strange thorn. No plan would work as well, if he was there, danger would prevail through the most capricious manner. Thrown around the places, it was time for the only ones who managed to escape in the first place to draw some breathe. Not a single Suppressor had been found yet. Despite their placement and the sides occupied by them, it wasn't likely that they would be captured from where they stood. It was a turn towards the right direction, on of the homes war evenly set. To the proper beatings against the led clicking with the lights. ‘At least I will make sure there’s someone to beat on the door every twenty minutes or so. ‘ ‘What would be the reason for it? ‘ ‘I won’t be able to sleep again unless it happens. You wouldn’t get it. That’s a personal thing, you know? Trade an eye and get a fish. ‘Without repeating it, there seemed to be a single moment where he pushed it in. Could he hear it yet? Fifteen minutes passed like that without a single loud sound passing through one of the doors outside. Usually they’d come not in pairs but one could understand where that came from. For fifteen minutes straight I wager, I could stand tied, licking the door, waiting for something more until I’d get there. ‘There, I saw it. I mean I heard it. Sorry. ‘Charles was unsure on himself. It’s only been a few days since there was a close call and he had heard something which made an out of place sound against the door. Ever since the, he’s been outside, plenty of times, registering every single change that happened on regular intervals.

For this particular occasion, it seemed like Alan joined him. Without being troubled by it, there was this one bothersome aspect of the apartment that shook him off. Rubbing him with the most solicitous manner he could be in. Words couldn’t describe anything. Normality couldn’t even hope to touch the rooms any longer. It’s been so long since they heard someone’s grievance on the other side. ‘I wish they could play music again. There used to be someone in the upper floor who used to practice the piano all the time, you know that?But I don’t know what happened to him. Whether or not he moved on or stopped. I miss that. ‘That was the only thing which even came close to showing a sign of life. And it was a sad thing that set him off. Countless nights he had spent trying to recreate the same conditions as those in which the players had hit the keys. Everything was going off now and he could only focus on the grievance outside as that of his own. Never being able to get close to it, yet always in his reach. Lost even to something as good as it would last, where there would be pleasure in disgust. ‘Don’t you think it’s time to move on already? You’ve been spending so much time in this room that I think you should at least consider it. ‘ ‘You know I can’t do that anymore. It’s not a matter of how much time I have spent here but of. ‘It wasn’t. He didn’t feel any kind of resentment for Alan. Though he couldn’t understand what this room meant for him, as no one did, he was content being there. This was the place he woke up in after the chaos came. And with little doubt, regardless of the consideration of moving out, this would be his grave at last. ‘Are you getting tired of me, then? ‘ ‘Not a second spend went to waste. I didn’t say I would leave you. ‘A spirit of camaraderie ensued, not to misunderstood, as the tie would last a bit longer than it should. Perhaps it would be a lot better to hope for a few more nights spent well, where no one would yell again. What happened there was a crisis of woe. Bitter nights were spent crying by someone who refused to move on. Funeral arrangements followed the following days, which in themselves were a rarity to witness. Especially since no one was ready to accept even more grief that came from their ranks. The streets were crowded for a second time, as he notice all of them drawing from as many places as they could land from. No lights laid low. And even some androids were called in to help them. It was one of those days when they would try making up for the time they spent apart.

‘It’s always sad when it happens, isn’t it? ‘

‘I suppose it is. You’d think there’d be a way to find happiness in this junkyard.’

Remorse only guided them to look around for as much as they wanted. There had been better days, better spent than this. They missed no glory dragging along with it. As for the funeral, it only lasted a few hours before fading into quiet. I could see the figure right up to its chest, even at this distance. Both of us saw to it that the funeral got carried out there in the open, just like he wanted to. Yet neither of them knew his name.

‘Too many people move and change; it’s a surprise that someone would remember them.’

‘I think I recognise a few of them from the crowd. Some of people used to live here, I think. I think some of them might remember me.’

It was something he hoped for, but he never felt like he had been heard when he said it. It wasn’t the first time. He would try not to become too sentimental about someone he had never known. He was young by the looks of it, but lost in a plow of snowy trenches. Dug up not through the soil but an elevator which lead farther than he expected. Locations hidden beneath the snow. He was concerned about something the others weren’t looking into. Mainly the hand that was placed right over the spot on his chest where his heart had been, hardly pumping anymore. Bothersome if anything, nothing came out of it. What reeked like a strange event now seemed normal. It was a veil, a coil, everything around it shouted doubt. It took a while for it to stabilize. As this court would be well put, and in a corner, where he stood, there the Duke emerged, without fear or wonder, in front of him there stood all the servants he had plundered the place off. Most of them were made of steel, some were lacking in the same kind of appeal he would desperately try looking for. In as much as a single day, what he had achieved couldn’t even be conveyed in words. Satisfaction could steal the feeling of dismissal and the loss. Costly as it would be turned, nothing could be considered for the mourning of the lost word to decipher. Blunder but never looking after what became of them, slowly as they emerged. Forth they went not like things of steel or iron, the organic nature now having been fully forced to come forth, never stolen, lost without a word. There were a few loose ends in need to get grasped and twisted, legged as it happened for so many of them to bear a few. Grander circles had been made, in those that weren’t taken from the sunken pillars where the last cutters bore their happier features stored. Five hundred meters below, all of the specific ones, which contoured the delightful eyes, between the chin and the forehead on a whim, would only add so much, less than it would be brought about the source form which they drew power from. All the outlets restrained themselves as soon as it came about for them to please. Another cryogenic state made it so not everything got what they would throw forth. Better than measuring something’s worth was this. ‘It goes as planned. ‘He spoke on a whim; the one responsible for everything now came back to his rails. Broken and stricken down again, for the amount they would last with, that happened to be gone as well. Songs would play at some intervals, yet their dance would replay again. Reasons could be listening on a plate, spoken like an admirer of fate. Enorr, was the name on the tag, he carried it around a strange sullen mass of steel. Permanently, yet stable, he laid in a suit, unable to discern reality around him. For what would be worth to say, he had lost his mind again. Reason for it? Unknown. Reason for killing the others who were responsible to look after the living around the place? Unknown as well. If time could tell anything, it was that his mania degenerated into something explosive and enamoring for the wrong listed reasons. One of them was the complete head blow he had suffered, an injury which only sought by it, lost for twenty minutes taken by him to regain it back. Tracked by the unfathomable large metal lines, he stopped. Always, but always they’d track him down and scan the entirety of the suit. Only one message had been repeated time after time until something had been acquired and lost in the midst of the hoot. ‘No life detected. ‘Just what would that mean? There wasn’t any way, just by feeling, I could feel the bone. Yet no pulse, that didn’t matter much. For the first manual scan through the body revealed that the entirety of it was still filled with what would be the amount filling a completely smothered body in which I stood. 'Done, I cannot say I'm not done yet. I want to know why I'm being followed by you. 'Same message, a detection which found out nothing in the true sense of the word, a scum of swords trying to sink even deeper than they would be allowed to set forward. Onward to what follow would be the complete routine. Sometimes I wondered whether or not I was the only thing keeping this place alive. And just about the other half I wonder what suicide would feel like. It was dark that I considered pulling out just the only thing keeping me alive. Not only so, but brought to my knowledge would reign, an undignified reign which never went away. Passion couldn't even begin to be stranded. Forwarded by words and a lack of stronger bonds revealed to me just what I felt. 'I should talk to someone. 'And then I did it, I awakened another passenger. Of course he wasn't supposed to be awakened here for the obvious reason that he wasn't allowed. IT would be forbidden in this blue-lit white-Creole area, where skin replaced the metal and it sunk so low and morbid. This wasn't right at all, I felt like this was only my mind going places. But I swear that sooner or later, my suit would become some agglomeration of multiple living protrudences put together. And the very thought didn't claim me yet for the same reason I would be there for as long as I could be. I knew how to cover my tracks. Lucky for me, I had worked out a system which would do me well, as the first awakening had come from manifesting machinery which turned, from the strange organic matter into some crystal-like mobile sunken stone. I couldn't force it anymore. But what was happening here wouldn't even just be mad, thinking of trying just to work this out. As the first of them who came out gave a single sign that there was a way to work through it, I realized that he went through some changed as well. What went through his body were a few crystals which enabled his circulation to continue in the most disgusting manner. But they weren't the only ones that came through. Some plant-like forms of life were brought about, the kind of soil which ripped apart his lower side. Not only would he suffer through this but it appeared like he wouldn't be missed. 'Not tag on you either. 'But then it popped, his entirety went off, without leaving a trace. As soon as it was done, the plants enveloping him died as well. Not that they were too developed to begin with, as the courage of words left even the description I would leave in, frame of reference, unacceptable. Plants not green but some dark shades, and closer to what we would be instead of theirs. I would see myself being fit and used as one of them, producing some kind of oxygenation through some mechanisms I couldn't explain for certain. My sunken seeds were changing and brought as soon as they might to my feet. Scraped by them was the fact that they were made out of an incongruous material, forced just as I was. Stolen from two portions of the nerve damage my eyes had suffered for the sole reason that they were parts of my brain that took the path in front of them in order to avoid detection. 'Intelligence could be planted into the dead, this would be a check. "Of course we'll have to repeat just about every experiment over and over again now. "And what will be the result of that now? 'A desire to stop it before it spread. It was almost as if Agamemnon recognized something from the depths and came to his senses. With the small sacrifice of the red dwarf, there would be no infection to last and spread around. The sudden manifestation of that race infection would be brought to an end. Just as it was planned it went away without a trace. Disgraced by this change, even the quickest turns could be dismissed again. 'What had happened to your stored body? Oh, I see it now. 'It was clear just by the way he looked at the loop that had replaced the soil, the plants and the beings from the other worlds that this was not the initial intention. Instead, what manifested inside would be the same body replicated over and over again, struck into falling. As if this couldn't even be explain by any normal means, he chose to stare at the walls. Surprised even to the point where he had forgot what it felt like breathing.

Anxiety would fill him to the very point where it would feel like grimness told of him. Better than said. 'I need to escape from this place. It changed, but it wasn't supposed to be. Perhaps I'm cured of the mad. 'Turning at the metal lines, he looked back into it and asked. 'Scan me again. 'Life form detected. 'A grim smile came back onto me and I felt renewed. Why, I could even say that they dismissed themselves as soon as it was confirmed. No longer would I have to wait my turn and waste in vein. Better than to be forgotten and lose myself, better to have lain. With the others I had brought, what I sought was a way out. Speak to them first though. As this exploration could only see the light of being forced against the various memorials he had been forced to listen on a daily basis. Yet ripped, ripped, or so it's be. What was that sudden chance which had almost infested everything? 'Why it was just one of the parasitical realities which try to feast upon the uncanny. 'Luckily for us, we're nothing short of gods. 'It means that our direct control, over this effigy which is now our own. '

'That shall make us rule forever. 'As it happened, in the bunker, in an ever spreading universe of red, hidden inside a lower end, there stood a vessel, upon which lay attached, the many pox-faces that took control over the tower at last.

With it, there would be red stars to grab upon and hold. Like wishes which were told, upon the starts, they could simply take away and draw everything which would be of worth as far as they could know. An altar would be set forth, just small enough and hidden. With a hole on top the ceiling just so more of them might be drawn. This would be their station now. But as bitter, wicked, simple men like the one below them. Was still looking upon a way to grab, something that could save him from the drought that be his reality within sight, lights would come about until they couldn't be counted on, enough of it. He seemed to spare too much time thinking of nothing but what he saw two vacuoles, his eyes being flattened at the tip. It was obvious that he was staring at another cryogenic unit which needed to be shaken a bit in order to produce something of worth. Unnerved by the fact, he couldn't even spend another moment forth and pressed the buttons looking on. Initial reaction, so forth, he was breathing safely, a bit reluctant to step forward. I could draw just as much as it was needed for me to know in order to realize what was going wrong with him. Some of the convulsions he was trying to show weren't exactly for the show alone. Was he trying to confuse me now? 'Friend, I am a friend. As a matter of fact, I'm one of the new humans, protectors of the old, the one who had been assigned to set onward and look after my own kind. For that you can rest assured that I shall do everything to. 'Settle down now, he hasn't fully accommodated to everything you've been trying to tell him.

As hard as it would be obvious to know, he had been made to feel unsure of it. Of my allegiance to them. It would be cowardly to run away. But I felt like giving him enough space. 'What had happened? Are we there yet? ' 'Change of plans, that's all I could tell you unfortunately. We were lost, so much that I'm afraid something had overtaken he ship and. It's hard to explain. But we were in the orbit and then we simply are here. Underground, in soil, planted like a root or like a worm if you will. How does that make you feel? If there's any chance that you may encounter some feelings akin to some deep desire to end yourself, know that the procedure it to kill. I meant to say. Wait, don't overreact, I actually only meant, put back under sleep. 'Not that kind of sleep would stay on his mind. Way out place, as it'd be. I could feel it. Regardless of how hard I would try moving away from him, there was that chance that he wouldn't return back to sleep on his own. Danger would be secluded, understood by what this meant. I could feel it go by me again. Some of the lost buttons on the panel still came to me. And, where had he gone now? ‘The second one got up and I already lost him. Isn’t this something I will have to look back at? ‘The laughs we would share, after looking at this again. There were some details which weren’t shown at the back of his suit. Perhaps the change had been way too drastic for any justification to occur. Babble could be heard from him there, seemingly aroused by the sound of its own voice, in itself showing little that may be drawn. Lost to the only sounds that may be. But eight molds were there and it could only be considered as something close to a dispersing curse. Not only were they not supposed to be alive prior to the end of the reversal, but it only seemed much viler that they were electronic bits which guided me. ‘Close the hulk and put the man back on stasis. ‘This order felt as if it was aimed to be but in reality, it was as far away from my person as it could possibly come. For some reason, this alone was a matter of someone else taking control and being listened to as well give me the nervous feeling, leaving me cold. As I thought that I wasn’t the one in charge any longer. For the same reason, I decided I would wait before awakening more of them, instead choosing this. ‘I’ll set a rule for all of you to follow. You may think yourselves ingenious, somewhat, but don’t forge that I’m the one supposed to be in charge. Where have you even come from? ‘Properly ignored, it seemed, without given any sign that they were even considering trying to entertain a simple conversation, they would only dull his back as they progressed further in. ‘Answer me, you cunts; I want a reason, why are they listening to you and not to me? ‘But that was taken away from him as well. First the orders, now his feet, just what had happened in his mind that he had become so weak? With certain numbness, there would be no hardness to push on. Carrying on the same path would only seem to destroy anything of the fashion. His fingers were missing, only to appear hours later properly stored into one of the units. It was getting old by now, the trickery they employed on him, to have him perform his job. It would seem like a coincidence, but ever since they appeared, for as long as he had been aware of their presence, his production rate increased. By a tenfold even, without even realizing that he was working on the belt again, making replacement bits for every part of the ship. Only through this way would they be able to continue working at an undisturbed rate. Otherwise, there would always be the chance of another electric storm even there, of all the places it could appear in. Not only would they stand at chance, but they could try appearing again. And again would they come. Physical forms would be excluded and out of question, a think which even baffled the parasitic species itself which almost found another way in. Instead of it, there would be this. The psychic attack, the almost triad-like form they had possessed, someone like himself who walked around in the hallways, trailed by a pair of dark lines. Without a proper notice to this, he felt, as strange as it may sound, he felt jealousy towards it. It only grew as he started following it. Why would I be the caretaker when he gets all their attention? Of course he would only be directed towards the dormant females. Though he could almost notice their open eyes which not only woke them up in an impossible state, but they also trailed him of all the things inside the ship. For as many years as the ones he had served, they only followed him. Better? No, he wouldn’t even be close to claiming he was better than him. IT would be something easily provable without any attempt. Why, he was there and the Triad, as bulky and un-well suited as he had been was in his mind. How had he reached this conclusion? Well it would be easy to draw from it by the very fact that he phased through doors. Even worse, he joined them, trying to make a mockery of my whole system. ‘Ignore him and return to the belt. ‘So you can see him? ‘We’re attached to your central cortexes. They’re fragmented for the time being but make no mistake, everything you’re seeing is currently being recorded. 'As it should be in case there was a need to draw them off and show them to a superior. Speaking of which, now that they finally indulged him with a response, it was time to ask. 'Perhaps I could get a replacement then? My mind is starting to break, as you said. You've said it, right? You noticed some physical changed in my brain structure which means that it's not all happening just in my head. Could you then simply allow me into storage?' 'That would be forbidden. No, it's for that reason that we're here. Instead, we suppose it's time for you to obtain a higher number of responsibilities and join the others down the hall. 'This couldn't be happening, though there wasn't any kind of sign that it would be a trick. They were still attached to me, and that would be a threat in itself since they were part of the suit and nothing more. Consoles were fairly blocked if not allowed slight contact with the passive units that sent their feedback into them. But there was a whole new level he hadn't even been aware of. Others like him were just down the stairs, reflected upon the near-floors and seemingly caught into their own antics. Just how many of them would be to that level? Level? No, it wasn't another level, but the entirety of the ship. I was greeted even by four of them who succumbed to the need to corner me. 'I shall defend myself if I have to. 'But my memory was inclined. I could only think of what I've done before heading down there and how many of the others I have killed. Would they have any access to that as well? Would I be betrayed? For now, the machines said nothing of it. And I've done more than a skillful play when I was in need of hiding the bodies. 'Greetings fellow ship caretakers. 'Who are you? We've never seen you before. Why have you come from the off reach area?' 'I was working there, ever since the start, tending to everyone. 'Another one of them interjected. From what I could tell, everyone wore some kind of different suit, being either an iteration of some older model which was into some dire need of replacement. My mind had been invaded then. This suit you're wearing is a prototype, yours is older than theirs, far preceding them more than a few good generations. Access to the mind and voices. Do they hear voices as well? Negative, no, this is the only function there is. The life detection lines appear only there as well. It would be well for either of us if you played along, in the case of. You'll simply have to listen and do as you're told. 'What's your name?' 'Storage, that's who I am. 'They couldn't read the name tag, for that reason I could only hope that there wasn't any other man around to attempt it. Perhaps that bridge would be uncrossable if they suddenly found out that I was lying about something as simple as that. 'Did they just name you Storage or had you a previous name?' 'Does it matter? I've been here for far too long, I suppose that if I were to remove the suit, I'd be dead. 'We would all be dead in that case. 'Silence afterwards. He wasn't entirely sure what he meant by that. Whether or not they were all depended by the line support coming from the suits, or if they recognized how ancient I was. And what would happen if it turned out I did rot inside the suit. After all, my feeling was gone, even from the few remaining pieces and organs that were there. Even recently, I lost my fingers. Beware of them. Now go back into focusing on the smaller details of their conversation. They now simply ignored me and spoke with themselves. Do they truly have that short of an attention span now? 'It can't be ruled out. These were beings that had all the talk in the world, for as long as the corridor was, the off the reach was a small broom-closet in comparison. Nothing came in it after I felt it. But they lead me away without trying to justify or await any of my answers. 'Have you seriously spent all that time alone? By yourself, with no one to communicate with?' 'Of course I had. Why wouldn't I? I'm more than well equipped to deal with everything that's being thrown at me. I'd say that if I hadn't discovered this way out, I would've. 'Gone mad, perhaps I might crash my arms into one of the units and killed the rest of the crew under stasis. But this, this had been, overwhelming. Just how much did they store in there? There were too many people thrown and placed as if in baskets, taking by the rails above the ceiling and moved into larger containers that I had ever seen in my entire life. It couldn't even be that this was a quarter of the place. Everyone blocked the entrance to the ledge as if I was to be prepared to see it. 'This may seem a bit much for you to take, Storage. ' 'Old rusty armored knight, we humbly present you, the ship. 'The area. It was, it couldn't be. Just the sheer size of it made it appear like this was a piece of some comet they had wrapped a tiny place around and fashioned their own bulky head. It was gigantic, placed and filled with every kind of device and high-end machine one could draw upon and check. Too many things were there to count and most importantly, it was them. Of course, they weren't caretakers that had been a fluke. This was the new crew which came after the others. IT wasn't any of their concern to look after the dormant mean, as it was highly automatic. 'What do you have here exactly? I'm asking about professions, what do they do? What's their assignments? ' 'Relax, now, there aren't any assignments, in case you haven't noticed, we're stuck. For now, we've been working for the longest time. ' 'Well that would count as an assignment, wouldn't it Storv? ' 'Not likely, he was clearly asking about what we do for a living. Just like they did back on the planet. But, yes, we're mostly engineers and mechanics, cooks. '

‘We eat?’ ‘Regularly, that prevents us from becoming. ‘He had his left hill kicked in. Obviously this had been a subject everyone was avoiding to talk about in his vicinity for the same obvious reasons everyone seemed to be hinting at. There was this foamy-sponge your body became. The foam was the future. The foam? Just what was that memory and the sign which kept kicking in? Perhaps it would be too much to hope for, but this was a reoccurring thought that never left him. Closely inspecting everything that was there, he asked. ‘How can I make myself useful?’ ‘For now, relax, you’ve done too much already. I wouldn’t be surprised if you were hungry and thirsty. Perhaps even in need of some rest. ‘You also sleep?’ ‘Of course, we still have the cycles. It helps deal with this kind of life, you know. Strengthens the mind even, not that there’d be anything wrong with yours. But I suppose you could deal with a bit of that as well. ‘Afterwards, they might perform a few tests on you. This is your advantage over them. As long as you’re connected with us, we may see a way to outsmart them yet. It was the intermediary change which shook him most. Out of everything around him, this was the worst of changes, the derange look being mostly reflected in those who were still sleeping in the bags. Not to mention that without the entry card, he could only pry at them. ‘What are these supposed to be?’ ‘Alternative ways of storing them. We’re still experimenting on them in case of more power surges occurring. ‘You sure this is supposed to be safe?’ ‘That’s something we can afford losing, in case some complications occur. Don’t look at it from any other case, but. ‘Dreadful as it seemed, they were not even trying to mask any of it. Without even looking ahead, I couldn’t even fathom what was going by his head. It only seemed likely that there was this distraction. For now, he would settle for a meal, regardless of what that might sound like and no matter what the implications were, there was this promise. In his guts, he would get to share something they were not into. A pair of thunders seemed to be attached to a device which produced the food. With all the concerned parties being there, spreading some kind of feeding surge, I was set on one of the tables, being yanked from where I wagered for a meal. ‘Gambling isn’t allowed in here; take it outside if you have to. ‘Relax, Tuhr, he’s new. ‘How could he be new? There’s no possible way he could be new unless you his him away for the time I was locked’ ‘As I said, calm down, nothing’s going to come off your mind’ No culling was to be set yet. Morning would be brought back to supper as soon as there would be a way to understand. ‘Careful now not to well too deep into the pile. There’s no end to it and to that. I’m afraid there won’t be any way to mediate what comes in and what goes out. ‘It wasn’t even certain any longer. Digging deeper into it revealed nothing more but a chance for him to love one of the suit’s fingers. As if that wasn’t enough of a bother already. It was an ill behavior that brought him there. He was only now connected to the one who freely continued walking everywhere. ‘Just for this time you shouldn’t bother looking through your own body. It’s overdue to be placed into an automatic learning behavior. As long as you please, walk through the confines of the ship. ‘A tertiary hologram, which was just as plainly invisible to everyone around them passed. For what would be worth, there wouldn’t by anyone to count on anyone’s worth. Dread for the ones broken, as they would receive him as soon as he came. Everything looked different there; more silent, almost disapproved off. ‘Where did everyone go now?’ ‘No questions there, nothing as much as anywhere where some might find themselves asking. Brought to some change of pace, there were others out there who would indulge him even farther. ‘Abandon it. ‘A voice spoke and as if commanded, the bridge and ever wall started shouting at itself before disappearing into the blank surroundings of pitch. No remarks there. Approached by semi-transparent being that were as much suited as I had been, revealed their giant exo-skeletal remains brought not by them but from the ones that donated to them all of the scum. Brought from the fading arms which hit about every blank point, creating smaller fractioned planetary field around them. In the advent of a star, as soon as they could see themselves worshipped by the primitive creatures which evolved as far as they might move, it proved likely that this wasn't the place where he dared to be. Why? Because it only lasted for a few seconds, as a pair of middle jests, being replaced by the low long-distanced projectiles which pushed without a way of being brought to any kind of sunken resin-dart. Soon the orgae-organs would sing, spreading the orange gas from within, ahead where they would be caught again, in the most deceitful manner. Not a single plane, of bitter land could make up for the fact that the Triad was struck again. Unable to defend himself, he couldn't do anything but wait in disturbing disgust, admitting to himself that there wasn't any kind of way out. Brought to the chopping and the cutting court, the big blocky metal animated holding crones came by. Surrounded by the long projected thinning pieces of orange clay, they held their giant fat bodies from falling as they extended as well. Pointed forth were large lance-like broths, which were formed from illiquid materials that came about when it wasn't necessary for them to live. From an opening there came a few bitter teeth which reflected the furious nature. Rage would be the doing and the Triad soon emerged. 'We cannot help you here, as you see, this isn't a constellation but a projection out of our range. Deal with it as you can until we're getting ready to bring you back again. 'Pain would shatter the surroundings, as the electricity, in form of emergences of shades would spread until it would be likely for them to thank them. For what? Brought here, I had realized they had taken control over the speaking device and the brain. Of course these were implanted memories, or were they? 'Who am I to spear the deal? Might I not be freed in exchange for my part in the play? ' 'What do you mean? You're not organic; your form of existence is tainted if not broken. Need be removed at any cost, unless you're determined to bring down our rule. ' 'Over what? 'Him, of course it would be him. So much for the sparing of the crew-people who appeared there. Brought from one of the molds, it was obvious that they were hosts not prepared for the undertaking of what they could use for their insides. 'See? Look into it and you'll simply understand why we brought them were to begin with. For this reason alone, we can be whole again. Don't you just get it yet? Look around you, what do you see? 'There were so many placed in that sap-like prey. The teeth, the inside of the spines, the globular tendons which pushed out couldn't even compare to what was going on there. As dark as his surroundings were, nothing would emerge, nothing but the sunken surroundings, the pushing of the luckless tones. And the ones who emerged out of the tendons were people whose entire beings were taken for the very surroundings in which they sunk. Deeper and uncouth they were, like bursting insects out of hearts of amber and of gold. What they revealed were forms which only came to pass, hardened yet weak around the tips of their legs, the muscle mass being completely gone. For their skin was that of magentas, pushing forth glowing eyes that seemed to pop every second like infused butterflies that emerged out of eggs implanted in their kin's merged wings. For every single one that went ahead and dispersed, there was another growth with dragged on until it couldn't be thrown forth again. Pain wouldn't be surrounded, or accounted for in the like. A surmounting alacrity faded as this reality brought only the one thing which mattered into view. Triad looked around and saw, a piece of some metallic block struck into his head as far and deep as it could land itself, controlling from the distance with the signals thrown around. 'Why, I think you all ought to show me the place. ' 'Very well. 'One of the fat lumps of toenails, hair pins, metal strings said. It struck the other one on a thin pair of seconds just so it could make sure he wouldn't attempt drawing forth. Not too much, otherwise, he wouldn't be stopped if he were to throw himself at the grinning, largely masked smoldering grasp he prolonged. What they were missing wasn't even remotely quantifiable. For what reason might they be smiling as they brought him aboard. One great gate opened and set itself forth. They were chaining him without locks to spare, instead trying to guide the halting party ahead. Whoever was looking past the breath would notice that from a giant empty come to another had he come. Yet their sizes were still somewhat incomparable by the sheer size. Getting through would be much harder than what seemed to come forth in disguise. A giant pointed carrying beast under their command. With no definite feature other than its simple yellow body, twisted at it turned on, like some flat narwhal without a tail that seemed to be missing some fine aspects making it lesser than the fourth of its bed. Behind it the creature carried a contamination building that was swallowed by a piece of its body. Of course it wouldn't be normal sized but a close replica in which they hid the ones that carried on. A fight ensued between the ones trapped in. From the amount of dust coming out of it, and the speed and the strength involved into whatever they were doing there, it was more than obvious that they were a violent bunch. More to the saying that there would be no contender, to the sender of putrescence that would be. As well as one could see, the creature carrying them. Yet, the horn, that one was only a piece of its head, which grew fatter until it could push on again. What else might it matter for them if they couldn't be giving birth again. Not much had been conveyed by the lack of a disease, playing as much of a role in the forming of the levitating field beneath them. A bridge of energy made it so every other beast like it continued walking on. 'What's the reason for them being there?' 'Manual labor and the carrying of other species we're reforming and extracting. It's part of the greater deal on our part.' 'With whom?' 'Wouldn't you like to know that?' It was a mystery which did as much as it could to incite him. Whoever was hiding between these planted creatures would do as much as it was needed to survive in quiet. 'With every passing age, he's approaching the point when he might need another successor, Triad. And for that, it's obvious that he was someone made out of flesh. His legacy would be tainted afterwards, despite the numerous chances he had, there's a spiteful spirit lacking in the fact that they had killed all of his sons in front of him.' 'How many assassinations so far?' 'Too many to count, not to mention that they were done from afar and behind his back. 'Pointlessly going back through them, his head spiked like a crystal until the very point where he had tried envisioning it again. IT was hard under the conditions but there wasn't any doubt any longer there. For what was about to be a second quarter of the age, everything was in its place. Some anomalous materials were known to infiltrate in actuality where they didn't belong. As far as they were concerned, the sleepers wouldn't miss any of their limbs if they had been taken from them during a time where it didn't matter how much time they'd try spending around the chaffs. The parties involved into the process were more than aware of what they were doing and the lack of repercussions which involved their actions. No kiss and tell, no one dared look further. Even if those standing in the nearest cradles which followed the buildings didn't belong in the same category as them, this would be said. 'It doesn't matter as much when you're considering the fact that most of the others are going to be used as food.' 'Why do they have to eat living beings? Couldn't you force something else onto them?' 'Not a single chance for that, I'm afraid. Unfortunately, I can't stress enough of what might happen after, if someone were to cut a piece and thaw some of the freezing pieces of the higher ones amidst them. Of course those deranged cannibals won't stop at anything in their frenzy even if it means eating their own as soon as they're exposed. Excuse me for it, but I'm afraid there's nothing we can do, especially since the manifestations started appearing. Something you ought to be more than well documented into, Triad. 'As a few of their ranks were more likely to be considered unusable, not even for experiments afterwards and for this reason, they could only serve as the recreation of a city where they'd be released. Ravenous things they were, something with the effect of the UV light which came into contact with their skin allowed them to phase through walls and expand their legs and arms until they reached entire kilometers and split in half whatever else they had in mind. Taking it slow. Day one of the taking, hundreds of miles away in the concrovox, the side structure where the testing was still put into motion. For the few reasonable sides that were affected by them, there was a pattern in store. No more would they throw themselves ahead, instead they would realize how futile their struggle had become. IT was this curse along that disbanded their likes. Never had they even wondered at it, whether or not they could survive extreme pressure coming from the newly acquired blood system.

From this replica of the city, where they had been only a bunch of ravenous predators that stood at risk of being taken and devoured by everyone of their own, this is what happened. They stood still and inactive. Soon features started degeneration so much that they were unrecognizable from their previous forms. Instead of even being able to join the others or show signs of reverting back, upon the reduction of the UV light, nothing happened. A permanency that couldn't deal with the fact that the living being in which they all resided was being hit again. IF this was a giant shelled orange pair of big ultra-flat rhombus-like megaliths that had slight deviations below where they fell to the point where they looked like trenches dug through soil, the various rock strata pounding upon it were the founder of the place. Deranged in the way of knowing and spreading their dominion further than where they stood. Something akin mountainous reaches waited out there, where the projection failed. Looked down constantly by eight hundred seventy five giants formed together, without the outer bodies, being connected only by a spiral of limbs that resulted into the complete atrophy of the surrounding area, as long as they moved. Some would roar and speak of ill, cursing those who dared move too ill. Some had their feet planted to feel the vibrations, yet they couldn't push too deep into the earth. Obvious survivors would be immediately apprehended, stopped and wrapped, undefended as they would be brought to their twisted sense of justice. As soon as they were recognized, one of the longer limbs would shoot at them, expanding past the continental ends, adding to themselves until they could regain their ability to grow again. As for this reason, since it couldn't rise above, the featureless tyrant stroke below, pas the uninteresting masses of blows and the decrepit amount of rocky lows. It was magnificent, how easily it pushed back. Despite their research they'd know it wasn't worth keeping the Triad locked, not when there was a slight promise of some hint that he might be useful in some way. Not to spoil him as much as he would care to explain what was going on. 'We're under continuous assault. I know you barely came here and here and there and there. 'And he saw, only this part as he was driven back to some place he didn't belong. Again, this switched to the galaxy being formed. Worn by the vision he tried communicating with the artificial intelligence which formed his brain into that paste. 'Let me return and I will do what I can to set things right. ' 'No, you're needed elsewhere as well, into another world, in a sector of a city where you shall interact with the beings known as Carrions. 'It was already decided for him. As for this reason, he was given access to one of the screens, yet no representation of him had truly formed. 'What am I here for? What am I looking at? ' 'Their city, now don't complain over the lack of something to do. This work shall be considered important for the very sole reason that you may not be fully understood by you. Bear with us for that reason and follow the orders. 'I could only seethe at the one big tower from where all the signals appeared to come from. For everything which had been worth was in there. If only access could be easily granted, perhaps there'd be an easy way to get through. It simply worked so far and nothing would be granted. For the few Carrions who came around to sniff about the place. Through and through, as long as they were claiming to be undivided, neither of them would approach. 'I wish I received a new beak to assort with my new gloves. 'Am I supposed to indulge into every single one's desire now? So I've been reduced to something much lower in that case, haven't I? It's only temporary, in case you want to return to this place. As he was shown for only a second just what waited for him in case he had decided to do as he was told. Now, he had been properly fed and bathed even. For what was around him seemed to be bed which contained everything he would've hoped for. In any case, this was dangerous now; simply considering what he had went through. This normality and promise almost came to a stop. 'You'll be disabled for a few hours now. For the first time in a long time, perhaps it's better that you're put to some momentary sleep. That way at least you'll have yourself, well. 'It was simpler to pull of the plug than see how he'd react. Whatever damage had been produced to him, it wouldn't even fit again what was going on there. A click and a tap, and he was gone. So had the screen, quickly fading to the previous one showing. 'Ah, blabbering thing. I knew I should've asked someone else. ' 'Come with me, my dear, I'm Gryiun. Know that there's no need for you to look after such machines. It's much better if we're searching into my place. For the sake of our kind, I know that you'll make the right decision and follow. 'Stranger he may be, yet what he brought with him were a few cut slices of silk. Good quality resin as well. And the head of a rat. Well everything was included into this pack, so of course only the best would do. Not to have gone through too many chances, this rangler, the strangled of course, he got the lady to follow through his course of saying. Too much swaying would leave one to believe. That this path was right, for the same reason she followed him. 'I'll pay handsomely if you show me the good ware. I don't think I've ever been truly pleased so keep that in mind before you make that one of your goals. ' 'My lady but I was sure of it, what would be your cherishable song be called? ' 'Primadonna, that's who I am. Pleased to meet you Gryiun. Well, knowing that you're so mannered for such a dark stranger, perhaps might earn you some bonus or a few. ' A pair of giggles almost lit her falken face. It would be much to his honor to claim otherwise, but he wanted her to join somehow, if she was able. Right into the building where the plain beneath was stable. 'Careful now, for each step bears a few notes and mechanisms that lead all the way below. Someone's been hit in the back with each step as a kind of punishment for being alive. ' 'Why would such a cruel thing be allowed? 'What she asked more would not even come in terms with what was happening there at all. To the few other younger children that came and played, no one could take it away. Their play would be undisturbed, as they rushed back and forth on between floor number one and two. In order to see who was faster and who'd make it through. 'They seem happy, don't they? ' 'I couldn't tell. Days mostly come without hearing a single cackle and just like that they appear without a practice or without a matter in their minds. Give them time, they're still young. ' 'Won't he suffer? The one that's being tortured because of them? ' 'Because of us as well, lady. I must tell you that there's no chance for him to make it out alive but that won't mean you should feel any kind of pity for him. He's out of this world, for some reason he had been brought forth and left there as a remnant, a copy of a man who used try his best to escape. His mind is blank yet he feels as if there's something pulling him back. ' 'May I see him then? Please indulge me into this, I want to see him. I would do anything for it. ‘Anything at all, would she? It was just interesting what she had proposed for them, the plain idea being bothersome for no other reason than him wanting her now. It would even be madly infuriating if he was stricken from it and locked away from what he desired most. ‘I agree, I’ll take you to see him if this means I could have my chance at your heart. ‘He smiled, he tried, anything for that vile thing he called, lust for the demoness. She gave that impression only by the way in which her hair combed, better than being set inside the tomb. Darker ages would be called, not in question, yet but stalled. For what they saw underneath the basement as they made their way would be the antechamber in all its quiet. Nothing stoops below the various dragging and what he was. ‘He’s giant, he could tear this entire place apart if he would be left unchecked. Wait. Can he hear us? ‘He wouldn’t understand.

No matter how hard we tried educating it, I cannot stress how hard it is. But we failed. In a way I feel as if they could have done a better job to integrate him into our society just so we couldn’t miss him again. ‘And again, he pointed to one of the various lit area which propelled the holes inside his back where the notes kept pushing ahead. It was a virtuous thing. A motionless appeal that resumed soon after. Then he would be stricken repeatedly to the point where he desired nothing but the pain to stop. Otherwise, he couldn’t make it without being alive. There were moans as he spoke. ‘Free me you damned things, torturers. I want to be free. ‘Not a single click of tongue. ‘Gibberish again, we can’t decipher it, we can’t interpret it so we left him here. ‘ ‘Strapped and locked, with those pins and the holes going all the way to his chest? It’s an intelligent being, why must it suffer then? ‘ ‘It will suffer until it will have learned that we’re not to be disposed off in case it thinks of attacking us again. That is right, it had tried multiple times, on various occasions with little corner of the eye or the damage he may have surmised. Perhaps, if it were given enough of a free reign, neither of us would be here to begin with. Without even the least amount of hope, I can say that he won’t be reeducated and he might be put down eventually. ‘ ‘Just like a stray dog? ‘ ‘Exactly so, dear Primadonna, rightfully so. I’m afraid that this is what happens when someone with a dangerous potential appears. Whatever kind of material he’s made out of seems too chaotic to be set aside. I would even say that there’s no other way to look out of its way when it starts. ‘ ‘What will it do now? ‘ ‘He likes his gibberish for some reason. But if you’ll look at his mouth when he starts with it. . . ‘Of course this would be the model with which he would go on with. For the same reason he was there after all. A peculiar thing which was a dud, brought only by the result of a sick mind. With every puncture and his inside the body, the battering started producing foam. And it took not a single moment to see when the final element came afterwards, the voice-box carrying it all the way out. ‘We still don’t know why they’re trying to sell us the sound-foam as the future but this is apparently one of the weird ways it’s being produced. Safer methods can be employed for the production and it doesn’t have to be made this way. But this type of sound-foam is special. For the same reason you could feel his boiling blood in it. Perhaps we were meant to feel the coursing of his veins in order to understand what he’s going through. ‘Empathy wasn’t felt yet, for no reason could be sound. It was difficult to even consider going about the stranger needs. Brought face to face with it, nothing would crumble at their feet. ‘Had your fun yet?’ The two of you need to get out. We’re feeding it. ‘A part of four had settled down, trying their best not to set about any of the alarms, without even daring to see what was going around in the process, already the dust settled. It wasn’t safe anyway. ‘I hope this hasn’t changed your mind about anything, did it? I wouldn’t hold it against you if it did. ‘ ‘Why must horrible things happen in this world? I don’t understand. ‘ ‘This is nothing, you wouldn’t like to see truly horrible wrongdoings done for no other reason than pettiness and the run of crabbing delights. Must I show you around? ‘ ‘Will you please? ‘It was a kindness, but no reflection of the place. How it was structured, exactly to the floors that were set farther away from one another in all direction, all the times. All of the created the vague impression that the entire structure was coiling around, performing some wicked dance for reasons unknown. Thrown into the rafts of knowing, the pleading would beget there. As soon as there was an entry to look into it, one could see the various bones hidden everywhere. No longer would they be kept as secrets for those who’d be desperate to know. Yet no one made his knowledge sole, no beak would speak at the hearing ears of the gridding teeth. Large and umber-pragmatic shapers were there in hiding.

Climbing on ladders made out of coal-bones left by the abortions done by Carrions. It was the best hidden, yet known fact for all. Everything was pretended forth, the disturbing this they were all known for. This aspect had been nothing but a reflection of their cancerous beings. Part of them looking the way most had, would be this. Alone and growing, still begging for a chance to live. Yet they would be stricken and felt, better dealt with that in real graves.

Grabbed by thin agglomerations, these cylindrical fighters had been senseless but could only chatter. Outside, it looked as if their bodies had been cut countless times until there would be nothing left but trails which went around never stopping for a break. Torture would be never ending; the breathing contamination would make them chatter.

But most importantly, they would be their own fathers. As their filthy mothers had forsaken them, called as the disgusting louts they were, the souls of the children fathered themselves just so they might be felt again. A strange turn, disturbing, lack of wonderless lust would be repeated this night. From it just another quick result, as others would know. More than a few Carrions were missing as their bodies decayed just as that. Quickly and brought to a kind of dust which had been blown away. In truth, they hadn’t been acting like organic creatures, but like pieces of coal. For that alone could not feel and instead chose to lose its appeal and shatter after the flame. No amount of attempted love would reignite it again. A pursuit was there, as they would play behind the walls with expressions that couldn’t be conveyed. As this was nothing but the dark aspect of selfishness and the loss. A cost which had been paid for at the very last. A sad turn of events had transpired, even by what seemed to be the better days. Quays were taken for as long as he would be there. Insidious remarks would leave them alone. A vulgar thrust came from the mast, as the city rocked back and forth. Lost directions couldn’t even plead. For a quarter more days passed dwindling as the beat below the orchards where they grew the spine-shed. What far outdone the foam, an invention of their own, a team of Carrion scientists had achieved, victory from within their ranks. A creation that would bring their life back into the high regards with the Leviathan. For him this symbolized only the most important sacrifice they could endure. A morning did bring the Triad to witness it from behind one of the recording devices. After all, everything that had been in store for them, it was a delicate spot in which they were placed in. The space behind the glass protectors was wide enough to fit the entire town and even more than that. This secluded location as well as the experiment was foreseen by none other than the metal body who was present there in order to make it go ever as smooth as he could do it. By mere interaction with the staff he had found out a lot about the nature of the question.

‘Would the Leviathan return? ‘It was something they had wondered and wanted to know more off. Perhaps some better days or some other ways could tell of it. ‘Those are whale spines coming out of the paraformed shed. It’s a slow process but the radiation shoots enough power that we know there might be enough of an impact for us to find a way through to it. ‘ ‘I thought this was only a false belief spawned by the primitive members of your society. ‘ ‘So have we until we had encountered actually signs which appear to attest and match some of the prior claims we had been receiving over the years. This is no easy task ahead. We've been greeted by too many errors to turn around and consider doing anything else. It's still in its infancy, this project and the possible revival. ' 'You don't mean you were late, were you? 'It had been peculiar, referring to the head scientist with the name Christopher, ever so near the strangeness which had been the lie they were keeping from the general population. Secrets never tended to leave this room under no circumstance whatsoever. Only some sacrilege would do. Well enough, broken from misuse. 'Please tell me that I'm wrong and that I'm headstrong. 'This was the Triad again. He was contemplating on the lack of movements and how deranged he could become just by the likes of being forced to lay there in a place which was missing. Maps were useless, as they didn't even register what was happening. The town had been surrounded by a strange force; as if an umbra-looking blue nightly nigh-invisible hurricane that brought nothing out yet anything entered it as long as it would stay. Protection couldn't be suffered by them for as long as it could be. Stolen from the slacking masses, torn by the deciding trances they would share, it was obvious that no one would dare force themselves away from the coming of the time. Spent way too much alone, it would cry outside, begging for to step and lie down next to it. Embodies by a solidified hurricane, the form threw itself in many directions but stopped growing. Until then, it was very obvious that there were things in certain spots which shouldn't have been there to begin with. Unexisting by some means, whatever kept it down and farther away from sinking below the cradling fake sun on top the moon pillars which surrounded it now shattered even further as the creaking of the noise ran. Though a few hooligans were chasing one another with large crow-sticks, the streets were still somewhat safe. But that thing which fell as if from another world had been a sparrow-heads. It was a rain that had come, dragging them as far as they could be brought back into light. Sightless and many, torn by the landing of the pain, none of them would remain there for long, falling through the world but never as far as to be found by the scientists at all. Nor would this process be registered for long. 'Your time has come now; Storage was the name you called yourself. Don't make the mistake of forgetting it, as that's what you told the others before. Now you will do as we ask of you and remove any kind of evidence of them falling at all. Can you do that for us? It would be the greatest symbol of your obedience. Without it, we're afraid that you will be taken again. 'Who was this then? Of course it couldn't be the intelligence, it sounded different, yet it had heard my name. Could it be that they were somehow communicating between them, or even instructing one another on how to deal with me? If there was even a chance for that, I couldn't even hope to take it or look around. Dangerous that it may be, there was the only chance I could see. Listen for them for now and find a way out. If there's even a slight chance you could ride against the winds and find the eye of the storm, lose yourself in it and follow through some more. With this he had begun, taking the frames one by one in order to completely defy any kind of chance there might be for detection. Sloppy but nothing would be perfect. Cut by as much as half a second then made it so it would be replaced by the look a-likes from distant times. No one should know the difference, other than the clock. As for the system, it was more or less under his control now. It would take a substantiating amount of effort to consider the possibility of escape. Now, when the daring went outside, bickering as they would raise again past the dance it had inquired about, now the torment truly began. During the few hours that passed in-between, the note-mechanism had been stretched in order to encompass just about everything it could. Every step taken would hit inside, from him the foam would fall and spread around, growing and replacing the ground beneath him, as if in need to create itself a lair. Had it been that long since there was something even as close to fairness there? Harnessed from the apparition they would be, trying to get its attention as far as they could see. Certainly neither of them could look away nor be swayed by the falling head as they would claim nothing less than sleep-walking in their sea of duress. Spoken like a master one of them said. 'Let us see what's going on there. We ought to know what they're there for. 'As Radox pulled a single line of head that lined, to his bitter line there would be nothing keeping them alive. Just by peering and sneering at them, he could he see that kept in his hands for too long would cause them to mold inside and grow as they liked. 'Do not let them touch you. 'He said too so, yet unalarmed, as he had observed this to be something he had liked. Soon most of them would plainly ignore his advice, as he himself had. Instead they'd collect as many of the heads as possible in as many corners of their bodies as they might. In some way it was important to know that this change would be permanent. Caught by this sudden evolution, they finally heard the sparrow' song, coming from their own beaks as well. 'It's time we become alive, now it's time we carry on. 'They suddenly danced and jolted at that obscure material in the road, as much as it hadn't made any sense at all for them to worship it for the same reason in which it wanted to be true. As if on cue, there were the rafts, very little of them could be said to be alive. Instead, this parasitical embrace gave them a life of their own, seemingly taking away some of their own faces. Lost in details, they wouldn't matter as much as these tiny masters had. Many mouths to feed, yet no seeds lay about. Instead some ran towards their homes at last, trying to eat what they might. 'Close the doors, they're automated. Neither of them is to be allowed entry back. Windows are already barred; we need to prevent them from being seen, or heard. Disturb no one in the process and make sure to see what it's to be entailed. 'It wouldn't be something he'd rationally consider. After all, this had been a crime of the highest kind. Disregarding their lives, as pitiful as they were, he had observed what he meant. Slowly, their composition started fading away, being crushed as it couldn't even stay any longer in one piece. Dragged amongst the stones, amidst the various rafters and the stones that came after, it was time to see the full embrace. Most of them had been ripped apart by the conflict that emerged between the various birds that wanted their bodies for themselves. 'Their greed and desire for the one who freely gave his body brought his end. 'Can neither of them be saved then? 'Not unless they give up on those greedy parasitical creatures. Instead of trying to fight them, as it seemed, they've done the mistake that is inviting them without thinking. Without knowing of their vile pasts, it's something which should run out and be disregarded. 'AN even that never even existed to begin with, as it would be discarded from the general feel. Not only so, but there would be no appeal to the ones that momentarily swayed. They remained for a few moments without falling through the desperate coiled the ground entailed. In the few seconds that passed, they showed their arrogance as they bloated their ends, beneath their necks. And as they revealed the mass they had scourged from between the legs and the bodies they had sacked, no they laughed. It was no pitiful thing, as they came to an agreement, but sparrow after sparrow looked for each other out. Seeing this order made his blood boil, even though his body was far gone. Instead, he had imagined bashing, crushing and even smashing through them all with force. No longer would this be permitted as for the worst of details came to light. It wasn't skin, there wasn't meat, nor did feathers which made the heads beat. Skulls would somewhat reveal some material which made them peel even further than it should be allowed. Scabs could be seen, spreading about. 'They're carrying viruses with them. 'It's from the inbreeding between them. Sparrow heads could give birth to hundreds of other heads with the help of their fully developed breeding bags. For that reason, they need to suck them dry and abuse the poor dreamers as they came about their senses. It's late. Now we can truly just observe them and hope for the best. As inevitable as it seemed, neither of them can be allowed in. 'Give them too much as they would draw near. Out of fear, they wouldn't even come close to drag. Out came the stone apparition as it was finally dragged down. With it slowly gone, the sparrow-rain stopped. For no reason they had avoided plunging near the tops of the buildings as to draw nearer to something better. What they've entailed is a few generations to be alive and well. Yet from where they came, they wouldn't be able to breathe again. Instead, this state had been decrepit and lost, at the cost of their lives being ignored and shallowly cast back into death. Speaking of which, one could tell of a betrayal, somewhere as it had happened. By no amount of means could it pass. Luckless, it came, that the Wool creature had been ripped apart, his body spread just about everywhere, so he wouldn't be able to regrow. Nor could he be stitched back as his head was cracked open and abandoned into a ditch. Pitch, the sky had been of coal. A glimmer of burning revealed what flame had spread around the world. Like flowers the heads of the sparrows suddenly split in halves, creating as many openings as their kinds could muster. Never after would they find the appeal, not to feel for the sudden awakening of those who in the remnants of civilization. Most were damned but managed to somehow avoid total stagnation. Yet they were no sparrows, instead, they had become servants of the crow, eating from the moon still, spitting it outside. Around the gravitational remorse, a belt had been made and for the worst possible outcome, most of the rocks had been shaped as their master. Reminded constantly that in the empty gaps of the moon it would grow, sooner or later, what it hadn't digested or had spat would come alive. In its own name and seeking, the be brought to no justice but to look out of place. No race or evil kin had managed what that one had within. Sparrow-heads, as broken and as lost, in a few lost generations would be thrown at last. Out of place, well replaced by the crows, which'd grow and finally appeal, as their bodies would spread forth, never to reveal the fact that not even the planet would be safe inside. As for the beings around, left to no boundaries, they slowly made their way, not to seek something which had been meaningless as to require a spade. 'We must stop them from proceeding with this. We cannot allow this to happen if we can forbid it. 'The words were cast a long time ago, yet there would be uncertainty and fear. A betrayal on the road, Muck had tried something, only to awaken with a broad stroke of the shovel at the back of his neck, then at his chest, penetrating his cavity and the rocky nest of spines and sparrow-flowers. Which they themselves grew and took the opportunity to bask in his sinew. 'It was because of you, isn't it? He wanted to take me out because you're the one who called it so. 'He was silent. More than one way lay for him to find out. A he would take his time to slowly break him apart; he had realized that it was pointless; trying to get something out of him he had already known. Not only so, but as it seemed, peers which peered into their own social standings couldn't help but laugh. Echoes wouldn't die off and it was obvious that no longer were they far away from being alive. Not only so, but it was dangerous to wait. Spare what he might, but it was never a matter of misbehaving, losing a piece of him that rehearsed. Better to move on, he thought, after being done with the spreading of his arms, the head would be dumped in only one hole after being completely destroyed. So he had thought in any case, not that there was a chance for him to come back again. Yet there was that change which disturbed him the most. Way too many crows made too much noise. It wouldn't even be permissible in any case, thinking of a way out. Sounds would travel at a rate which made it uncomfortable for him to be around them. Spoils there'd be, in that far away building where they hid. Only the giant gut of the Raven-cretin, the ravager who destroyed a good part of their city when he had been alive, some more to it, their claws still reflected his touch. Though they might not be made out of some jerky material, it was obvious enough that the malformed ravens were still there. Still wrecking havoc on the unsuspecting, as their branches started growing and suddenly encompassed the last remaining vestige, half of the city had been lost to it. To a single growth that spread, a giant would be formed instead. He who wanted to return, to rule upon this world with the body he had fashioned out of what his servants took and lashed on. Why, he would take the whole body of a Carrion, the head of a raven, the many peeling skin-feathers of the carrions and more so, an essence which dripped in. Perhaps it hadn't been the intention of a crushing being for it to appear near the side. Bothersome, as it may be, there was that slight feeling of erudite repulsion which came out of the fact. Legless, clawless, but a single tail remained as he would be close to being done. So many cycles had passed, that there was one slight wonder, why was he still there, alone? Many ages ago, he would've called him something like them, but now, swollen like a slug-bodied Colossus he would choose to seek a way, not to contemplate or sway the others. Obviously he was lost, to neither of his brothers, who might not be able to speak to him any longer. He wanted a way out and somehow he felt the only desire he had to grow stronger. 'If only had I still a way, to look ahead and be lost without being able to repay them for what I've lost. 'The cost of this betrayal was a must. For the mountainous remained of that one who had destroyed himself in order to be released from pain could not be called as anything short of a murder. 'Murderer, this has never occurred to me before. 'They wouldn't call me into question any more, for what had been worth, the missing glances said all. On the top of one of the distant parapets, there were only a few moving battering on top which could even be closely distinguishable from the ones below. Two great sets leaped at one another, in some weird expectation, drawing away. Set yer the second trim. As far as the fifth corner which went around, seething around the only blocks of meat when there was a single pointer, farther pushing dwelling idol, another faceless thin statue joined their fray. Instead of trying to sing of push, the entirety of their beings began a ritual of sinking into them to hide. From the various dripping of the river-like molecules that fell, they would start changing again. It was important to know that the end result would be nothing but an entry to a slavery of their will. It was what they desired. More than that, what would be acquired was to be, in calls and outs and better thinning deathless gazes. They had been brought to a maze-like hold, where they could never walk forth again. But caught in endless flights they stung, only in the most decrepit string of flight, all of the delight was shown. As there was not floor for them to be stranded upon, there was this. AN agony which dwelled between the rafts and stance, demise might call them about and cry about the missing voices of the old. Soon after they had found out that there wasn't any way of getting forth, they started giving up to exhaustion. Actions such as these would fit, only the pain that would bring one to defeat. Yet from the walls, wings of stones infested them all, giving them the general feel that replaced them all. As they had been forced to give up on their meaty fliers, these stone carvings wouldn't flip, they wouldn't flap, and instead they anchored them between the walls. Suffering from this, as clear as it seemed, was what they had desired. Upon the waste, they would bleed away, unable to look away from an ever furthering sky. Clouds would only defile them as long as they kept the distance, never to be tormented to keep about the quiet. As time it was obvious that their backs had been completely shattered by this deranged activity and everything which remained was the act of shouting. Acoustics drawing further, no more could it be considered still a plane of walking and the Ill. 'I shall find a way to free ourselves, you'll see. One day we shall join them all and be together. ' 'Shutter yer mouth, it's over. This journey had been a mistake, can't you see? We've sacrificed too many of our kin to be able to be free.

Not all of us were lucky enough to make it through. I'm afraid that this destination will be the final place. Take it and claim it away. I think you're close enough to me to crawl. Do you see it? Can you see it from under that brooding sun? ' 'What do you want me to see? ' 'There's a tunneling hole which lead back outside. But you'll have to carry on without us, climbing on top of our bodies, while making your way out without being cornered by doubt. '

'Just what senseless thing are you asking of me then? ' 'You need to make it through and alter the others of what happening here. Of this prison and the possibility of being trapped with us, we cannot risk faltering to less. 'To the confession as much as it could be called to the amount of stress that be lost, the cost of sparing, would be this.

'Unless you make it through by some means, I'm afraid we stand at a chance to lose our history, the image of our civilization before it had been devoured by them. I'm only asking for one soul to make it through. And you're the healthiest one so far. That I could even think of. Only you can make it through this journey unscathed. Not deranged either, there's hope in your eyes. 'He looked past him through his skull and the dye appearing a back of his throat.

Visionless peers, revealed a strange feeling which seeped from outside. A corruption from within that started forming his organs even herded from their kin. Some wicked caricatures lay there. Most of them had solidified on top of one another, sharing their strange roles. A heart would breathe, the gut would beat, and mostly all of them shared the disease that progressed. Digesting everything in the esophagus gave it only the strangest projectile-looking face that formed. No longer would it share its look with the birds that tore their world apart. Instead, he gave up on the legs, coiling around and pushing dread. From his face, a split became known and the wings that emerged forth were not made for beating. Instead they would produce some kind of peculiar known-to be, air pushing and heat condensing which bloated his body until it had achieved the form it needed to float. 'I no longer need you, my brothers, but I shall return. Do not worry for our history, as I will find a way to deliver it for what's worth. One day, I shall make sure there's a way to condense what's been happening throughout the millennia we had spent. Building everything from end to end and for that I say. We shall not fall today. 'For the bloating sun revealed a darker shade it hid away. From the distant painted dwellings in the corners that ought not to be, he had realized that the maze they were in wasn't floating but falling. It had been a lie that they'd be saved. Instead, they plunged, nigh-endlessly to their deaths, the gaze. Distant, of the patch of land beneath them promised that there'd be a way out for them to take. Up to the rake, no one would suffer again. He followed through the way out and came back to their world at last. For how long had they been cast in there? Standing here, where the ritual had been performed revealed a lot, perhaps too much, as if continuing on the same path would bring nothing but some kind of ruin, to which, it was decided. No one fought away, not that it mattered as much as it would be forced to be. But those below the portal fell instantly. 'I shall not forget your sacrifices now. 'This was the darkest look in the future he laid eyes upon. Akin to long stalks they carried on, revealing feathers that never came forth. Ashen-gray yet conveyed by the essence of their master again, a sea had basked in the storm as its dreary mazes threw themselves forth with little to express. Like gables, they stretched forming their arches and weird devices. Everything around them was theirs. At the mercy of the elements. 'There's no history to protect. 'He spoke, even then when it wasn't worth approaching it no longer. He was not strong enough to face them all, not in the least, to face the call. Hopeless though it may be, he made it just to the edge of the building, barely levitating a few feet away from where the ritual had taken place. There had been others around from what he could remember, but now all of them were lost. As a matter of fact, the cost of this betrayal was sunken underneath the loss. ‘It would be better to look into it, wouldn’t it?’ ‘What was that?’ ‘There’s a small extension of the eye. You’re supposed to use it. ‘But the fingers were tried and cut. This was how the device worked. How could a socket less man even know it?’ ‘They played for a while, in their strange way. Inside the floating jewel of Tumorr, it was only something which grew from what appear to be. A moot, a place where they couldn’t sink deeper if they wanted to. For that same reason they were playing with him. ‘What’s he like then? Explain what he looks like to me. ‘ ‘He’s big, enough that he could gut a straggling amount of boars like him. Twenty feet away from us. ‘ ‘Wait, wait, I need to hear something. ‘By and by, seething as their cries emerged. Various tunneling could be heard then. It seemed that, there was something moving through as many shallow walled surroundings as they could fashioned themselves in. To even claim it so, one would have to own some kind of knowledge regarding what the anatomy of the living jewel was the over-blown cortex-curdle-like bridge which twisted away into a four pointed star. Not the celestial body but a kind of bickering head spammed at each end. Big humanoids nasetistis, blown by the narcissism they exposed. ‘I’m beautiful, so beautiful, superior to everyone I know. How can you even hope to compete with me in this mess I call a home?’ ‘It was gone. No longer could there be an absence to disquiet. Loss to the touching pleighmouries inhabiting them, no one would sink as low again. For the numerous times that were spent making up for the loss, there was this sudden realization. Other similar four pointed stars inhabited the place, stretching as far as never to be found again. No loss for blunder, as it came after. More of them sought each other out, unable to deny the fact that they were and unruly lot that ought to be placed back in its place. For the rules there were simple, never interact with one another as for more than it would be permitted. And for the exact kind of loss behavior, it was done. Various deposits from the nebula would come and hide some of them in the Spantangle-Quandiy. Brought to it many had fallen into the suffocation peril that inhibited the gas. Some would simply float unable to freeze, yet caught off guard. ‘They should’ve learned how to keep their breaths. Just like us, now it’s obvious that we’re the only ones who will survive on the long run. ‘ ‘Don’t count the others out yet, we may fall beneath them if you become arrogant like them. Can’t you remember that it wasn’t that long ago that we were greeted by others just like us? Neither of them could even handle what was going out without fainting from the pressure. Yet they, who had barely arrived, thought they could outdo the universe and mock us for what would be fair. Arrogance inhibited their insides. ‘ ‘As much as arrogance would be theirs as well, for every single once stuck inside the plain spaces, there would be others trying to escape. Deep inside them, the beings which were being caught and forced inside were trying to do their bests for the survival was a task of wits. ‘We need to have more bites out of it. ‘ ‘Seriously now? You’re starting to look like a glutton. Don’t you think it would be better if you starved yourself for a few hours, just so we could get away? I seriously can’t think of anything better than this. ‘Whatever it had been, this mode of existing brought some high remarks. Lost to them, there were a few others that made their way. As much as this was a tainted time, spent eavesdropping on the walls, it revealed much. ‘I think we have another piece of space debris trying to get into it. ‘ ‘What makes you say it?’ ‘ ‘There’s nothing going wringer here. There’s something, it’s a cargo. ‘Just a simple tin cargo which was brought here for the simple reason of some delivery, as important as it seemed. Without a willing watcher, they could only have a guess at what they were doing again. 'We'll have to carry it over somehow. ' 'I thought it was moving on its own. 'That couldn't be.

Usually, they only allowed dead cargoes and other uninhibited vehicles to enter in. To claim life found a way to preach through was mad. More so, there was some kind of sadness being delivered there, not from the loss, but from the delivery itself. A few beats against the wall signaled for the right spot. Where they came, never again would they falter. 'You were wrong about this, sister, you were wrong. 'And neither of them was strong enough to deal with that thing on the other side. In as simple as a wild mistake, they realized that whoever looked at the cargo wouldn't be able to ever walk again. As single of an image as it looked like, the first gaze left them both paralyzed, sitting in as they waited for a clue to what was going on. Metal? No, it wasn't that kind of material that might be ore-related. Instead, this was brought, in this case got, from another world. Neither of them recognized the strange symbols and the marks, as wildly colored as they were, or why they dragged on. For the few seconds the part through which it cut through upon entrance which took a short span of time to rebuild itself, it carried on, moving. Rolling despite the lack of wheels, in a way it acted like a carp out of the water. Stinking even on the shore. 'Are you sure this is a cargo? ' 'I can hear something dangling inside of it. There's something which needs to get out. 'As with the trout, there was the time it needed to push on. A lack for a century that loss every kind of appeal it might have. For thrice and forth, never was there a worth for them to expose. Many skulls and large craniums were thrown forth, all gray and light green, desiderated within the area of gray, which conveyed nothing. But a silence, which dragged on. From them, the nasty substance that covered the fleshy surroundings turned this into a tomb. For the same reason everything looked like stone, so had the two of them, being carried over on the other sides as broken statues that waited to be told. 'No breathing is allowed in here. 'Unfortunately for them, they would suffocate in the few seconds left. To the beatings came the stricken. Now that the delivery had been brought, the skulls could move on and levitate as they were asked to. Not to mention that they were breaking apart, everything that could even be remotely used to reconstruct their bodies and set themselves apart from the others. 'Who are they? 'A silent wove broken, as one gate opened by itself, as the arching grimness of a hole steered in past the other side of a bitter missing song. It would take a while to tackle onto it, but the barbarous on-lookers that dragged ahead were nothing akin to those that were prior to them. 'This entry is blocked to dog-chased. 'A tyrant had come. He was tall and enigmatic. A few of them followed him, the chieftain he would be referred to as. Nothing would a kind of communication would do, no one would be spared of the daring look they all threw at him. 'Unwaging this kind of royal tendon, I want to propose that we should let them expose their reason for being here. ' 'What he said, who are you? 'Vocal cords missing, thrown even, lost. It was as much of a blast as one could throw at them. No one wanted to even show what would be a kind of empathy for their quest. Henceforth, they couldn't express it, no less. A few clicks came from them completing one another on separate ends. As soon as a connection would be established, there was that thing, a red rock sprayed on top of their heads, then a blue one, the next of dark grayed, pushing ahead to expose themselves as no rocks. But embodiments of bigger clad aprciles, long and overly thrown out. Some form of cognition would last. Give thane shout for the taking. 'I brought you something chief, this might help. 'A pair of strangled unspeakable stops, they were fully formed, naturally even, to the point where they attached to their aprciles. Through them, the marrow could be active again, circulating in the steppes as they would fill the place with a pool of blood. Shapeless as it would be clad in the forming armor of degenerating floors. No more would there be disquiet anymore. Turns as much, a bunch would get beheaded as trash. It was expected, as the tyrants hadn't any care for their lower kin. Only strength would be divided and looked after on the long run. Soon they would thin their numbers after a few more interactions. Both sides were busy trying to set themselves back into the luckless action of the growth promotion they were unknowingly pushing ahead. Not a single creature knew what was to happen if they carried on this road. Bled and stricken down, almost like an automaton he came about to life. Between the cargos section which went out at intervals only to return and bring rig cages next, growth of stone which would encompass them after, slowly they were lending the final touches of the one brought in the middle, underneath the skin. He would have extracted or obtained just a few genes from the Tyrants, which offered the evolution, kindly forcing it to go berserk. Some muscles and some bones grew forth until this creature obtains both a skeleton and an exoskeleton that gave him the strength to rip the walls apart. Though he was in his infancy, there was another gift from the four pointed star. Four spikes came from it, two in the front, and two in the back. Replicas of what lay outside. Seemingly quietly they spoke about for minutes after being surrounded. 'Mildly, might we simply remind you that you're only guests inside of us. ' 'Do not dare extend our sympathy unless wrath is what you want to get. 'Nothing would quench what it got from them. As a simple way of showing them, all of them, might they add that they were in some kind of business still, there was this one form of protection. Satisfyingly cut, brought to the need of swaying them brought back a primal need. To break the chest between the bones, just so they could show them. 'Here you'll get all the answers you need to. If you would kindly spend enough time trying to dig through, you'll simply find out that there's enough space to fit everyone. No exception. 'As soon as they forced their hands through, punching a pair of holes for a better view, they saw in. A wider space, for nothing could even disgrace such a superimposed kind of suppressed space. Some bones were picked clean and drawn in as if this wasn't inside a body but outside. Where gravitation pulled everything in, the hole had been completely forced in. 'But enough of that. Let's talk business since you ought to know. The reason for letting you in and allowing you to stay so. 'Was something that only they knew. Various doings had been allowed as well that no other would've allowed if any case had to be brought through. As a rule of thumb, brought about then, no one would come or leave. To strive for anything else was nothing but a case of. . . Unrest came when the realization followed it. Though it wasn't even close to it, they staved off their attack. It was brought to every four pointed sting's attention that the universe had been completely sealed off into billions of quarters. By accident, even, this had been completely found out. By going around and sniffing where they didn't belong, the fun had ended. 'Of course they would do this, the architects of infinity laugh at us even now. Am I the only one who hears them? ' 'Yes, you are, that's because you're self centered. ' 'Wait, wait, how can he be so? We're four sided, equally so, there can't be a single center and if there is. 'Even then there wasn't any expectation to what they would say and who'd be pleased because of it. Why, then, the space extended, the lock instead being placed father away. 'Now, I seem to come to an understanding. We've found a way to draw and eat. ' 'What? ' 'We're eating the space with our mere presence, don't you get it? We're the cause of its fragmentation and the sectors which are locked out. I seem to have the most brain of us. ' 'But we all have the same amount. ' 'Yet not a single one of you exhibits the same wit as I do. 'All of them were stricken dumb as they were forced incite a cage, forced to lie down. It felt strange, laying on a platform after floating for so many years. Ever since their infancy, they had never feared any kind of pain or destruction. Just as much as there wasn't any other reveal. It lost its appeal then. 'There won't be any chance for us to travel again, will there?' 'Oh how much I am saddened by this turn of events, I only want this thing. 'Thrown and twisted into space. Nothing but time, left with it for a while had given the opportunity to project it upon the vastness which wasn't locked. A quiet bode, made out of the resin gotten from their sudden movements from the ancient time from when they had been born came to life. For what was worth, this managed to show some kind of signs of not being worth to be looked after. 'It's a bit small. ' 'Suicidal even, see? It's trying to chase darker suns and be like them. 'On bridges of their or making, they set this tiny insignifial life form ahead. 'Make sure you spawn a universe or something similar to it in our name. With that so, we will have been complete. ' 'Are we dying then? Here? It's not that bad of a space. 'From what they could tell, the manifestation of flying dimensions which happened in this contracted space was numbing. Of course it would happen when they were constrained. Fear of them allowed just as much. Not a single daring peer show what would happen otherwise. 'Ah, I see, there's something which makes me want to be part of the better bile. 'Without the promise of seeing what would happen tomorrow, this was the sight of the hills, the mountainous forests and the high peaks. It was time to look about and be scourged as they were eaten by the pipes coming out of the ground. They were the only things strong enough to make it through the cage. 'It's an execution then. Perhaps someone should've let me know. I can't think of what I could've worn at my own funeral. 'More of them appeared and it seemed like they would be funneled as easily as they could. Was this action misunderstood? Perhaps the agony was somewhat undeserved even. But neither had a saying into it, leaving them as exposed as the rule of thumb came about them. 'Always be prepared for this kind of slaying. We cannot even fathom something of the king. 'Who spoke of him in any case? It was dangerous to call him again. 'Don't speak of the one in red. ' 'We could be forgiven ignorance but not. 'This again, peace and quiet taking over, after everything being mistakenly pushed away from them, as, by no force would they be able to swear, in order to save themselves again. Down there, a new dominion had come, from the countless generations of organic pies and changes which dragged about half of the forest in. Between the tress, they hid without conceit. And in the middle, the furthest place, the gang of Nihor lay there. Some looked down upon them, cheering like jungle monkeys, watching over the fights. Some brought animals and other creatures shrunk from latching holes and bitter domes in which they hid their guts. A wrenching realization came, from the rain of vitals, which alerted them. 'Gentlemen, we have a new contender!'The voice of a vile defender came to living, and to bring, the boring details following in. Systemless approaches, another one fell against one of the hardiness of the poles, breaking his back and being allowed to fall alone. 'Bring more; bring more, another one for the bloodthirsty boar!' 'You heard the crowd, cheering; I want more of them presented to me!'In his name, as the others were cheering were a few tobaccos underneath his tiny slits. Stacked underneath, later he'd enjoy them. For now, the show had changed, as for the signs he looked after were less likely to be deranged. In some way, he had achieved something the others had failed at. Just by the mere fact that neigh of them gave up on the rest beneath the neck in anger. But hats would be received and fragments of the cats were still hanged on top of some of the walls, yet neither of the ceilings where chance dictated of somewhere to go. 'It's been a while since we spoke about it, hasn't it? 'Between his ivory tusks, a black smoke came out. Pierced by what it seemed to be, the lack of furious unpeeled delights, one would have to care less about the fight and the rows. Though it was reasonless to think of it that way, why would they entertain this disease? Of their minds, there would be only a delight, the eyes of an otter deflector. Pushing through his brain there were a few hooked hammers drawing away. To this day, there had only been eight occasions in which the cat spoke. ‘I’m still waiting for that man, you know? Though you may try convincing me otherwise, I know that there’s still hope to find him somewhere. He’s out there, planning his return carefully, swaying and checking the area and making sure there won’t be any dead while his entrance is being prepared. ‘What make you think that hold any truth to it? Last time I checked, I had attained full control over the slums. The land is also mine, as well as the jungles. Not to mention that the sea and the rivers are on their way, soon to be attained and used for as long as I quell my satisfaction. Say, you were one of them, weren’t you? The original cast that created the great epitome of high delights, as a court attendee to the great disguiser that fed you, isn’t we something of a kin in that case? Why I would say, we came from the same spot, the same circumstance, and we’re very much alike by the very means we prize ourselves by what we do. ‘You bore me, boar. I couldn’t hope to take it anymore, if you kept talking that way. You wouldn’t understand what hope is if it managed to strike you down and force you to see it for yourself. But, hope isn’t what powers me. You know what keeps me going? ‘Bortikor waited for a moment, trying not to jump too far. Not to give a reason for suspicion or to signal that he might be paying something akin, too much interest from within. ‘What is it? ‘The one beneath him that ruined the dojo, trained and used, ready to misuse the gifts that had been given to him. He will come one of these days and kill you all, before you even get to show him our new ways. ‘Our new ways? ‘Now, not to give too much in. But in that moment, as quickly as it could, the cat revealed that it hadn’t been entirely caught. What would be going instead brought him closer to miss. Pleased by it, he pushed ahead one of the pipes, no longer contained by the strange geometrical motions which had forced it to move as it had before. Not so much, as the bunch came, completely sealing the boar with them just so the henchmen would be out of the way, it happened. For all the cats were there, watching and pacing as much. Trashing about the peerless wonders about the place. It wasn’t a race, henceforth, they paced themselves in order to prepare, showing their fangs and the strange additions to the tongues that were still there. ‘As you can see, we all survived. Our might is not only in our number but the magnificent delight that is our way. We shall play with you unless you give to our demands. ‘Say the and I’ll get you what you need. Don’t hurt me, whatever you do, not a single hair on my leather, please, I’ll supply you with anything. ‘He knows what we want. ‘Yarn would sit under one of his vaulted safes. As peculiar as it seemed, this was what they made everything out of, just by playing with their bodies’ claws. Thought there wasn’t any symphony to it, they couldn’t even get ready to throw at it, a dine for playing. ‘We won’t gamble our chance to get it back, and for that we decided to ask for it back unlike the others. ‘There are others then? ‘Of course, but none of them willed themselves in, as far, as far as that place still called for someone to be brought back. From one of the distant chambers, something moved. It sealed itself off, ripping away from the wall, choosing instead to crawl on its own. Up front where a door lay, now came a window which conveyed just enough. For the lout, there was no talking. All of them had been completely taken out of commission for a reason which was that. They were melting, bringing back a womb. Part of it would give a life, to bring about the one that was destined to come back to life. As much as he had enjoyed his own torment for what would seem to be the better days of his life, there was that. Nothing but the agony that lasted, into the grand awareness that cast him into the trap. He was there, forever, a soul torn, brought back no more in whole but pieces.

Though around the chamber there was that wild consciousness which kept him going, without knowing who was in charge, he was destined to move aside. One of many chambers. . . As to the whole area, what had been a clear sight now came about a form of disquiet. For the same reason it had the ability to crawl on its own, so had the others began moving and acting on whatever claim, and pain would come to be. IT simply wasn't safe to walk around the area, as farther away it went, the station brought itself to a larger area where a hundred trains could feet all wide. Pushing each other aside and dragging one another away. Other occupied chambers dances and leaped, dragging themselves over the metallic feet upon the wheels that came off. Yet one great train stopped. It would be its last station, a perfect end to the trailing ahead. Completely occupied with most of the one who hid inside the high places, over another level where sitters would play, a sudden opening from a door came. Woe is me, for what I've seen from my place was the lack of wholeness. Broken and pushed down, left without the possibility to look and dine upon the remains, overly saturated, longed legged homeless rangers came around the fire. So had the chambers admired them. Mere force, survival for the worst conditions being a definitive thing. Ringed around the corners, they were bringing the one thing they could. 'I found this on the back. I think we should survive a few more days in it, if we stop complaining about everything, should we?' 'No, stop this, I need to get out of this place, I want a way out. I cannot stay here for long.' 'What's going on with him? Come on, help me restrain him. 'Something pinkish was spearing him through the head, pouring from a dead stop. They were trying their best to keep him down despite the force he was simply desperately converging. It wasn't safe any longer. Not to mention the wonder and what happened there. A piece of consciousness which wasn't his poured inside of his head, which only made him think of what was happening around them. 'I see that your whole being is still strong in them. 'Unit Do, spoke as if he knew more than the others about the chances going on. Just by looking at them it realized how pitiful they were compared to them. Despite being seen in front of everyone, acting like that, even by the slightly deformed and the one stricken by the phantasm of living is small cuts, they would still be cheerfully ruining just about everything around them. Cruelty would defile less. But it wasn't that easy, looking into their confession and what they had discussed with the lesser men about their feet. You could see it, they could it as well. The fire which they lit was used upon his wounds to seal them. His long feet was showing signs of spreading like wings, but not animalistic in look. But what seemed to come with a transparency which even scared flies, he would have to deal with the ones below the bickering tries. One more hit in the head and he would be fixed somehow. Better would he risk dementia from the hits or even worse than becoming this. 'Shhh, I think we're being watched. ' 'Don't talk of it now. I think it's better that we spend as much time with this surgery as possible. This patient might be you next, or I, so pay attention and make sure you pay just enough to replicate it. 'Four cuts around the head and they removed the carcass. It was a mess inside there, since there were changed that be caused by the invasion of the pterots. Being amidst those who were claiming to have power nodes in them. And mostly, it had been a ruse. How could it be it so otherwise?The power nodes changed the entire alchemical property of the body. No easy take either. But the seemingly solid would transmute itself in some kind of horrible abomination that started bringing in more of its kind. A think which dragged over not from another world but from the property of easier cells. Some of them that hadn't been properly catalogued promoted filth worse than bacteria. But enough of it. Power nodes were important because they were implanted in the heads. Most of them were duds, but it one real one just happened to be there, as well as it would be touched by anything, its effect would happen. Would it shoot on to the unquiet stride? To defy something as easily as that, it could not be denied that they were scared. Lower than where he stood, another similar homeless runt appeared, entirely connected to him in the worst possible manner. Had he been there for a reason even? Could he last through the surgery? 'Let's try again. I'll take a piece of this part of his front. ' 'Stop, don't perform a lobotomy yet. You'll turn him into a vegetable instead. ' 'That seems far safer than having to deal with whatever that is.

'Neither of them would be pleased by it alone. For more than obvious reason, there was no progress in the degeneration, only that addition which kept breaking. Not only had no extra corpses come into the light, but there were other things which frightened them about him. A bigger rounded torso in the back, shot through the mass and revealed too many legs that sprinted around the place. If there was something to take out of this, it was the complete lack of peace and quiet. Mankind wasn't ready for these changes yet, not even the homeless scum which wanted to begin, yet. He looked so tasty then, and the farther they thrust the scalpels the more would he generate. 'Why, I have come to the conclusion that this tiny device in his brain is an actual power node which acts different in comparison to the other ones. ' 'Bring me the towel. I think there might be something for us to long for. ' 'What are you planning to do now? ' 'I'll extract his brain and the node, that way; we shall manage to preserve our meat production, never starving as a consequence of our good will. 'They smiled, even with the general consequences accepted. No one was sane here; of course they wouldn't even pay as much heed to what they were doing. It wasn't even saving to dwell, as if. 'Drag him inside the train; we'll finish the surgery in there. ' 'Under this condition? Not a chance, not while he's completely exposed. I seem to remember better days when we had a chance to look after something, you hear? 'It was a general state of being there. In that one spot where surgery could be declared as nothing but a butcher's dream. Where had he been now? 'Melantiere? ' 'No, from now on, I shall be known as the grand stage leader known as Belice. 'Malantiere brought with him a peculiarly diamond-shaped mask, with its hollow spots and almost trophy-like appearance, it bore the engraving of the name he spoke. As if a prized possession which was worn, he was somewhat torn on trying to impress them. Not the time for it, not now. 'Listen now; I'll only say this once. Stop messing around and help us save this man. Do you understand just what might happen if we allow his death to come? ' 'Oh, your precious cargo will be lost, I know. Your good will might be wasted. ' 'Don't start it now. We're only doing this because we want to eat, now help us remove it. 'Horhn, Evulion, Khdar, and Echxl were trying their best to be as precise as they could digest. Whatever was in their guts started shaking nervously at the promise that they'd be fed. Even if this feast came to them, at best, there was a chance that this might all fight back. Tables could be turned, no one else to mourn for them and every chamber started dancing as they focused on what was happening. 'I will give you this chance then. Please let me know of it and I'll force myself to care. 'His mind wasn't just set, but it had this strange appeal. Reeling from the device, a few other beings came. Standing like him, erected on some piles that digested one another. 'They heard, they heard my thought, I'm falling from their gut. 'What Evulion was pointing at, and what he was referring to was the complete look-a-like which fell from there. It got close to almost giving him a stroke out of the mere fact that he couldn't deal with being alive for too much. Not a single way of expressing himself remained. Danger would spread like a disease. 'Calm down and focus. Unless we're done extracting the brain and the node, we won't have any other option but smash it in hopes that it won't go berserk. ' 'How will we preserve the brain? It's so squishy and weak. This place promotes disease from what I know. You couldn't even hope to look asunder in front of its eyes. ' 'Stop it now. Don't you see I'm only trying to help you? 'This hadn't been said by of the five. Malantiere was the first one to look at the manifestation on the ground, brought about to the admission that there were others who wanted to gut him during the confusion, he backed away. 'I'm sorry, but I cannot deal with this, not this way. 'He had thrown in the clock, seemingly afraid to bring it back. Khdar was not a traitor, yet he considered doing the same. Nothing would be worth it, especially if it came to this sudden deceitful. It was evil, trying to forget this operation, especially with the expectation that he wouldn't survive. For now, all lay in quiet. Well of course there would be some attention placed on the small details that emerged. Would it be plainer to see if anyone, by that it had been said, if anyone could yank it. Even as hard as they could from the strangling session, as they should. 'What I've seen now is life. In its full regard and the motion it displays, there's nothing here for us to look after any longer. I say, we should celebrate in the name of the incision. ' 'Wait, you're not Khdar. 'A trick, that much appeared to be. For not a second longer could they show themselves able to resist what they were throwing at them. Seemingly going by a few seconds ahead, there wasn't any question any more. Just why would they press on through the agony and never understand what made the offensive from the ones that were dead and the ones alive. Never abide what one could look and dine for. Twenty more seconds passed by. They had to acknowledge the supreme kind of power he had shown to them. 'It can produce us just as it wants, just what is this thing? Why does it have so much power? 'Exactly wide-spread to such a magnitude that even the unit went ahead and left the proximity out of the very fear of retaliation, he had come to an understanding with it. Let the runs deal with themselves; I'll see to it that I'm not going to get caught and formed as well. Ways remained, out of the fear of pain. Soon, there would be naught to share. Anywhere at all, the fright in the scullery. No longer would they throw themselves away. 'There, I managed to pull a few more centimeters away from it. ' 'Keep pulling if you want to eat. 'Every chamber, in that very moment had been knocked a few feet behind by the strange wave, almost organic-like electrical gust, that produced enough of a momentum to become unstoppable in its way. For those below the body, nothing happened, as they were missed. 'Such power from a brain and a device, we need to disable it. ' 'And starve afterwards? Not a single chance. Over my dead boy, whom I had to sacrifice for all of you instead, how dare you muddle his memory and remind me of the exchange. 'It went like a transaction, this disgusting deal which had him sacrifice the only thing he had in the world. Horhn couldn't keep back the tears, smeared on the face by the murk and dust. IT was hard, to think that he could deal with it, hardly made him think at that. Was it always going to be that way? For every season, the rats would start scurrying away and they would find the train tunnels just as empty as they had been. 'What did you see in him? ' 'Can't it wait now? At least until we made a decision, whether to cut or let rot. ' 'I said I knew of a way to preserve him so don't start with it again. There's a liquid we could trick it to produce. Perhaps that way, it will save itself from being eaten or used by us in such a way. 'Yet all of them struggled, just to get him out. A lingering almost line of muckus, as thick and rubbery as a pair of whips of chewing gun whips was visible now. It would seem that there wasn't any way for this thing to give itself up. Judging by the mere struggle and the power muscle it employ, the room was about to get darker as even the squared prisons went on their way. 'Not even they can fathom what's going on in here. Have you got it now? We cannot fight it, we need to give up while there's still time. ' 'But look at all this meat. We could feed ourselves for countless generations, it will only take some more pain. 'Going through it again was already as hard as it ought to be. But the blandness of the taste wouldn't even come close to what it was made to be. Think of it later, when we ought to be done. From a sudden burst, they all got half-way up, trying to hide their feelings from one another and what they were showing instead. They were ready now, as they grabbed the entirety of the the control unit and held it down. 'Come on, just work. I know you can hear us in there Priemeval. This is for your own protection and you know that well. Unless you helps you cannot gelp yourself. 'That would be the ase for their mutually assured destruction. If he weren't to take any action, he'd stand to lose it all. No wonder and he'd be gone. For the few seconds in which they prayed, there was the entire expectation that neither of them would live again. Enduring through the few moments they spared, time had resumed again. 'I can feel it. ' 'So can I. . I can't believe it but you were right about it. Damned bastard, you were proudly right about it. ' Tears could almost be shed then, out of the pride they felt instead of wasting it away. Just by the few sparing of the missed times, it was glorious, thinking or admiring their handy work. Form the few spots where they had hid the bones of Horhn's son, they created a small altar in which they kept the brain from falling apart. Wax-like as the liquid was, though more like honey and amber in the way it appeared to coat everything, there was one single change. In the way through which they couldn't deal with it again. By that, it could only mean a thing, alas. For the mass to work, they carried of, feeding the impulses and the various thoughts it needed to hear. Out of fear of their onw kin, there would be some kind of initiation for the ones that came. From the darkest corners, the slaves and the other deceased-like folk which scurried forth after the smell. What had been encountered there would appear to be a small mountain of bodies that were being cooked. As royal guards they stood there, wearing clothes made out of one of them, not to care. Mentioning this wouldn't be allowed, nor would it be considered fair. Yet, from so many of their bones they fashioned a small house and the needed protection for the ones they granted everything they owed. 'No one shall approach him and no one shall come forth unless you're deemed as to be worthy. 'They yelled, shouting again, as the song began. 'Hear us, hear us, hear us be. Don't be please by what you cannot see. For it is him who granted us the chow. Unless madness consumes you all. Never touch, never approach, unless furiously, your guts provoke him. 'To the guttural sounds, no one would dare come closer, out of the fear of retaliation. Admitted in, came the first family. Serene and Mklvak, with their son Khiongher. All three of them appeared somewhat normal. With everything being taken into consideration, they were wearing yellow suits. It was strange, expecting to be safe from any kind of radiation there. Simply said, the expectation was dangerous enough to be held on its own. The pain of precaution called. 'Remove your helmets and let us see what you're hiding there. No need to be afraid, this is nothing but a complete and normal routine check. 'They prised themselves now, as smart and decadent. No matter how low someone could fall, there was still this inspiration for those who were gone. By the mere change of pace in which they checked, something was taken away. A ear. For starters, they were falling off. 'Please just let us have a bite. I swear this had been stapled inside before. Prior to this, I had suffered of some mere cold and a few blows coming from a rival of mine. 'Mklvak tried his best to lie. Of course ther were ways, not employed yet. The first line of tricks couldn't be allowed to be seen yet. Not without daring show a sign of weakness and disturbance. Swayed by it, he proposed. Evulion wanted to look at him more than well exposed for some reason. It was such a repulsive act to ask of him. 'Reveal yourself to me. I'll make this easy enough. If you will just show me what I want. ' 'Serene, cover your eyes, and Khiongher's as well. I don't want either of you to see it. 'Not that they would complain at what he exposed. This act was something which made everyone in the tunnels unnerved at the mere pestilence being his desire. 'Enough bickering, your turns will come. Wait in line if you want to receive any chow at all. 'Back there, no one dared make any type of noise. They were somehow subdued to worse appeals. Fighting back wouldn't be an option because of what they had with them. 'Here, that's right, it's just the delightful thing I wanted to experience for myself. 'The kind of mutation he had revealed on himself broke too much of the body to reveal nothing but the inevitable appeal of toxins that spread. Radiation was somewhere out there. From the few grown limbs, there were more teeth than there was a solid thing. No bones, not even a crude ribcage emerged any longer. 'How far? ' 'Somewhere in the great East, we came from there looking for a better life. But the small craters in the land revealed jerky pieces spreading around, forming their beds of radiation. We slept in them because we had no other choice, without realising what was going on. ' 'So that's how it happened, huh? And what do you intend on doing now? From what I can tell, you're all in the same condition, with little hope that you may find a way to be repaired. ' 'There's hope. I think there's hope if we can just get the right supplies. There's a great medical center outside, that we had heard off. What they say is that they can repair the dead and even reattach lost limbs. ' 'Who says that? ' 'Notes, posters as well, it's the only way I know of them. Perhaps there's a chance they might still be in business, I think the posters might be recent. ' 'You realise this might be a trap, right? 'He only nodded, but his family hadn't covered their ears. It was an impeccable slate so far, as much as he presented both himself and them. 'You may dress and take what you need. But before that. 'He barely stopped himself from becoming the hyena he fashioned himself alike. It was terribly dangerous, to even attempt familiarising himself with what would be going around the place. He wouldn't stay here, and he wouldn't last too long out there. ' 'Echxl, make sure you're the one passing the food. Come to think of it, I don't want to risk contamination the supplies. No offense now, but I got others to look after. ' 'I understand. ' 'Let me finish now. What I meant to say as well is that you need to take care. So you know, there's a good chance that you may not be able to return to your life in the same way it had been before. And searching for a magical place of healing will only result into your complete destruction and the annihilation of your family, to that I may add that they're solely depending on you to provide for them. 'As dangerously close to base as this seemed, he was right. Neither of them deserved that. 'I'll do you one better. Try your best to survive on eating as much as you can and. ' 'I beg your pardon but we'll take our chances out there. Suppose your intentions are good, why else would you offer to feed us through? But I cannot risk dying this way. It's painful, as you saw, just my ear and all. It's only going to get worse this way. 'Evulion wanted to say something but the man knew better. 'Very well, you will do what you think it's best for your family. I cannot intervene unless you want me to do so. 'They nodded immediately without trying to raise suspicion, being closely watched by the fearful others as they received their share and moved on back to one of the tunnels from which they came out of. 'You sure there won't be any train? If there's even a chance. ' 'Horhn, there can't be. It's simply impossible. Considering the fact that these holes had been abandoned for ages, there's not a single shot in a millenium. 'Malantiere came closer, looking to scout over those new comers at last. 'Settle down your kissing session, we got guests. 'A vile gang of bile promoters approached. From what they could tell, the body modifications they brought with them had been completed by a strange glowing substance that may even be found in neon signs. For what was worth, not a single one came forth from their hiding spots. It wouldn't be fair, in no possible way, for them to be subjected to this amount of punishment while still coming on top. From their high hairs, which came in arrangements of magentas and lost shades to the spikes armors made out of train seats they had stolen out of their way, these were no easy goers. ‘Step out of the way, dumb lunts, this is our place now. And as the leader of the Bile-gang, I make the rules here. I’m the new chief on top of the joint. Know my name Rroggoth-ILL. ‘Spilled as he had been, there was something about the way he came that inspired fear into everyone looking at him, even from the distance. Nasty and repulsing, like a rat atop the face, if he had bread with a gorilla which instead of growing hair, had pushed some tiny spheres that threw out and bounced back. Turning his face into a fat melting piece that could barely hold the features from falling off. With a great deal of effort, one could look at him without trying his best to be revolted. Even by normal standards, he couldn’t be looked at. It was dangerous, as staring made him madder. Everyone in the gang had been one of the most saddest lot one could stumble upon. From each of their sides, not to cry about it for too long, it became here. ‘We missed the sign for far too long, but Lorlek, will you remind me again, what does it say now? ‘ ‘There’d be dragons. ‘ ‘Careful treading here, as there’d be dragons. It said. Good spirit of observation Lorlek. But say, come to think of it, this so little a thing occurred to me. ‘ ‘What is it, boss? ‘ ‘I just don’t see any dragon around this place. DO you see any dragon? How about you? Them? No, no one? ‘Of course there was, wretthing in disgust. ‘What have you done, you dirty promoter of dumb!’His voice hadn’t the power to carry on, as from the pile, two wings made out of the adjacent ones fell apart, then rose again, harder and mightier, much wider even to the point where they couldn’t be used again. Yet the rest of the body came out just as strong, yet as wrong as it could be. Failure wouldn’t be allowed, the trust would call them back. ‘Now you’ve done it, fool, he’s growing, and might ruin it all soon. ‘Before Horhn, Evulion, Khdar, Echxl, or Malantiere could turn, they missed the brain as it was dragged forth into its new den of protection. Defended by the mere thing, he could finally breathe into the peculiar liquid and the salvation that reigned. ‘There, I see a dragon, boss. ‘ ‘Shut your filthy moth, Lorllek!’Rroggoth-ILL couldn’t stand still. It was dangerous, just trying to fight the impatience and the severe nervousness he displayed. The other gang member sand the crowd dispersed, all because of the fear they had all show for the being that formed. ‘Run for your lives!’No one submitted to the cries, the frenzy had become. Some of the madder ones even charged so they could have one last grand meal. As soon as it had been close to be fully formed, the outside of it still burned, while the insides would be completely coated by the same defensive thing. Not to sing of it now. ‘We have to run as well in order to survive. ‘ ‘But what of the food? Is it worth it going back to scavengering and trying to hide it from the others? What about leaving it here with no one to look after? It’s too dangerous. ‘ ‘Exchxl is right, we need to do something to stop it. We were the first one fed, and it is our responsibility. ‘Even though Malantiered showed signs of wanting to flee again, under the protective gaze of the others, he stopped himself from the ever slightest consideration. Though it was difficult to consider it, he stayed. It would be something many of them would speak for ever single day after, never feeling like they’d miss it. ‘Come on now, let the ones caught by hunger die off if they want. But I won’t wait here for it to fully come to life. ‘Their continual decision spread much closer than it should. Drawing near to fully being embodied, the entire room shook. In turn, even the fire had been disposed off, fully being thrown away. With the say being over, they slyly went out of thier way not to be caught. Into the blaze of glory, where defiance would be lost, they finally came off and got lost into the crowd. It was harnessed there, as they would be anywhere, trying to make it to the dead ends where the holes emerged and the man-made ladders lead below. It was the only way down, as it could be. Nothing as quiet as their lot would be the one that was saved. 'Wait, I think I hear something, it's coming from below. "Make way, I need to see it as well. 'What they were all be by had been nothing but a strike. From the workers who made sure the tunnels were cleaned, forced into the safe zones they had been forced into. Nothing moved there, as long as they willed it. 'Careful now, it's all to dangerous if you're as unskilled as you look. Make a wrong turn and you'll find yourself handed into a ditch with nothing to look after the fall into the pit. ' 'Where is it? "Everywhere, why I would say, if I didn't know any better that there's only one of them. But it's moving, isn't it, boys? 'They laughed between themselves, never looking onward as to know. Just what was so funny that they were all sharing? It was the last runner who attempted to make it on his own. 'This is the only thing that remains of him. I want you all to take a good look at him in order to understand. If you're going there without taking the good road, well this is what will happen. 'He was really wrong looking. A tune of the sick, round eyes that had nothing on them, or around, perfect circles that always stood open. It was a shame, that I could only stare at the red without being able to draw anything from it again. So far, I was waiting in quiet as the others started appearing, basking in the scent of lime. 'Do you like that smell? Well you might come to like this as well. 'One of the foragers brought a small cart which bore some plump limes. 'Mined? ' 'Hold them and you'll see, eat, why won't you? Don't worry about it, this can be just as safe as your little experiment upstairs. "How did you find out about that? ' 'I have my sources, don't worry about it, Malantiered. I've been told about everything you and your gang of friends had been messing with as of lately. To that, I can only say that I'm rather impressed. I'm not going to lie, as I had considered following in your footsteps and doing something similar with a personal. Project of mine, that's what I want you to look into, when you're able of course. For now, I wouldn't even hope to draw your or your friends from the safety you're looking for. There, there's the road. Take it. But be careful, only one person at a time. Not a single one of you is allowed otherwise. It's dark in there and there's the chance that you might fall. That's neither of our faults. ' 'Why did this creature look like such a psychopath? It was those eyes and the demeanour he displayed. The fact that he presented us with an alternative and we had taken it, lime stones they may be, they weren't supposed to taste that way. Or even be eaten, but they held some modifications no one could tell of. 'Where did the Bile-gang go? ' 'They were the first to take the road. ' 'How come we can't see their lights out there then? ' 'Wouldn't you like to know? 'A perfidious smile was given. For all the concerning parties, this was wrong, no one would be strong, for the right reasons either. With the little meaning that lay in store, this was it, no more could they rest in peace. One by one they followed, hit after miss, unable to figure out who made it through alive. 'Will you please just trust us? ' 'You're the only one talking. They're awfully quiet, aren't they? I think it would make everyone feel at least closer to them if they decided it was time to open their mouths. ' 'I'm afraid this can't be done. For the same reason we've spent so much time together and most of the others had already went past you. 'He was right, I was alone with them. Neither of them made a move. Behind me there was still that pile of stone upon which the ladder proved to be the last objects that would be missed. It pissed me off way too much, just to consider the fact. That I would be the only one lost. For the lesser words that were spent, I was there. Last man standing, denying it would be improbable now. And I had little doubt that all the blame for what had been going around us would be placed on my back. For the same reasons, I chose not to take myself too serious as to pretend that I felt anything even remotely right as long as I was in his presence. ‘Will you allow me to pass then?’ ‘When have I said you’re denied? As a matter of fact, I have almost always perversely offered you the first opportunity to go. But you waited for everyone to take it before you. How kind. Malantiered, are you a kind person?’ ‘The kind who’d like to be alone.’ ‘For a great reason I suppose, that would be left for us to check, as soon as you take the road, instead of waiting for you to be on the other side, we’ll joint you.’ ‘But weren’t you on the strike?’ ‘It’s over. With me in lead, I shall follow you closely. As I was saying, there’s no need to fear the lack of sight, I could see it just now. Behind you, now.’ He took me by fright, and I couldn’t help it but look back. It wasn’t likely that I would spare myself of what I was dreading. Not to falter or look after it, I turned back. His appearance still left the same initial impression he gave me. As a matter of fact, he made me feel ill. Down the throdder, longer after it could even be determined for me to feel right. ‘Please just.’ It was my hopelessness he was waiting for. I couldn’t hope to stall for more. Instead, I took on the road and praised whatever deity I could think of, as faith could be the only thing missing from this puzzle. As much as I wanted another way out, I couldn’t settle for anything less than looking about the road. ‘I’ll guide you through it, don’t worry.’ The locking motion was heard from the back. As soon as it closed, the machine standing next to it started going on its own again, without leaving any space for the mind to fill the holes. That was it. There wasn’t any way for it to it, so why activate it now? ‘What’s the purpose of the machine?’ ‘Secret.’ ‘It’s a secret now? Couldn’t you at least give me a hint to it? I’d simply like to know so I could make an idea of it.’ ‘If I told you, perhaps you’d gut me alive. Well, I don’t want that.’ ‘Why would I want to do that? Why here?’ ‘Why wouldn’t I want you to do it?’ The Foreman took a second more to grin at the question. Just what it had been waited, imagined in my head, as I was unable to look back and see what he was calling forth, as to the sender to the river of death. ‘Water down there?’

‘Because of the constructions, we managed to hit some of the lower placed and the waterways, you know, something we would have to deal on ourselves with. No one’s really interested in hearing about it, or what we hide in it. Or whom may fall, never to be found.’ ‘That doesn’t sound like much of a threat.’ ‘I was talking about the ones that were dead. You’re still alive, and it would be easy for you to struggle away in order to swim against the current. Perhaps if it was a stronger one, I would’ve considered it.’ ‘How many feet away was he? At times it felt like, with every approaching sentence, he was simply breathing on the back of my head. I only wanted to get away from his grasp. Nothing more, would he simply just let go of me if I called on the others? There had to be something more than this look the Foreman gave me. Now it became apparent. The dark couldn’t even hope to obscure what he looked like. Despite the warnings I couldn’t even hope to look away. I was destined to die in some place. ‘We’re here.’ ‘Already, which end would this be? I can’t feel anything.’ ‘Well, we reached the crossroads. Congratulations, you’re the first one to hear about them and be properly warned. Just so you’ll know, there’s a way for us to fall down. Not to settle of be lost against the lost crown of metal of the falling stones. There’s a tunnel we’re working over and the road had been completely reworked on top of it. Not to mention that there’s this. A way in and one out, brought to as much as one could look after. Lost after as much as it could be said, one couldn’t look in again. Falling down wasn’t an alternative. Leaping over to avoid being struck. ‘Of the many roads in which this one splits, if this is the case, which one will you pick?’ ‘The same one you’re on, of course. I only want to help you in case you’ll get lost or something. You wouldn’t want to get lost now, would you? Judging by the distance to the fall, you wouldn’t survive, trust me on this. If either of us was presented with the same alternative, there’s no doubt that we couldn't escape either. 'Escape? He bit his lip, I heard it. Audible as well as felt, there were hard components to it which made him feel less organic than he let others know. Despite their simple understanding, he chose to approach and draw near. For the same reason that he embedded himself into the place. Something was missing from his face and he was looking for it. In that, Malantiered showed only the greatest of facial details, the contour, the very demeanour the other parts presented. He managed to lead the the awakening and entrapment of the others. 'I'll be honest since you're the key point of everyone having come here, to our grasp. It doesn't matter which road you pick, they all converge to the same middle one after a few feet away. With our numbers, there's enough of us that you wouldn't be able to out-do us. Don't think you'll be able to outsmart us either, because that won't work. For what's worth, it's commendable that you made it so far. No one else had been so thoroughly feistful as you have been. 'I have seen him in a while. Was I staring into the empty haul again? Was he about to speak of something else? 'Make your choice and live with it. I cannot wait for you to stall for way too long. 'Pitiful, though he chose the middle road, making it so he was trapped with him and him alone. Foreman, what would he be called? What was his intention? Why was he trying to draw near to him from that far? For as long as there'd be an intention for him to be tracked, there was that. 'A conversation with your trapper? 'No, I think I'll wait for the charger. 'What was he planning on doing now? Holding the two lines of silver on either side made it seem like this was sturdy enough not to be lost. For every second going on had been a blessing of feelings, revealing that there was nothing he could do. No matter how hard he could try fighting him, there was the river. 'Oh another loss, why couldn't you join them? 'At least he wouldn't have to be removed from creeping around. For the sake of a purposeless miss, his fist had almost fallen below the line. Instead of trying harder, he found himself tempted to look around. For the same reason that he was there, they were there, all of them worn and placed into the great metal box on the other side of the bridge. 'Another lot made it through, just as planned. So many holes will have to be filled with so many bodies like resin, or to blow. 'Not to mention that there would be times where it would be kind of important to know what was going on. They would do, everyone made it through the last few meters which had eight square, lined openings. Gas emerged as soon as they were brought at the closure. From there, it was easy for each one to be picked up in the dark and placed into the machine by the second team. Project hole a mole had been too much for a success to be dismissed. It was majestic, just feeling through it. Now, they came to a break. Everyone made it forward, unaffected by the gas. 'Sleeping gas, ain't it quite a useful tool? 'They should be completely chopped by the tip they should awaken through. 'By no means did they laugh, instead, they showed their fancy teeth, trying to run through their swollen heads and mess about each time one of them promised to make some noise. After coming together, they shook each other's hands, congratulating one another for a job well done. Serious business had been carried on here.

After all, making these tunnels a safer place for the other generations as well as those who promised to come afterwards had been something to long for. Even by looking back at it, some could draw just enough of the effects they left on the road while coming here. 'They left the soles of their feet down there. 'How? 'Heat signatures still lay there, that's a bad thing. I think they might be able to get reconstructed if we don't take care and wipe out their traces. 'They will be reconstructed anyway by that scrawny nod up there. 'I am actually aware of it. But as soon as they come into contact with them, it will be done. Perhaps I should get more specific with it just so you could understand the actual danger that comes with it. They will reabsorb some of their beings and be able to draw on from their loss. They'll sense that something's wrong down here and be warned before we get the chance to another batch. 'What do you propose then? That we waste valuable hours trying to clean every possible spot? Phey, I don't suppose you'll offer yourself for the task at hand, will you, now? 'He couldn't even draw enough from the side.

They were weak but strong in the mind. 'Foreman, will you help us lower it down then? If we can submerge it under the river, there won't be any need to try cleaning it thoroughly. That way, there won't be any kind of wasted time. 'And what if the roads remains wet? What then? They'll only slip by and fall to their deaths, wasting valuable resources as well. 'They couldn't be settled on it. Though it may have been their only reasonable task, that and the refilling of the hole-fillers, this had been a matter of the highest mechanics. It was dangerous, trying to lower the sink-contraptions and the various prolonger bands that could only slowly lower them down. For the heat which was already done, there was nothing there but the cold inside the cavernous grown they had been in. 'We need to ask for guidance then. We should have enough time until they awaken. 'Far deeper there, where the zone was too dangerous to thread upon, they stood like tubs, in which they rested in liquid forms even though they were mixed of intelligent chemicals, kept so by the electrical arc-lighter above them. Standing like a pointed gun with a giant sphere which created as much electricity as it was needed for every single tub to be zapped, they would speak at intervals as they were connected at the bottom through their sinks. 'Draw closer now, and present yourself. 'It was one of the other foremen to come. Whatever would be presented to them had that infinitesimal chance that they could properly destroyed by the energy freely thrown out of the way. Not to say that they hadn't a reason for it. Despite the precautions, this tiny spit had been placed on a metal circle that gravitated around the place. From the middle pillars which kept the arc-lighter and ensured it wouldn't go out of its way to malfunction, there was a cruel kind of interest everything had shown to it. The rock and the natural particles appeared to slowly be drawn to the edges of the circle.

It felt as if those from the back felt the same desire. Knowing that this hard a platform had the ability to levitate so easily had given them a feeling of peculiar adoration. They felt different both from the living beings and the others they had been accustomed to. Whilst working in silence, it was as obvious what they were after as one could see.

'Examine me then, I want to approach. 'The perfect rotation stopped for the same reason he had been touched. It was something close to being as reasonless as the various thundering strike that carried on. 'Judge him, now, we need to find out what his being is about. 'Worker, foreman, the one who had undertaken the repairs, he's been noticed. All of them have. For now he's deemed to be safe for anyone other than the filling gaps evolved for it.

'Various proficiencies were settled there. Just by the structure inside that strange contraption upon which he walked, it was obvious that nothing had been safer than the. The way in which he formed another body just farther away.

They picked up on a transmission, completely ignoring him. So many of them were ill form as the dragon started abandoning bodies in order to take a new form, being indistinguishable from a pole now. As they all gathered around and started worshipping the same being from which they had been given birth from, there came the danger. Fanatics couldn't be allowed to reign free, for the same various reason that there wasn't any chance to control them at all. It wasn't a fear but a way of knowing that there wasn't any safety to be had. Harnessed from them, none would abide any kind of command. Nonetheless they tried. For some reasonless wonder, their minds had particles of copper, iron, steel and other alloys that mixed with their minds. It was through those that some signals could travel as they formed intricate machines, never working for themselves or within the range. 'Come back to us. This isn't the time for talking. I think it would be much safer for a later intervention. ‘Said someone from the working group, simply being there had been a misunderstanding that couldn’t prove to be much harder. Harsher even as the ones above moved like marionettes, slowly but concisely being taken over by the soles of their heads. Self control would never be known. Instead, what they had gotten had been a response. ‘We have attained supreme control upon them. With this bargaining chip, we expect something from your kind as soon as we see it fit. There’s a crytalline block somewhere in the depths. ‘So spoke the Liquids, as they were finally but shyly approached by the foremen and all their cadets. It was only now that they showed any kind of interest for what was going on. For the whole evasiveness was nothing but a supreme act of ruse, wanting them to go farther than they could. ‘Your intention with that block, what is it? You must know that we’re just as precatious as one can be. Just who know what the power behind it is. ‘Neither of which is your concern. May I ask you then, are you the leader of the bunch? ‘He nodded, and gave no name but only the title he had worn ever since the previous introduction. By the same circling eyes, which started rotating, taking on a slight hymn-like song. Worst for the wear, not to be out there, it was as obvious that something was going on. But it would be unparalleled in any case. ‘It does a deranged act which will power us back and afterwards we may finally leave this dimension. Will this deal please you now? ‘ ‘If you leave. ‘The Foreman considered this for a wild amount of seconds passing through. It hadn’t been an easy decision to maintain especially since there wasn’t any way of checking, but they would also get exposed as well. Not only had they served as a lock, but as a kind of blockage as well for what waited on the other side. Nothing was known about them, other than the fact that they produced a lot of noise and they drolled some kind of bitter coal yet citrus-like moving mucus. For one, this may seem kind of peculiar. But for them it would be poison. Just by the mere fac that it could draw out and move towards them, none of them knew the better. Some had come into contact with it, in better days. And the Foreman had lost a few cadets and some others like them. First touch would cause the skin to spoil, as it would spread across the body, turning from the strange pink to a wild unenergetic eelish teal. Suffering would go for a few hours, during which the contagion could spread to the others like a virus, acting slowly as they had their insides turned to the same citrus-like liquid, only to be dragged back by long fermented tongues. On the outside, they’d harden like spoils of battered lepers. Afterwards, they would be unusable, as they’d be stuck like statues, unable to be recovered or even brought back. It was them as well that kept taking away some of their progress in trying to cover the holes. Reasonless as it may have been, in the infancy of this project, there was this draw back. Dangers in the back, yet, for the sole fact that it could control them, as they had spoke of it, their deal could bring back more than a few good things. ‘We shall go ahead and make this deal then. I cannot fumble over what I think of it yet, but I shall inform the others and make sure. ‘Eeriness topped him, from the outer corners where they dwelled, everything past the other side was theirs. But this had been only the blocked main entrance or the exit, depending on which direction one was looking to. From left towards the right side, the outstrech lead even farther away, but there were no rails. Reasonless it was. Had the workers pulled them out, perhaps? Or could it even be considered just another ruse and lost work? No one’s worth would be placed or asked for. But as far as it went onward, there hadn’t been any sign of it. That there had ever been any kind of work done there. Meaning that there was only a pile which had been scraped inside as the other trains were to have another route carved for them out there. ‘It’s done. ‘Foreman, how simple had had said it, now something came to him just as quikcly as he turned to a few flashlights in his hand.

Others like him were to pick them up and make sure everything had been placed in the right spot as they went with him. 'You, you, you and you will follow me. Make sure you're all equipped with a flashlight and a rope. Something to break the stone as well as. 'Incredible, just how far they had stopped themselves in order to see. What the others hadn't completely understood was the very fact that neither of them was shook by this. By this sudden exploration or the promise that they'd be seen. 'We haven't been there by now. ' 'I am aware of it, but I cannot wait any longer. 'Nervousness after all this time? Impossible and disregarded, as to what they'd see there, it wasn't going to be solely reenacted again. As reasonlessly as it sounded calm, out there they were brought about the working spot where some previous generations were still caught by their antics. 'No antecedents, I see. 'For the various lost, that had come with a cost, some of them still lay there, encased as they were ancient, taller as the walls against which they fought against to overcome. It was a sign of disconcert, simply looking for a way in. Through it, there were just some breaking spots, left by a pick that hit against him. 'Someone's been here before. ' 'Obviously they had, but just how deep have they gone through it? 'It was hard, trying to attempt to justify what had been going there. From below, where they had been working with the plain strips of wood that kept the road, the stoney fountains and the rivers, it was hard to know or to ever think of an intention. To get farther away and drive in deeper without any kind of direction they could latch on. Not only had danger lain. 'Look out!' They moved like a chamberlain who stung a toe. From the mud avalanche that fell below them almost dragged a few of them down with it. Just a few meters in and they would've lost half of them, never to be gotten back. 'Careful now, not to make too sudden of a movement, men, it's far more riskier than it seemed to be back then. 'When? Of course there were times they were trying to pick up foraging through some way. Even though it may have been too dangerous to consider nowadays, without assistance that is. Who shook the curtains of and why would they wonder? It was as much as three feet deep. Uoongo carried a piece that cracked, out of the Delvas in as much as twenty short circuits of twenty seconds each. He simply arched around the Trianorax and found himself sitting. For what would he wait if not to find out who was really into the one said and sulken. Peering out of a pair of boxes, grabbed but pushed farther way. 'Is everything going to end up into the Deposit? ' 'Of course, we need every possible amount of material for the ground control. It can leap at any moment otherwise. 'While pointing below, it was obvious that there wasn't any stone any longer. Lingering by it, there were ants which piled about but never moved. Inside each of them, some kind of fungus attained control and gave away for the first shrips of stings to emerge. For the reasons counted before, they stung like nails and pushed in the infection that spread through their system. Giving way to a stop. Yet their cold had brought them the immunity which their kind knew nothing about. 'As long as we suffer of pneumonia, we'll be fine. ' 'But what of this then? 'An unpeakable amount of twists in the town resulted in the mirroring it suffered about. Looking into a part of the city revealed the appearance of giant ants that were unmoving but waited like an army. No one could see the gigantic structures behind and over them because of the sheer size and the mist that enveloped them even now. 'Won't that thing grow on us as well? ' 'Don't worry about it, I can see why you'd wager it, but it won't come to pass. Keep on suffering of your pneumonia and you'll be safe. ' More towards the first empty building that got sold to him, had they been drawn to, there rested five figures, all of which benign. Tried by themselves as well as they had peerlessly waited in their lost known spot. Beneath the floor, underneath them, the manifestation of the dark forest from which they had been originally picked up from happened again. For as much as they could be held accountable for what was going on around them, nothing could be done. Had they held as much force as they claimed? Judging by the view, this world was still anew to them. Yet they stood largely compressed. It looked like they had been placed into blood-drawers and pushed with the air, just so they could occupy as little space as they might. Only if it were somewhat right to keep them this way, perhaps there wouldn't be any guilt for them to convey. A reason for the taking was this. They were not of this place. Fat though they be, too wide as their four hips, resting deeper in their backs, the bone thordians pushed through their lumping heads occupying at least four quarters of their restless limbs inside the pockets. Not only would this still be called, ready to be pushed aside. Yet not a word spoken or projected. For these creatures were slowly releasing the water they directed towards the man. 'Get out, I said. This is the last time I'll let you stay here without paying for rent. 'The tender-like trench appearance allowed them to turn slowly in the most obtrusive form. Only if there was a way to convey emotion, other than their headless approach, through which they pushed ahead a bigger jolt, out of the various long ripped defiling talon-like grabbers they exposed. But it was a sham, for those limbs didn't belong to them, but to some lower life-form that had been summoned there. Behind it they had strange controllers in the form of the miniature textured carpets seen from a microscopic view. One that drew away and pushed through some bone sinew. Worst of all, they were being used to breathe deeply in and out to the very point where they couldn't wonder what was going on and where had the trial stopped. 'We should fine the guilty at that. ' 'What for? What did you break now? ' 'Hurrnt, there's a reason why we're here and it cannot be denied any longer that there's no chance for us to return to our doings. There's a war going on there and for that we'll settle with the sight of it instead of carrying on. ' 'What's that supposed to mean? ' 'Show him. 'As if from the middle area where a single point stood, everything opened like a prim would, revealing a spot where everything was brought, lowered upon a latter on the watch tower brought to the howling noises of a galactic explosion. As diffuse as it had been, this vision showed on the growth of one between the middle span within it. ' 'This is the ladder they might use to escape. We do not know the reason for it but this being keeps growing between dimensions seeking some escape. Look at them as well. Billions of vile things growing on its back, as well as those who joined in through this journey with no reason in the mind. For this fate, there's something we ought to fear. ' 'And we cannot decide whether or not he's only spreading so because a result of our own peculiar admission. It must be our fault, all of ours because we had given a body to the rules of the universe in some way. Because of them he's guided past the world and the sight of it that's being conveyed. ' 'Is he headed here then? Well, I work long hours and I wouldn't. ' 'Silence, Hurrnt. This is important, there won't be any long hours for you any longer if you keep going this way. In its path there's the fear that it may bring something about, nearing the point where. 'The sacking had begun. From distance one might see, that there was a planet which halvened as if burst from an egg, spreading two embodiments of fighters from the chest. Yet they had been somewhat lacking, their faces bearing giant carved paths that lead away through the other sides. In them there was the only piece of information needed, manifesting itself as an asteroid belt forming words that spelled the entire history of their world. Even the future being told in the most peculiar manner. Rockets had been sent, only to see the advent of those creating the spatial song. From it they could bring the world to an entire spot. With one condition they would be preserved. Through some atomic state coming from the giant nuclear generators attached to their ear-buds containing the grandest flexible tunnels that lead to all four of them. Millions of nuclear stations had been set around the area, trying to create the spark. In each hole, between the two, there seemed to come a grand signal which had it so they would head back home. Wherever that may be. 'It's going to be a colossal loss, but if the words are true, there's no other hope to escape through. ' 'But if the words tell us of our future, how come there's no mention of anything which happened here so far? Not a single word of the tunnels or the sparks which appear. ' 'Don't question it no longer, can't you see that we won't make it through if we keep pushing the most insignificant suggestions ahead? ' 'Wait, Chancellor Octavius, but what if they're right? What if this future they're talking about is nothing but a ruse place about their ears and gone? ' From each passing eon or second, they had done. Each generation saw how they lips moved on. Inspired by the languages given birth my men they learned. And time after time again they spoke of what they heard. 'Each word is carefully represented and never is it bastardised at all. ' 'But they're reading from their own lines, couldn't this mean they're given some sort of command from somewhere out there? ' 'It could just mean that, in some way. What do you think we should do in that case? ' 'There's not much hope we could get accustomed to. Despite our good will, what had been said will only bring us closer to defeat. What rests in our hands lays nothing short but the complete alteration of the way we see space and the other dimensions they speak of now. Every since the invasions during the infancy of our primeval shock, they had been coming here in visit and in spirit, only to guide and. 'She didn't finish. A mad creature, not from there, came out of just about anywhere. He had a pain of arms that spread about and pulled back into a barely formed trunk, held by the ever fading legs which spread back into the gaze coming from a pair of long thinned but paper slit eyes. Too many features lay on top and between counted. But it was fast, almost to the soundless stare in which it cut her face and head, to the knees and in-between the mazes on her scalp. Then he strutted and spoke. 'Ikvar, I am Ikvar Rod. 'With that spoken, he carried on the execution order, killing everyong in the room, including the press and the guard and the other dimensional passers until only Octavius and him were there. Such speed was not only underrated, but impossible to fight again. Pain couldn't compress the sizing of the walls that pushed ahead against him. His mere strenght generated by the quickness of his movements resulted into him sterilising him as well. 'For the chance of a descendant and the chance that you may be allowed to live, give this message from this envelope within twenty of the men listen in the address. But do not open it. ' 'How could I distribute it to them then? ' 'That's left for you to know and I to wonder whether or not you're the one that I'll be searching for after. 'He had given little to the though as to understand what was going on. With everything so far being left to a room filled with what he'd fed on for the few hours, he was left to wonder. Just what ought to come after? It would be generous to consider some ill received advice. To the devices that recorded the audio performance of this act, a secret message had been carried through the speech he brought about. 'We need to give this message away, I can understand it now. 'Just as he said, after the envelope was canned, the rays that went through it produced a peculiar sound which could be interpreted in the new Morse code Alp-Ark. In more than some great ways, what could be conveyed was the far of the arch piles. Defilers of words and the way of bringing forth the envelope had been completely mesticated and shaped as a cast would in the form of a pillaring human. 'Is this the message they want us to bring over? ' 'This is what the scanner revealed. 'But it wasn't enough, to open it mean that the copied would be given birth from the cast. In as much as a few hours, that cast started releasing too many envelopes to count. The problem now being that each of them had a different set of names, too many to count and not enough for them to satiate their thirst of knowledge, defiance wouldn't be counted the same. It was perilous to think of battering either of them to open. And see what had been spoken in the midst of the tars. 'Perhaps there's still a chance to move through?' 'I think I'll settle with something less if you don't mind. 'Jus what had he been storing in that message out of time? By two am, it was already settled for as much as they could work it through. A few more molds, too many bold letters and messages were being thrown out of the way. Yet no result, or anything had come to say. 'We'll send all of them then in. 'Why, who cared of the simplest of manners that were spreading about each time one interloper came. 'What else could be drawn from it if not the last prime piece of the circular rotation caught underneath the lenses brought to view. Back into the complete phaser, through which the citizens looked as if caught by the mechanism bound to put their stress down, another moment came as it depressed. 'If I could control it somehow, I could attain full control over time. History would be mine and I could change the future before it comes to life. 'Rivoulet had been such an attendee'. Who looked at this place in the very mildness he could he presented by. After carefully planning around each universal stretch, he had decided that it would be worth to pursue it no less. 'By the time of your eleventh full rotation, when you will have reached the miles, this entire planet and those two will drag us with you. 'In the solace where it had been lost, where it would be accosted by those who couldn't keep up with the time. Not a single second would it be, there they'd be preserved without anything passing. Old age, magnificent and youth, pruned at they could be pushed out of the tunes. Lacking in the masses, dances would entail. That after countless days spent there, he saw it all again. It would be I who'd given over them, allowing not full all, yet infantile approached would call back. For me to decide whether or not their ages could be brought and smashed, back into the state where they couldn't breathe at all. Complete control over time, as he had read it in the tiny comet they had pinned into their rotation pulse, would allow him simply to contrive the evolution course. No longer would they be bipedal, the dominant species could be dictated by a mere act. All of it could be in his hand, if only he had brought it back. The future he had seen in this delusion was plain.

Looking back at it again revealed his exposure and the growth he had to carry through. Not just as much but it appeared like he missed a piece of himself, more than a few, all of it, from chest below. No arms, and half of his skull empty if not the city and the planet stretched on the two walls that bent and fetched the others there. One would have to dictate the terms with which they would be plain. For this control of time had settled, for one day he would be broken, bred like a kettle of boiling guts. From the empty hole beneath him various long contraptions would snatch the need and grow as they would weed out the lesser creations of the galaxy it had resided in. Time would make it so they would be bound, in some way, not to convey emotion as their destruction was impossible. Instead, aking memories they could be shattered and dispersed, lost and mixed with everything that had ever existed from the start of the universe. To him point, he had made a suit. Reflection of his vileness may be, the behaviour which had been misunderstood. Instead of being seen for the bandit and the villain he had presented himself as, he had been completely greeted as a performer, seen by all in the most baffling way. 'Is that the grand parisee? The entertainer I see? 'Rivoulet had seemed to wear, only what appeared on top of his wares. It couldn't be concealed any longer, not would it lose the appeal that was signalled then. Reasonless though caught on by this apparel, he greeted the admirers with the greatest of view. 'As I promised, I'll only show you the greatest and the most important. 'More important than this be, what gathered in the asteroid had been, only the darkest missiles brought from war. It was a secret kept from him and him alone. Other men had been brainwashed, kept down from knowing but showing only the slightest hint that they knew what was going on. As on in there came the sand, a sane approach of the fluttering wind that threw it about the placed. Never would it be known of more than those face that stared. 'Not any longer, I refuse to pay the heed and to keep it a secret any more. Can't you see they're trying to pick in what's happening inside them on?' 'On that day, you promised, that's right. I think you remember the exact dat and what you said was that you owe me. This will be kept a secret. ' 'For the same reason they would launch the asteroid after reaching its full limit and the rotation. 'Fragmentation may not happen then, but upon reaching the full extension and the heat-strength at the perfect moment, the full alchemical nuclear power could finally be launched. He almost came to the point of spilling it as well. General population wasn't allowed to know just what was going on. Not to push ahead the dangling of heads, the messing of the ones who were trying to sit among themselves unable to read through the lines. And then. . . It came again, just like the assassin, the one deranged creature that spilled no secret from within. Ikvar Rod bred a spear of tuberculosis, formed in his hand, ready to defent the secrets on both ends. Eight times they had been sliced, and not a secret had been carried on since. 'Murder, there's been a murder. 'As they dispered, the govermental branch was called forth, immediately coming out of their vehicles as if born inside of them just to be thrown forth for him to kill some more. Many didn't even intend on survivng if that meant trying their luck. Against him, many were brought to that point where it hadn't mattered any more. Not even he had the force to subdue himself past the point where it was needed for him to be defeated. Uncanny, and stricken down, blasted out of the way and lost for the crownless drought, everything changed upon their awakening again. Like a peeling mirage they had been forced back, to see what was going on. Seeing and seething through one few strokes of paint that changed everything as if it could even be remotely conveyed, now came the chance for it to stifle and return. Mourning for their world they sinned. As quickly as it happened wherein they shot through them like pin-balls, never ready to accept that it was about to come through. During this event, it seemed that the many people who had received the envelopes had something uncanny being revelaed to them. Inside the messages there would be blood. A lot of it, perhaps too much for a whole being to produce at that, which filled their locked doors, drowning them as bores would come to be. Reflected in the windows, one could see the red on the other side. 'Now we get to witness this together. 'After the final rotation, everything went as planned. The only generals and head scientists who might've been able to prevent this from happening had been either sliced and drowned. Yet for their uncanny woe, nothing would be set forth. For the spark finally awakened into both of their minds, as soon as the nuclear holocausts emerged and never gave on. Countless days, spent wishfully looking through the ways through which they might be redeemed, but the entirey of the world had been pulled in time. Where nothing yet everything waited for a change to come. There they floated, each of citizens having replaced the two giants of their planets like twins, replicas of themselves or none to know the sins of the other. And every since one of them had materialised and stopped, floating apart, naught to known. Better than the sowing remarks they'd throw and sink, like hooking winks. Lesser than themselves the animals and the other breeds would come together foming large wing-like leashes, leaving their various souds on top of their emobided parts, being taken for the dumb things they were. Eaten by the giants raw, never allowed peace and quiet as they would be brought back regardless of deaths. No more child could be conceived and for every planet in the system, there would be no one inhabbiting it. A victory indeed, bred forth by nuclear power, it seemed like a catastrophe had been avoided. Distant though it was a pass, there wasn't any way to know what was going on. 'Foreman, you got to think. What's the meaning of this?' 'Aimed flashlights only lead to one pieced stone. After putting on the effort of placing everything in place, they revealed the first face that appeared before them. 'It's yours but the body isn't. 'Sold off by seemingly a dark armour and a twist around the neck. 'Let us see what you're hiding. 'He revealed himself as soon as he could push on ahead, leaving no trace of doubt that it wasn't him, but someone who stole a look right about the same size as his. Resemblance be uncanny, so they said.

But no one knew what bothered them or for what reason dictated a promise for what would be read. For the few moments that they took alone, going through page after page in the instruction manual to remake one out of bone, they had realised what they were dealing with. 'A Deject, that's what we have here. Somehow he had acquired a piece of your bone and made you after it, just so it could achieve its filthy goals. ' 'What now? Am I supposed to be impressed or missed? 'Pissed even by the amount of fear they were giving in. As if we haven't been through something much worse than this. Simply symbolising a way out, they were getting ready to leap about the place if they were to be hunted. Primitive things, those suits of armor were made out of cartilage, as hard to believe as it was, there couldn't be a doubt at all. 'I need to focus in. 'One disquiet came, they could be left to watch what would be important ahead. Known as Sabotage, he came back only for a moment, not to cause too much suspicion as the others had been tame. Uneven even on the fact that there was only a way out only to descent from it again, as the preservation had a trick, a deal. 'I have been awakened, it seems. For how long have I slept?' 'A few days, at least, or weeks, or months. 'Come to think of it, by the interpretation of the calendar, as weird of a language as it had been set it revealed more so in terms of years. Plenty of years passed, meaning that this wasn't something that would last. Torn by the fact, he came out only to be greeted by the same kind of attitude from the ones who had forgotten about him. 'Greetings, new comer, right?' 'You remind me of someone, what's your name again?' 'Just who, what was going on? Nothing would be settled unless some pleasantries could be set about. It was a disaster. Instead of going through the same ritual again, reintroducing himself with little to say, he chose the path of disquiet. For the sake of this paradox, he chose to look deeper into the open grates of the window's channel, as there was his way out.

Cutting through one of the standing book holder, deprave even, he examined the dirt. Closer looks gave them the false impression of looking like cutouts formed into various geometric shapes. None of them fit nor would they give a way in, but something was scorouging him to look away. For the same reason he couldn't point out what this feeling had to do with the whole operation. 'We detected some structural changes into the central nervous system, of the perilous kind that won't listen. 'Listen to us now, we cannot override your control yet, Sabotage. We need you to step our of the way and and do what you can not to be affected by whatever that is. 'But it's. I cannot express it. But it wants me to be here. 'It was a soundless logic that missed and never hit. Back to the moving feet there would be no wonder what was drawing after him. A mess that stood about five feet in size, turned from dirt and stepped to its massive girth, revealing some unnatural dust. Like some strange solid gust, it spoke of the uncanny resolution they would have to spare. 'Make it to the bridge then, and we'll see to it that there'll be a way for your to hide from the general selection. ' 'What would that be now?' 'A way out, this time, it will be under your control and yours alone. Nothing manifesting out of thin air and nothing which will bring to despair. Understood?' 'Fine, but this isn't over yet. 'I will find out just what the progress had amassed to. For the few years where he was gone, despite the matter and the fact, he still felt like nothing much was added to the bulk, nor the calculations of the good taking of the ones in the bags. Why are they still using bags? Whereas the entire ship had been clear, clean, this entrance there they threw the sacks contrasted with the rest of it. Struggling as they had been actually pinned on giant hooks, it looked like wherever they were set to go had been more so underestimated than wildly claimed to be safe. ‘Don’t worry about it, that old burner’s not dangerous at all.’ ‘Why is it a burner then?’ ‘I know. This may sound strange, but it’s now exactly what you think. It may sound peculiar, but the old shaft it simply a faster way to deposit them because we don’t have as much space to put them in as we would like to.’ ‘And that’s supposed to calm me down somehow?’ ‘Somehow I think it will, you won’t lose any nights of sleep over it, I assure you Storage, I have checked you after all. From time and time, just so we could be sure you’d be properly fed and taken care off. And it wasn’t easy but, this is all automated. There hasn’t been a malfunction in years.’ ‘Going by the sheer numbers alone, how many survivors are there?’ ‘No death. ‘None at all, he said. Strange how he hadn’t taken the time to check for it. And for that reason alone I followed the track, back to the shaft and went in. Well, to the strange name that had been it again, there was nothing as cruel as making them wait of it. Perhaps for that reason, the presence of a moving conveyer-like belt had been alarming for some reason. Poorly lit as well, to the point where it was hard to recognise just what the intention was, cruelly pushed him to follow through. Hooks dropped as soon as they got near the general area where a blocking fence lay. Once the sack had been stabilised, being prevented from falling over, the release came and he would be sent in again. Just what did this part of the ship entail? Going around there was already hardly a task for someone who had been gone for so long, being deactivated just like a machine. It was just hash, being there, out of the air pressure almost drawing close to the point where he was almost flattened entirely. Not only that, but he could feel his suit coming off.’ ‘Just what are you doing to these poor crewmen? We were supposed to be taking care of them.’ Storage stopped as soon as it was convenient to do so. ‘We shouldn’t be here, it appears. We cannot stress enough of the danger and what lays ahead. Perhaps it would be better if you returned and never looked back at what you’ve said or what you heard. I think it’s time we hit back the automatic view, just so you will not see it through.’ ‘Wait, wait a moment, why is my vision hardly working now? Are you working with them? Is that it?’ ‘We cannot give a valid answer. There’s no satisfaction you would get from it, not with this in mind. It’s your loss unless you want to go ahead and turn your steps away.’ Wry though his smile may be, there was still no confirmation whether or not he still had a jaw and a pair to smile with. Instead, he thought of how he had been played so far. Even now, the sidestep wasn’t even his. While he was being lowered on a side plane, the elevation began struggling while drawing him away from the sight. He wasn’t supposed to see those butter-like flat bags that emerged after entering the stall-compressor. It wasn’t shameful, just how it was. Business would be business after all and no one talked about it. Placed where he had been, there was one more thing to know. ‘You’ll be placed somewhere you won’t be able to lose your quiet face.’ By that it had been settled. He would be given a permanent smaller body to inhabit now. Trying to struggle was pointless since he couldn’t even force the cuffs off. It felt surreal, just how fast it was. But he was pulled immediately, to that, his entire helmet came off and with it the spectre made out of the bile-meat started struggling until it got away. Now that the intelligence was no longer connected to him, he wouldn’t even bother trying to look for an explanation. One of the near-floors in the surgery room gave him the perfect opportunity to get away. For his sake alone, there wasn’t any passing, yet he carried on like a puddle through the door. ‘Don’t touch him. We got the suit, let him live that way until he decides whether or not it's time to come back. 'None of the lips could be perched. For the scrolling of the verses would emerged as soon as they might be written down, the parchments and the notes never would be called back. 'Picherot, I've called you here for a reason. Now, I want you to listen carefully. My instructions are to be followed upon the most precise manner without intervention and without mistake. There's a lot resting on your shoulder, I'd say. We cannot even suffer drawing away and wasting as we're being watched carefully now. You may not fully grasp what's happening around the world, but the winds of change are drawing near. For that, I have decided to pick you for this sole mission, just so it could be achieved. 'A wink was set down. He was ashamed for being picked because he had been so young and inexperienced. To that, each blade remained to him, in as bitter as a picking lame fruit. It was dull but misunderstood. While the other trained criminals and yunks could bring in the heads of the families, their children, spills from their farms, he had been spending a lot of time around vineyards with some local drunk. His skills weren't sharpened, yet he tried recounting. Go through the secret entrance, underneath the gate. Talk with one of the servants there who might know the way. With him in mind, carry on the mission with a candle' blight and try ending under under the coffer. Climb through it, and end up right underneath the floor of the bed, where he rests on his maiden's breast. Only that way you might be able to grasp and clasp a good shot. For this task alone, he had been given a delinquentish crossbow, in itself, that weapon looked dangerous and rather uncannily defended for what it was capable of doing. Not only could it smash through the various spots, but there was danger in the fact that it could missfire. 'Hey, I'm glad I could find you. 'As narrow as the view was, he could recognise that silhouette and the voice anywhere in the kingdom and even farther than it had been brought from. 'Skim, where have you been? 'Picherot leaped and tried not to get strung of the words. Lackless actions wouldn't even reflect what he felt like. With the two of them reunited, no one would be delighted to hear, that this contract had a chance to succeed. It was hard, trying to look after himself, let alone try performing a murder by himself. But dead ends like him only dragged the organisation down and were in a high need to get disposed off. Without trying to wander too far, it was time not to worry about it any longer. 'We've performed something more difficult than this in our free time, hunting rabbits and slicing them off. Don't be nervous, this won't be any different than any of those times. ' 'I'd like to believe that Skim, but a contrat is no laughing matter. If I miss and get the wrong target, how will I be able to recover after it? And there's also the matter of escape, which. ' 'Wait, before you say anything, it's done for. It's all settled, as your good fellow and partner in crime had arranged a deal with the servants on the house. Half of the goods get to them. ' 'There's something we can even pick after? How come I haven't been alerted yet? I didn't know about that. ' 'Obvious rookie mistake, you ought to know better. But then again, this is your first kill, isn't it? ' 'My first intentional one, I suppose. I would like to say that there had been others but that would not only be a grave mistake, but also a lie as well. 'Far but not too heavy lain, there was that thing which came again. In fewer than the meters they took from one another to shake off some of the roots ahead of them, there was just enough splace where they could hide inside some of the popping bags. Heavy enough concentrations had been contained that the whole villa could be entirely submerged. 'Don't tell anyone but I stole these from around the picking ground. 'The devil was madly curageous. Him alone, undertaking this without giving even the slightest hint that he regreted coming forth. But why so many of them? Why couldn't they simply blow the place and be done with? ' 'We need to give them some time off to move the merchandise around. If we blow the charges too soon, we might have another conondrum on our hands. And for that reason, this is how the plan will go, are you listening? ‘Of course I am, sing ahead. ‘First, the assassination would go just as planned, with the help of which, everyone inside should be alerted of the general brooding danger beneath them. Afterwards, there would be only the, only the. Small gap in the plan, that was surprising that Picherot had found out about it now. ‘Just how are we intending to get out as soon as it explodes? If we’re being found out as soon as the deal is sealed, they’ll expect us to make it for the gates, won’t they? ‘There’s another way out now. How did you think I even managed to come here in the first place? It was one of the rock-blister that helped me pouch through and turn the stone soft. Without it, I think I wouldn’t even have considered the effort. ‘So we’ll jump into the Rock-blister and slowly march back. Is there enough fuel? What of the distance and what if we don’t make it in time to escape from the projected fire? ‘Don’t worry now. Come on, you’re worrying way too much for your own good. ‘There was no misatisfaction in them readying themselves for the act. During the dinner table, as long as forty feet away, at each side stood the couple, head of the family and his mistress, Dulonghe. ‘Are you enjoying yourself, my dear? How’s the soup? ‘It was hard looking at it for the same reason for which none of her fingers returned. They drew into it from opposite corners, covering in entirely into lock-like shapes. As soon as the contact had been established, from her gut, a few extensions shout through the arms, ending at the far ends where they drew sustenance directly from the source. Without knowing any better, something as vile as this had been only came to see itself over. Growing inside her with the child, who was nothing but a pile of previously aborted remains, taking in as much of the life as they could. Thrown together into a single being, there was some difficulty never fully expressed. By the various front ends which were always the first to get caught, this would be the family curse of Dulonghe. All the children in their family had been born with some severe defect and died within a year of their conception. Those who were aborted hadn’t gone through the process properly, in turn, they had been set to live as they could, with the pieces that hid inside the fat. Replicating some functions others couldn’t, they had achieved a symbiosis and partial growth. A birth would be impossible, unfortunately, and this would be the final one to come out of her. Whether or not she wanted, they couldn’t fathom separation now. ‘What happened to my young bird? ‘She looked sick and barely heard her husband anymore. As a matter of fact, he wasn’t there any longer. Nothing other than the table and the moving spreary luminous green eye, largely dyed plants that revealed where she was. All the walls disappeared but she could swear she wasn’t in her home any longer. Instead, this felt, for the better part of her stay like an entry into her own womb, where pink wasn’t defining anything but the scum of blue. Decrepit and vastly underestimated by the looks, inside them grew the child. Child? Children, so many of them were there, some torn and no longer looking like her at all. Big bodies had been grown which allowed some mobility inside of her. That hadn’t been the least of her concern, as the various connectors that allowed them to freely move as if shook by some filth they couldn’t deal with. It was hard looking at those ecstatic faces, seeing them push through the carefully selected razors she had ate before. ‘How could I forget about this? ‘Small and many in number, she had carefully devoured them in a prick. Nothing set itself, not to be brought back. There wasn’t any shame in it, regardless of what they had been informed off. Later, in the distance, in one of the homes from the many stacks of the villages that stood in their perishes, there was Julia and her daughter. She was supposed to work that night but for this sole reasons, her daughter being sick, was the decider for her staying in. Poor girl couldn’t swallow right. For now they could only focus on her good health, massaging her as hard as they could in orde to get her to eat away. 'Don't sweat it yet, Lisa, you'll survive. I know you will, it's only a matter of time until the doctor's about to come. 'Was he even on his way? Could there be a greater loss than that? It was difficult to know or to tremble at that.

No amount of power would allow one to submit to the desire of choking in one's sleep. Away, as far as say, he follow through with the appointment. Never missing, but not swayed away, a far closer look did reveal the pray. He stared for a few moments through the window, trying to convey the change of the expression, cast upon his face. Trembling by each side, it formed like the morning Kahn of the beast. Each side of his face threw on a single ripped piece that revealed what he held on. A few of the tongues were long and licking, in the various gaps in his face they produced, the strange ever-expanding vapors that were striped by the shows of light inside. Soon, as he opened and came through, never opening the door, he came to reveal the deepest and utmost lost desire to carry on with his disgusting turns. For each moment that came to him, what was seen by him would be nothing but an opportunity to strike away and eat some of what they couldn't take away from the table. 'Take the bread, the turkey, anything but fix my daughter. Don't allow my poor Lisa to die. Not like this. 'Not likely would he listen, yet from his back, he pulled the toolbox with every crammed cutter and opener, defining the various bone-extractions and the murder actions he could take. 'She needs a new liver, I see. ' 'Doctor, focus, don't open her up. Whatever you do, please remember that she's still young. But she had difficulty trying to swallow anything unless it's spoon-fed to her. ' 'Well, I should open her throat then. ' 'Aren't you going to at least do an initial examination. 'E-x-a-m-i-n-a-t-i-o-n. Coming right away, I'll tell you when it's done. For now, I want you to get out of the room. You know where the door is. I need quiet. 'It was not what she had intended on doing. Leaving her poor young bird alone with that doctor was something she couldn't forgive herself for doing. Just by the mere fact that he acted as if some screws were missing from the other half of his mind, there wasn't any saving from it. Perhaps he would cut too deep, or her daughter might end up missing for spending too much time in a place that wasn't like her kind. And where would her mother be? In the few seconds spent there, she could only think about the ways of foreboding. Never had she rode outside, on the pale and sick horses that waited out for no stable may keep him in for what he had in his kind. No horse-skull but a replacement that simply stood out there. For the same reason it tried outdoing itself by growing past the seven sins of torture would he reveal the nest growing inside of him, peeling at the wonderful curls it bore. Plain flat but lost around the corners it stood, never understood for the same reason that kept it going for no reason but to serve. As of plastic, but colored like an assortment of clothes, the delimitations came from a drawing which held a face falling forth. Concerned by what was going on, trashed by the desire gone, now coming under one of the lights, the concerned party said. 'This belongs to the doctor Ghyrgr. I say we should stay as far away from him as possible. 'The penalty for disobedience was grave. Likely put, it would add up to being stranded there, in a place where not a single cut would touch the skin or cut through the unattainable jolt of the on in question. Calmly so, the doctor performed his nightly woe, leading through one of the longest nights that ever was. It was a penalty that didn't bring, nothing but the least refrained, better than the lame, who came about the house as subtle as they could. First entry into the surgery. Note to the various incisions that opened it only to find the piece lodged inside, eating as her jaw, unable to give up into the toil. For obvious reasons, he couldn't just simply put her down like most of the patients because this wasn't a secluded place. It was a village and as he knew very damn well, word travelled way too fast for him to be able to keep up. And that he did, picking up a slighter hint of the immaterial intruder. It grew out of some rotten fruit, or so it seemed. A reflection of it, in the form of an apple red shade carapace still remained on top it again. For the others, this would be not even the closest thing to see happening. Lacking in finesse, he tried pulling out one of the many tails that spored in both directions. It wasn't going to be easy, not without risking alarming her from this pseudo-sleep. Despite being awake and slightly in pain, she had been in a state of freezing shock. Obvious pains aside, the culprit had dug up too deep inside of her. It wasn't likely that she could be saved by whatever means he could employ. Not only so, but danger would come forth, as it showed signs of searching for a new host. By the worming of the lances there, it would be much harder pulling up away if it decided this was the perfect opportunity to leap on him and start the entire process again. 'I won't make that mistake now. Not if I can end you as quickly as I can. 'Promises went unheard, for, as soon as he managed to reach with his blade, a case of cartilage encased it then. It was hardened but only lasted for a few seconds, which were needed for it to melt through the skin and fall through the bed, melting a hole for it to escape with everything in mind. Her spine, what had happened to her spine? This was a failure, as it ensued, she died immediately without feeling her end endured. 'What will I say to the ma'am now? 'It was a lost case. Case and point, this would have to be completely covered. If anyone in this world was to find out that I have failed to this state, I would be completely eaten, worse than her and her again. 'Sutures for the back, and the neck would be put back. Her heart was still beating but her mind was out of chalk. Well, for the other trick he had in mind, he would jolt her with enough power to bring her back in part. Though they were slightly attached to her brain, it wouldn't completely work out again, not to the same level as it had before. Manifesting fear as the primal result came to view. I shocked her again, until she knew who I were. 'You're the one who brought me back. 'That's what he imagined her say as soon as she returned to the land of the living. Instead of trying to sneer or to heed what was still new for him as well, she gave in the terminal, as soon as she saw it again. On a straight street, in the middle of the night, a lantern illuminated the road, leading to the megalopolis ahead in the twist of turns. What this surgery had achieved would be a permanent fixation there, where her feet would not feel cold. In the middle of the night, at the stop of a cab that waited to bring her back home. 'The usual place, ma'am? 'She nodded, as if most of these were actually instinctual. Second nature, even as they, were forcefully dictated. A cab driver, right? He seemed to play the role well, even lit her a cigar, as fast as she could tell. It was the first time in the city despite living in for years. At this scale, she was unsure of her parents' whereabouts, of the sole reason that they were out of time. Even the blurry night sky was decadent and old. Not a single gray circle this night, for what was worth. And to say that there were those who looked after her would be a lie. It was a night to die for, as the city came to life. 'Aren't they tall and grandious? I wish I could visit one of the last floors and live in there even if I couldn't afford it. 'I know that Lisa. You always mention that, every time we drive around the skyscrapers, you always mention of them. Perhaps it's the nostalgia since you were a child. 'She was known to everyone as the sweetest girl alive. It was a pity that the glum were there. As serfs without houses who were lost between the streets, their sight only brought the thought of troublemaking, nothing beats the crime of sin. It was impossible to think it so, but better to have known the reasonless approach. Never was there a glutton to know better or to throw back forth the pendulum in the square. If this place was just like every other city, what made it stand out was her friends who took her out. From the goodness of her heart, she greeted. 'Francis, how much you've changed. May I come in? 'From the parlor back into the royal place, another chance that got to her head, as she was greeted by them again. No confusion could do as far as it took entering the door. Misused by the precondition of frying, her undeniable gut wrench came back with her again. She show little of it to the others, yet could never understand, not even a clue. My throat was supposed to be hurting, not that. 'How's he my dear?' 'Fine, he's simply fine. Don't worry about him now. 'Not likely, could she be going back. Brought to a few knees that pushed onward, there was a dissilusion that pulled back. On track with all the maskings and the doing, she found herself alone again. Not one mentioned Lisa anymore and no one truly knew her. As long as there would be someone feigning interest, she could have another drink. 'You shouldn't drink in your condition. ' 'I think I know what I am doing here, thank you very much. 'Her sight was moved by his great apparement, but never got as far as to see. What else was there if not that multiple lacquors that mixed with decades old burnt pieces, mixing almost in a pouring stream that covered everything from the floors, their bodies, even her. It was green, for rotten fruits and plenty of other damp hues that moved and covere deverything, in this origiastic event. Filth of the worst kind, while the shrimps would fly in and swim about the pollution in the floor. Yet she wanted more. Despite the complete rejection of her place, she yeared for his approval and those of the wallowing whores he had invited in. As displeasing as it seemed, she still wanted him to pick her on a whim. The thinness of cobalt came out, as another plunging was about to happen. They gathered thinking it was only part of the show, until realising that blood wasn't part of the piece. It was magnificent how the world outside looked as if it had the same lacquor, only from where she stood and waited form, alas. Quietly she sipped from her drink, unable to think. 'Francis, when was the las ttime we spoke? Just the two of us, I mean. When was the last time we had an actual conversation? 'He had never been the type to be a womanizer, hence it seemed that her curiosity and jealousy didn't come from within. Instead, it came to her that some kind of feelings were underserved. She came there for him, as rudely as it seemed, it was none of her concern that came to him. For what happened was a part of his wish. While the others might be troubled by what they saw happening during the night. Despite the celebration being somewhat broken and no one knowing what might happen next, Lisa was contempt with it. Not to give in too much of what she felt, as she kept it to herself. Never to betray her feeling again, not in the terms, never to have known what happened or how worse it had to be. It was an invasion of privacy, being taken from the scene. 'We need you to stay away from that until the investigation can proceed. 'Such strange admireres spoke. With their highly placed traits, looking down from stranded pelt-like bulks that pushed from just about every side of their necks until they revealed their nests swollen in their chests. Would they even stretch like they had before, pushing their long necks out of the gore that twisted. Like a butcher's circle in the middle, spike-like that erupted with the many thin receivers, they spoke with the insects they had brought, who hid beneath the floors, in wait. For an opening so they might take the one away. Through proper digesion, the insects would rule out any other lead. But she knew this wasn't the case entirely. While everyone was busy ruling this night as a chaotic end, from which they couldn't even get up from again, she saw the opportunity to approach Francis. 'It's going to be a loneyl night, isn't it? Care to join me over the balchony? Would you like to admire the city lights? 'It was an offer he couldn't refuse. Clearly affected by it, he was no recluse. Instead, he joined after a few steps, grabbing a drink for him and for her. 'Lisa, what am I to do now? I think I'm ruined now. They won't stop talking about what heppened on this cruel side of July. 'Even marked on the calendars, without which, they'd still see. Or know, remember, somehow be shocked of what happened before the intervention came. Those who'd ask questions one day would surely ask them once again. And none one else but him had been in the highest of pains . Other than her. Where they left, she stayed, as prideful and competent as she prized herself again. ‘Poor Francis, now that the fire’s set and done, will you not allow me to join you? I know it’s hard and sudden but you cannot be left alone, take this offer, please and don’t make me miss you more than I should. ‘ ‘You don’t mean that, I know it. Perhaps I ought to move out. ‘ ‘So be it then. I wouldn’t want to live in a cursed place like this either. But take me with you, wherever you might go. Don’t abandon me for the worst side humanity has to offer. Don’t let this end up being the last memory of us. ‘She drew on breathless afterwards, feeling content about what she’s done. In the following days his large apartment had been sold, as were his friends, to the highest bidder, a new-comer from the north. It was fitting that there’d be one to replace him so soon. Wherever he had been, one could draw no conclusion sooner about what life had been during the moonsoon. Of the following days. There were the few construction areas placed and the whole state of affairs which were called into question with the opposing nation. No conviction but the admiration that inhabited her heart appeared to be lost at touch. For better days weren’t coming soon, as the dweller came into the view, a vigilant strike upon his dwelling. Burning in the heap, there wasn’t any telling whether or not he had survived. What had happened to the corner where even the city scrapers started sinking into the piece, an empty sink suddenly released the rest of his motionless appearance. It was struck by the power and the glory he had basked in, over the clearness of the demi-boxes. In them he managed to survive the fire, as they were filled with water bottles taken from the Empire. Poisoned yet benign, the bubbles forming turned him away just for a second as they felt each other. Melting cardboard and plastic into that hole, leaving him exposed to the strangeness of woe. Looking above he’d see only the sight of a well which dwindled as he couldn’t even be, anything but an escapee. He desired to go out, seeing not the streets but the endless skyscrapers that rounded themselves for the climbing. Many apartments lit from the sightings. ‘I’m here, I survived. Let me come and join me, I want nothing more but to join the run. ‘They weren’t going to allow him to be heard, never to be called again. He was rather inept in the arts of the bitterness. With each piece or rock that fell, he saw only a part of the outside pour in as well. Waiting could somehow allow him to rise himself from the group, up into one of the open doors or windows, whatever one might be able to dwell upon. Not only had he not given up, but climbing brought something up. From the soles of his feet, the liquor of cardboard and plastic water seemed to grasp for him, looking for a way out as well. Essence of disease could tell that it was time for them to throw the bodies of the cats, the dogs and rats as well. All of which had been simply abandoned from most of the windows, regardless of the floors, without shame or contempt for what was going on. Soon his hole would become a boiler, raising in head. Some of the ones that were thrown, the men and the women that leaped had been alive, yet not for long, as nothing could be suffered to be brought back. ‘This chemical composition cannot be allowed to survive. ‘From it a solid figure as that of a pointy ivory iceberg came out. Make out of their entirety, speaking with all of their voices as he was brought around it. Kashmir looked out of place. Unable to race what was helping him rise from the depths, he held as tightly as he could, unable to direct the voices of the animals away. Most were blended and all could tell now and see, from just about everywhere in the city that the four melting skyscrapers had been assailed. By the peaks of that which raised, only the worst pagans and heathens remained. Most of the people left their rooms, abandoning them as they fled for their lives. From utmost nowhere the heathens came, bring in the liquor with them, as it had been decided that the general first ritual had been a success. The man who had been named Fancis would have his name ridden in the book of digress. Now to the cipher that had come, from the four rejected buildings, the floors being directed back, as they would be given life in the most deranged activity. Less than the breaking of reality, it was, only the most disturbing case of unsettling remarks. What was been feigned would never be seen again. Only the tumours anchors threw themselves against the pillaring large suite-like derranged forms that emerged again, never calling forth for the exhausting girth given by the filth. Tiny adorning masses that resembled some pond, shrunken yet showing sings of more than a few toothless broths. Each of their sides appeared to bear some hairy tar-like spilling shrimping boils, patches of skin-like diseased clots that stared spreading. Airborn, but never going as much as to infest the living, they instead trapped the carpets, turning them into cross-like reachers that entailed some of the heathens inside of them. From there, in their tiny forming forts they'd pray. Unable to be hurt as those strange tents restored any kind of pain and woe. Never would they be completely distinguishable from their territory as much as it would be known. Less than the pristine lack of sanity there, a kind of wicked burst of reality came. From the ajdacent planes where they had dwelled, more likely to be akin to themselves, those that appeared shared some resemblance to the one that broke them free at last. Kashmir could only wonder at his marvelous creation. He was there, where he needed to be, in a place where he was somewhat never to be trapped as long as he could see a way out. Despite the distraction and the lack of action which would be alone. Brought to the pain that his hands was holding on, he relised that he was stuck. Struck even by it, unable to release, he chose to stay. What would I eat, how could I even convey hunger? ' As if heard, at last, a piercing strike in his gut from the pointer brought the sustenance he had desired. No longer would he rever to hunger in the name of the Empire. It was obvious that most of those below. From the streets or from the rows weren't themselves. Rather, so many victims had looked confused, struck between two worlds, unable to understand what could this chaos bring them. IF only they understood what was going on. 'There's a man stuck out there. ' 'Others will join him. 'The cause of which couldn't be understood at all. As a matter of fact, the fact that no one might be held abashed couldn't do anything but wait. A bitterless hope could never refrain from bashing, crashing into a full stop. What had been brought about was that exchange. It wasn't likely that he would remain there for long. 'I need a way out. I cannot be a part of this. ' 'You are now and stop complaining. You were the one who had given us birth, father. ' The hairs of his chest shook. He had never been as frightened as he had been caught by the hook. As the helicopters turned with their scanners, nothing could be hindered farther than one ought to know. Skyscrapers wouldn't bode well any longer as they became the pylomaters of woe. It was them which kept the pointer going, living and thriving to the point where the city couldn't have matterd to them. Millions of lives wouldn't even be spared. This, again, would be the final despair, the show of exusperance as the many heathens were given the protection. First the rockets came, with their blasting waves of fire and radiation, followed by the nuclear diseased, completely absorbed by them, in the watch of the bitter pleasing order. 'How did I survive? ' 'You're a part of us Kashmir, never forget that. 'His heart was beating but the pounding was incomplete. Not only was he cheated from death but he had wanted to try foregoing in again. By that, it was meant, that whatever he could do, whatever he might do and what he ended up doing resulted in another death. From somewhere out there, given way to enter from the strike, going about the message coming out of time. 'What is this I see? 'A few words had crawled again, carried on by the nuclear prism which melted against him, the iceberg and the ajdacent buildings. Even those who worshipped the placed had seen, that in the reality out of time, they could rule forever, undisturbed by the wickedness that had been sublime. The only thing needed was for them to bask into rivers of nuclear explosions, as only then would they be safe. Saved by the admission of power, no longer would they be towered upon or forced to flee. Most of the expenses be counted out as humanity hit the point of rebound. 'If we are to escape now, there's only one chance for it. We need to feign our destruction and sink deeper each time a nuclear bomb gets released on top of us. 'So they said, never truly dead. In as much of a way as it could be allowed, strike after strike, to the likes' delight, they had done so. Tricking and using the might of humanity's humble original of striking one before he fell. With blunt weapons only radiation could tell that it had been pronounced. After a few million bombs had been released, the whole symbiotic structure had been pleased of being drawn to the place. In that reality where nothing would fall away. But woe, as it simply disappeared, when it neared the supreme act of going its way, the few remaining nuclear bombs fell on the city and a dully desecrating reality could be conveyed. For the worst that followed after came to be, only inside the watchful knowing that wouldn't be seen, the screams died, the petty and the good. Brooding there, would be nothing but the shockwaves that followed through. Complete devastation emerged into a cloud, from it, there seemed to be an irradiated king at last. Slowly dissipating as none of his servants were there to bring praise.

Most of them being dead meant that none of them would be seen or looked after again. It would be in the short amount of time that in the storage out of time and out of reality where their kinds were meeting for a few. Nano-seconds would go through and through. In them, the kind of radiation clouds, the one of steam, the one smoke and smoldering remains, even the one of corpse dust and the one covered in the universe of red, one in white and one of shattered crystal dust as well as others who couldn't be counted. All of them discarded their existences long ago. But they would dwell here momentarily before being summoned again to attend the various events of the realities waiting ahead. A prodigy in less than achieved destruction, one of the most audible, louded voices that brought in reactions was that of the displeasing jest. Caused by the taking of a lost artifact from an imploding mechanism needed to break the standing barrier of glass. Between the delightful enclave, where they looked upon the distance where villa had exploded and the likes were bitterly worded, there had been a single way out. Brought about during the betterment of the troops, they had sunken as low as to hear what was being said in the booth. Struck by hidden chambers, in a hole inside the colossal fallen church bell they hid, this inverted hideout they sunken it seemed to bear the quiet within a monastery than within it. 'Well, I think this is a failure, wouldn't you say so?' 'For what?' 'I have prayed to one of my Gods and he hasn't answered me yet. ' 'Had he in any day?' 'Asked Ltksse, in his youngers days, even today he felt like asking it again. For what was being brought. Inside the walls, where the melting of bronze had brought the invaive protectors, plunderers working with the help of cogs, no one could even add to the quiet or realise what had been going on. It was the ruckus which happened outside. Another island fell in some place. 'Again now?' 'Not exactly, this is different. I'd say that this time, the reverse happened. Usually pieces of the land would be taken away for some reason. I suppose whoever had done it thought about giving back some of the things he had taken before. 'This sounded somewhat like what could be happening. Aerials out there, striking at them from afar. Hear their winds and realise that they cannot even feel the sting of the bitter degree. An unsormountable amount of sleigh, the hits of which fell upon the mountain's lay, from the beds of ice, where the remanants of the Tyrants remained. Lice had strangled them to death, revealing the necrosis-den in which they hid.

It was completely sealed as to never bring back any of the weird contenders at a life such as theirs. Better to recount the fact that elsewhere, there was the feel. No appeal to what returned. To one man by the name of Barnacle, life couldn't have been worse. Awakened by the fact of the matter, that those psychotic images in the distance didn't matter, he had come to see them for what they were. The Duke as he had looked, rather stricken like a shot of a projection grayed out. Nor would he realise that he wasn't there, as much as he wouldn't know. The fact that he wasn't there, to begin with the rows of androids he had called under his supreme control. For them, it didn't actually matter, as much as they would carry his order. Despite not being touched, it had been known and wildly accepted, as to throw the musk of bitter degrees. Feeling unsafe for what would be less than the passing years. Fright couldn't even bring the delight of evil that scourged on. A man had carried through. Gordo Di'Dorko's viel hue could mean the less. Leisurely caught with himself off guard by a row of rounded-bodies long Troglodytes that were largely exposed. From each feature there pushed the corner of a large sphere, a cone and one deceiving amount of spreading cords. They begged for cannibalism, yet neither of them would attempt to devour each out, leaving alone. Not for the slightest hint of pain did they bring back the pain. It was obvious that they envied everyone who wasn't like them. Luckily for piety, none would suffer ever after it was set and done. 'What will happen now?' Gordo asked, as soon as he had been about to touch it with the least of a hint that he had a working idea what might happen again. Yet neither of them could touch him by the mere pantry of their own. What came over the empty gaps in that lost place were the almost static, spectre-like recreation of his home. Where the sea had been, there would be nothing but the aftermath of an avalanche spreading nought. It would bring no tear and no fear of what was coming along. Twist of the deranged, he realised that he wasn't there, nor would he return again. 'I must excuse my absence, but I need to see my father. He's important to me, you know? And I couldn't forgive myself if I hadn't said some things I wanted him to know. 'To him, it looked so real. Struck between the two worlds, yet unable to understand this appeal or what was going on for no other reason. It was a heart shaken that searched for his old man. Going by the estate, yet never being able to hear his call again. 'I realise now, what I came about to do. 'For a second he stopped. In a full realisation, he could almost see two servants jumping in the distance, far between the broken buildings and the distant showers of acid being there for an unsuspecting reason. It was harsh, trying to remember what he had left behind. A son, of his, a grandson for his father, one who'd grow up all alone. Lost even from the head on. Yet that didn't bother him as much, for the same reason he was in search, at last, past the open door. And through the halls he wouldn't get to see anymore, he found his way back, no longer waiting for something that wouldn't come. With each step, it grew up higher, the thing being. He wasn't there, he wasn't anywhere to begin with. It wasn't likely that he would accept it, yet he sunk to his knees, unable, at last, to understand what was going on. He sat there by the hours. Unable to think of what the cowards had done to him, to send him there, just anywhere, ending up alone. Gordo tried, as he burst our back, past the gates of Siciliy and into the square of where the town would've been. No one there either, no one within his reach. His comfort would not only be slightly denied, but it would be catastrophically buried and set aside. For him no one waited, but them, the creatures he could never touch again. It was farther away that the Duke had been greeted by the same fate as he had. Looking back on a broken kingdom that brought him some great insignificant moments, that he had known. Never to be released from this thing which poured between the rows of steel and dirt. Rightfully lost as the flood at last, meaningless as it was abandoned by the ones that asked of it in the first place. How many would still try fighting against the currents there? Had it truly stopped or would they be plain anywhere? Some were drunks and others wasted, some were never to be touched as their waist laced through the ones. Many in their throngs and the loss of the Movers only now coming at a loss. 'We need to carry on with the plan. If we can break free of this place, we may find a way to fully reconstruct the world from this chaos. 'Uniform Kvat was the one who suggested one at last. In the central system, where they had formed the council, the first signs of the chaos had been rightfully set down. It would be so much harder to understand just what was going on, if it weren't for the clue. One who whispered through. 'As I said, we need to instruct you in the construction of a bridge. If you managed to open the way into that real, with the proper measures taken around the rims of the ground, every piece of the bunker may be taken back. 'Or else, think of what might happen if there's a recourse and a breaking point. Never should you forget that it was us who hinted at it before we had ever been known. ' 'Shall we begin it then? ' 'Start with the monitors and show the images if you'll kindly. 'Doing so was dangerously plain. Not to talk of it again, but they were showing certain changes around the tactile platforms around the living areas that didn't bode well with anyone there. Starting with the fact that the population tripped in that short of time, the streets would simply be caught and brought back to an understanding that didn't make any sense at all, a conclusion came. 'Someone's bringing them here. It cannot be explained otherwise. ' 'What of the mass movements from the other hideouts? Or the population documented above of us? ' 'Negative, their numbers hadn't shown any significant changes. And age can help to exclude most of the other cases as well. ' 'It might be something worth investigating then. ' 'Dispatch someone trustful and so be it. 'Before that, they had to acknowledge the rotation being complete. Some of the workers in the spheres were peering again into that plane. Every time they did so, a strange activity known as the intertransilation of the patches holding the worlds together settled down. Never to be broken yet dispersed as if they pushed and threw everything about the place. Mostly at the bottom of some raving, just in that moment, a partially formed upper torso with everything coming out of the neck being expressed in the arms and into some long lost, unattached vestigial tail that spread about the place created the perfect cover. No one was there to know about who it were, the dark haired, multi thought living creation of despair started cradling the darkest creations of its mind. Just as it had done before, infesting the lower areas where the low-lives shook their arms. It was this Zone, where the wings said "Cool-Born. ", signalling the entry, the sides being off the entrance. Forbidden authority, but no revelation came to the fact that they had become mildly addicted to the poison they shot in their arms. From the foaming faces to the sulken skin and the ones that broke in the stores, there wasn't anything more decrepit than what was going on. A cause for this mistake had been that fact that some of them couldn't see it happening again. All in front of their eyes, strangers selling their wares only to swindle the broken. Head-strong but locked inside walking cages, it was obvious that there were no faces that expressed the mess going on in their dens.

A priemeval mistake was the consideration that some of them would try making pacts with the halting glattors. Sitting composed, from a body which had worsened over the age, without even a neck, stood the head of an animal of their choice, or mutiple rats that were completely sealed off from getting away. Somewhat alive, if one could even consider what they were like, they had their hands replaced as well. In case it couldn't be told away. From fear, they had placed tiny sparking electrical boots for the static would turn them into living. These Glattors would be placed near the Automota dispensers, attached with a hose and finally given forth some mechanical, futuristic voice.

Mostly, as it was an imitation, it could only recall messages from old commercials that never seemed to grow old at all. Except the fact that their town had been completely taken over by them, and no one could handle them. Not since it had been taken out of control, until the very moment where one ought to admit, that they were sinking far too deep into depravity. Viril breeds of rat-feeders came out into the dampness of a road that wasn't even rightly placed along the buildings. Instead they went around and never came to give as much as it would be brought back. Given in return, one would have to mourn for the exchange of a yellowish-shiver, whatever that had been, extracted from the giant contraptions of the living which accumulated over the north pole. Standing eighteen feet above the ranks, it had managed to attract some organisms that enjoyed stacking together. As nasty as they were, various tender-crosses with their hoods off, disased, about the same as the rest of the population were accountable for taking them out and making sure that everyone dispenser would be satisfied. Otherwise, the one calling the shots there would call it off, and no longer could they have their fun. Whatever that meant, for everyone there felt as if they were taking for knucklehead. 'Stop it already, I cannot see anything happening around the great crown of the headless horses and their many eyed riders. They'll march upon the plains and take it all away. 'It was the shout of the Lord of Broken diseases. He who hadn't looked out of his world, who had been denied any kind of pleasure by the other lords had found a place. Not to look away and disturb the others. But he couldn't even account for the missing places from the lost Citadel he descended from. In the many days he took it upon himself to reach the highest point, he merely realise that there wasn't any way back. Sadness reigned, but better to convey no emotion, just the wonderment of the loose plains. The others hadn't seen it yet but he had. Brought upon their dark mantles, the many eyed knights would bring on a haste simply in the middle of the field. To them, nothing could be lost, as much as their desire to pretend they were in the right. Bringing in the first with their tormentors, who had lain in captivity, they would start digging the tight cages in which they'd be locked. It wasn't easy, not could they be displeased. What they refused to sing as far as he could be asked within the few, passing amongst those who needed to fall through one of the exits, he was there. In as much as twenty loss dangerous woes, there would be nothing more waiting for him forth. Instead, what played around his neck were a few teeth that spread about. Unable to control themselves, they seeked a way in, deeper within, in order to inject him with a toxin that may not be cured. It was somehow strange that the bitter wedge between them could be lost. Accosted by the meaninglessness of the porter, he had decided to sail away. 'There's only room for only one more to come. The destination can't be spoken off, nor would it be lost. If you embark on this journey with you, what might find you is the last vestige of the kind, which brought us blindly to no piece of mind. 'A sad man spoke as well. Judging by the look on his face he was lost as well as fallen through the various surmounting strays of scurvey. Eating at his face, the others had seen it as well, was the only thing they could see in him. Lust for the strange lovers. Portrayed by some derange activity, that in itself seemed to strange of the sky at the point where the horizon would soo die. 'I will join you then. 'As if it was his choice. Again, set on a mission by his broken will, he had observed the fact that the ship had no sails as it was empty on the higher lever, never touched again. Powerless to returned, he followed them down, only to mourn his entry there as well. Repairmen were trying to create a device which may save them from the demise that had been eating away. But it was filth, as disgusting as a spot could be. Not only that, but one couldn't even look and see what was going through them. No, it wall went wrong, not a single man was strog enough to face the waves. They didn't act that way. Less than likely, it couldn't be started. Despite the wicked amount of time put into the destruction of the circumference of the Trakor, their celestial embrace held no race at the quiet scape as it was slowly being unwrapped. All the planets in the universe did so, only to tie one another, forming but a single bridge. In it there was that, an imitation that didn't even brought the like back to the grinding of the cannons. Brought back to the bitterly voids that were given birth from the mess underneath the cores that melted, the stars welded into the mix. From there, a cruel miss, and a strike generated the complete finality of Ghub. In Ghub the beings had been refilled. From within their peerless steamed whipped connectors, that sprouted out of their eyes, all went ahead and started inflating until they had been as thick as stalks. Slacking in the kind of exposed new prodigies they would give birth to, they had knelt. No longer would they be allowed to fight, instead they'd be allowed to serve, nothing as breeders for the dominators that came forth. Less than the quiet, after the weeping whining of the sprace food, that would be found ahead. So and they started cutting pieces of their bitter headings. In search for better ways, they forced themselves to evolve past this world that couldn't convey. What the matter would have been, as for pacing in the holes between the Terork branches, as they filled the gaps, in this disquieting expansion that removed their primal skeletal stance, so had they come on top. Brought back into the utmost majestic trance, they would breathe with boiling soups they promoted in the other guts. Of those that floated, the trunks that manifested out of the evolving cortexes, which had overtaken a good part of their arms. So had they spared the others, showing that the extra limbs hadn't disappeared in the past, for the better part, having sunken in. For the same reason would they be attached to a greater part crawling and spitting as they would reattach whatever other limb they might. Brought to their delight, they formed, in the airborne areas, whereas they could be brought back home. Giant tunnels which came out of nowhere, made out of the silken soup they had spilled beneath the filthy grim producers which had been attached. Mostly to the mass of their heads, drawing forward as to latch upon a way out. Soon none may stop their dire ascent.

Not to be too clear of what would be said. They manifested there, as the bodies were pulled like pieces of soft metals, thin and easy to pick to a citizen like a magnetic trip that would bring them together. Yet to form, the embodiment and size which was needed to welcome him forth. As the many citizens started melding into it, the general alarm had tainted the trust of the population that fled upon seeing it happen in front of their eyes. Not only would it not be dangerous, but it wouldn't even be acceptable any more. What had been taken from, to the masters in control was this. 'We give up, simply, I cannot see a way out. ' 'Stop it already. 'The direness of the voice said. So much agony yet no one wanted to come forth and slow things down. Not only would it be dangerous but the loss of control couldn't be feigned either, regardless of what was said about. For the better part of the day, it went well. Not to tell anything of the harm as well as that louth. But the clouds of the uncanny touches, brought nothing short of the lost caskets. Whichever be the cause. This madness had to stop. 'Foreman, we need you to focus. Perhaps it would be better if you closed your eyes for a moment, not to give in too much to what you're seeing here, but I think there's something bad happening inside your mind. You may not want to speak to us, but whatever you saw in that death mask shook you off beyond relief. 'It was obvious that there wasn't any need to take it out. With everything said and lost, the will faded, never to have made it again. A loss would bring us no satisfaction. Keep yourself together. ' 'I will, I am well, perhaps I'm slightly affected by something, I couldn't help it, that's all. Perhaps I still can't help it but focus on everything going on. There are far too many. 'Too many close calls he wanted to say. A defensive position had been taken as soon as it would be safe to turn around. Otherwise, it was a false alarm. But on a closer know, what brought him to close to leaping over into the basin had been the terror of witnessing everything. His constant exposure, as he hadn't the lids needed to close his eyes, to the world around him brought nothing short of misery for the roses. He saw so many things there, stacked over the pack which followed. A few hindrants came forth, all bearing fur coats which masked the skinless contraption-charged in the back. Where every internal organ had been struck, there was the chance for an organic explosion to occur. Nothing could stop or prevent the mere charge, against which none may know what's worth. Not to be taken as someone foul, they sent another cadet forth.

'Cryt, you ought to get closer and see to it that you'll be lost. 'Inside the charge there would be none the better interested to know. How much could they be pushed, especially since they bore no talkin mechanism, no way of beating, other than metal strings for feet and the main derelict that would spread ahead. Other than those luckless wonderings, he would set himself forth. As a diplomat who couldn't hope to draw away, not to say there's something to be conveyed. Yet for the way out, brought about them would be. A missionary approach with a scoll it had carried inside of the living bomb. After pacing around in the farthest area in front of the Cryt, the others from the pack backed away growling and on the prowl. So had the foremen retreated for a few steps in the expectation of the some attack to go ahead. 'Will it try gnawing at him?' 'I do not know, we should wait for a few seconds and see what happens. Perhaps it would be better this wait, but keep quiet and let him proceed doing whatever he has to. 'IT would be dangerous to emitt as much as another scent. Not to show any sign of weakness as long as they could show the sweat. Seated in different spots, they wrought themselves over, watching something they didn't expect to happen. Everyone expected for that beast to leap and gnaw. Instead, what happened from afar was, after the pacing had been brought to a stop, suddenly it spat out a single pile of some green pastel. Rounded around it, a mourning kind of mouth shot forward, but no more than a few milimeters, a few strands that carried with the sounds.

'Intruders, you've come to our territory, be gone. 'The object in question, the long strand, which would be more like a string than anything else, still attached to its face, a batch which refused to go away. Not only that, but it couldn't be brought back to the attention. Directions could change, but he was trying his best not to refrain from using an extra ability it hid underneath its sleeves. 'We didn't mean to intrude by our exploration. We're workers. ' 'We know. Spotted you, plenty of times, from every place that was known. 'To the others, as they heard it well, they began pacing as well, in preparation to throw up the same thing as their companion had. General area contaminated. It couldn't be called yet, as in practice, the dirt had been completely accosted by it. Lost within the grinning masks, nothing could go ahead nad last more than it should. Would there be another dead?In the coffin, below where one man and one alone escape? Where he had walked, on the stones between the striking river, there were the holes. 'What have they done to you? 'He felt the scent of decay and realised some of the faces and the features which they had conveyed. It was peaceful and quiet, bitterly so. Despite barely even being able to crawl from the broken legs, he couldn't hope to turn around and fight yet. For obors came to him them. It would be senseless trying anything, as he tried picking some of them up. It was pointless, for some reason they couldn't succumb to his strength. Not only would he not be allowed to do anything else, but this had been a vastly underestimated mistake that had no place in there. Nor anywhere as a matter of fact, as they were never to be brought to justice, wherever the Foreman hid. 'I will have my vengeance. 'Yet he promised. Resting on his broken feet, as one who couldn't help it but try fighting the perils showing themselves around him. He thought of them as manifestations of the souls lost to them. But in reality, what he had experienced, from the very shaking ground to the sudden ripples in the water was the result of the ingeniously working machine. Hole-filling had been the habit, though he couldn't even think of the way that made him want to take his life anyway. Envious though he might be, there wasn't any way to see. Just what was going around him, plunging into the abyss as it folded the space between them at last. Drew near to them from the casks, emptying the gulf survivor, there drew another fighter. For what was worth, as he came forth, he wore some deranged speaks on each of his shoulder, broken at the liver. Growing from his inside his chest, a disturbed looking piece would mesh itself into a single firearm. 'Carry this with your outside. I have faith in you, make sure the same will be said. 'As though he had been silence, he decided to turn. 'It will be much more painful when I'll begin attaching it to you again. Put this piece in your mouth and try not giving too much sound after being painfully let down. 'He nodded in an obtrusive manner. He wasn't actually set on this, but as soon as he had found a pleasing entry, he ripped the entire lower leg from the joint. Ready to catch the blood that sunk forth. After that, my consciousness was lost. From the extreme shock, I would be left untold. To regain instead another consciousness which happened to be out there again. 'Suited with this, I will be able to bring the deluge back into the action. ' 'Don't worry about it now, we'll find a better way to switch them before they can realise what's been going on. 'For the same reason it had been picked, from the deposit, at his feet lay one the last extractors. Pushing in through one of them, the loss of function would soon be lead to a quick stop. Brought about the clicking as it brought no knowledge, what was going on? In the same room they were standing, four men had woken up. By their beards and their looks, these were old, unable to understand what was going to happen as soon as they could be turned around. Proudly looking to step away from the various tables in which they stood, picking up some of the instructions they had stored inside. 'Greetings, I am Michelle. ' 'I'm Pourie. Where is she, where's she? What do you call it? 'He appeared to be at a loss. 'Retrace your steps in that case, I'm sure you'll remember it if you could only push on ahead and recreate the whole circumstances in which it was lost. ' 'Of course, of course, great idea from you good man. 'He would do it. As ridiculous as it was, this wasn't the place nor the time. Yet each time he attempted to pass, the mast would throw him off his feet. Clearly something was missing in the worst possible way. He couldn't just simply get out of it before seeing it come where he lay. 'I was almost struck by one of them. ' 'The ports? ' 'No, the cars, in the middle of the round. I ended up stranded there, unable to see where I'd be going and then. ' 'Then what happened, Pourie? 'The other two were not entirely struck, yet they were out. Just the vague silhouettes remained, after being struck by some painful blows that couldn't be conveyed by the dire situation that would please. No one should appease the masses, not in the soles of the fate. Yet at this rate, they wouldn't be able to save a man, a single man from falling away into depression. That would be more harmful than the direction in which Pourie ran. 'Straight towards one of the cars, my plan was this so far. As I had initially conceived it, I would simply charge it and leap over it, rolling over onto the nearest streets. Therefore securing my life and never being able to die. ' 'How could you possibly avoid death in that case? ' 'Dear awakened Michelle, I'd say it worked so far. Unless this is the afterlife we're in. But I couldn't count on it in any case. Instead, know that with each moment I had been wrapped in the air, a few of my ages went away. I would grow younger from the birth given by the momentum and the way in which I would be circled in. ' 'How? 'He shook his nose but knew too well. Something about the air pollution which had come from the radiation field had given him the best treatment he could be given in. His body had not only lost a few years as well, but it appeared that his bones started grinning into younger, far more worthless scum-tractions.

Inside of them, not only blood would be created but some kind of postulance which turned to greenish-gray. In it, iron deposits would make the smallest tunnels where blood-fish spanned. Lifetimes of being trapped in there turned them rabid and then, he woke up there. A theory to it, as much as they had been simply enclosed in there for far too long, there was nothing but the time they could spend, admiring one another, as far as they might lend themselves their secrets and what they hid. 'What's that in your pocket now?' 'There's nothing in it, why are you asking?' He was trying to make up for a loss. In his pocket, he had only the picture of a woman ten years younger than he had been in his prime and at the price taking some of it away. He couldn't convey just what happened there. 'Do you want some of my life essence? It will make you feel better.' 'Why would I want that?' 'Because it tastes like sardines, I tried it. It should give you the strength to keep going on. We should look for a way out that way.' 'I don't know Pourie. I'm not feeling confident enough to try getting away.' 'Do you think I care about it? No, of course not, open your mouth I said. 'It didn't take long for him to open himself up around the eye. He fed me some of his blood, and I could feel some energy pump back. Damn him. But he had been right about it. For thing reason, I couldn't even force myself to doubt what him or his saying. 'How did it taste?' 'A bit too much mercury in my mix.

'That face expression didn't give in too much information about itself. From a combination for sheer pain or struggling rage, he gave just enough that I would know what was coming my way. 'I will you make you an offer now. Don't take it yet, but I'll give you a chance to set everything the way they were. Follow this way. 'He was sure they could make it. As soon as the door opened, he saw where they were. A steering wheel and the closed ways out, hanging near pin-proof windows that held about the vision, of nowhere. Desolate, lost, the ruins of some field of grassy sand which snared out of the way, for the magmatic stones growing everywhere. 'I think we found ourselves a winner. If we take the right way out, we should be home around for dinner. 'Where are we going then? 'Michelle was still struck by him. Without the diligence he had displayed, there wasn't any way to look outside. At what had been shown to be a sign of despair. Wondering at the image in the distance, both peered. Before they could even twist and press near it, they spoke. 'Is that real?' 'How should I know?' From the moldering top of white-infested almost web-encased peculiar patch of soil, some green leafless, yet leaved, filled, made out of one piece palmiers sprouted, as their yellow heads popped out. From the main stone talons that help them in the rows, only the most peculiar image of the plains could be drawn on. There was life after all. 'Perhaps we could even inquire some help if we try it. 'Don't count our blessings yet, my friend. Unless you want to lose again, this sprouting lot we can't defend might be lost again. 'Pourie counted every kind of appliance there. He had to know something of all the buttons, broken keys. 'Are the doors locked here? 'Could they get out? Before asking, he appeared to have found an answer. It was pointless being out there, as the distant venues had been lost, unfairly contracted from the falling distances, eyes would be deceiving. Exposed to the arid sun would only change their sight into the most ludicrous amount of calls. 'We need to find a way to go. 'Where?' 'I see something out there, a facility, I think that's being abandoned. 'Come back in, Michelle, come back in now!' Before shouting, he had almost been brought back to his knees, unable to decide what was happening with the lack of air, the thing which was never couldn't be heat alone. It was a matter of trying to swim in dirt as it was hardening. He had sunken underneath the moving sand, only to come out wearing a suit of the most peculiar manner. Purple and made out of two giant wings, he wore a band around his head which gave way for him to see the vehicle and what it had conveyed. His suit was of the same kind, as the vehicle they were about. Not only that, but Pourie hadn't realised it yet, but there wasn't any wheel inside.

Charmed by the fact, he was actually working with the inside of the beast they were controlling. It would be too heavy and hard in the back to achieve flight. Patterns emerged both on the wings and on it as soon as it felt danger.

A few strangers threatened to come from the distance. Somewhat precious to consider this, he could hardly have missed what was going on. Most of them were lost souls, cowed and seemingly unable to differentiate between their own and the dead ones they were carrying inside their nets. Some of their captives slowly tried getting away. Even though there would be no escaping, as the struggle was in vain. 'Now will you please just listen to me? I see something out there. You don't want to open your eyes, but I see it now. We have to make it for it before it moves away. 'From the large cylinder which was attached to the main buildings, there was also a rocking wheel, and a peculiar flat dome which pushed out of it. Constantly working without the slightest hints of an interruption, the various worm-like ringed legs pushed on with the great blanket of sand being thrown away. Farther than the quiet called for, he had decided it would be fair. 'Since I cannot start this vehicle now, I suppose I'll have to listen to you. Go on and say what you have to. Do your piece. 'As from a consort, trusted like a false assistant, he had crawled back in, but not entirely inside. To the strange confined hole on his left, he saw the two men still being taken care of despite their clearly missing sides. Not to stand for too long and abide the rules, what could be felt around were his tools.

'Will you please join me in the sand? Everything will be much clearer then and you'll see what I see. ' 'And what do you see exactly? The only thing you got from there is your fashionable suit. But other than that, don't misunderstand me now, but I think you should get back to your senses. ' 'I can see that there's no sand. It's only dust left by the fleeing device, nothing more. Don't you think we should at least look into it while we're here? ' 'It's a mirage I told you, but now you got me quite intrigued. What else can you see Michelle? This psychosis of yours might end up being interesting if mastered. ' 'An inversion between the emerald sea and the sky, from as far as it goes, no matter where the wind blows, clouds of jade and bitter stars of green as they emerge from the coming of the night. ' 'But it's the middle of the day, we're nowhere near the time the sun would come down. Settle down on something, will you? 'I could go on much farther, trying to explain of the thoroughness in which everything was placed. Or the giant stag-beetle like device we could fashion ourselves alive as we drove on. But I hadn't the slightest clue whether or not I should. From the tendons pushing on, as far as they could carry on the reappropriated organs that displeased the mass, he was trying to move on and pull him in. 'Come in the sand and you'll see what I'm talking about. Have some faith and everything will be clear afterwards. 'Reluctance had been shown, admirable as it was, he didn't want to come in. 'I couldn't suffer a change. But if you want to hop back in, I'll make sure we'll be on our way. 'To this they both appeared to accept it. Starting the beetle-like purple bulk had been easy once he had intervened. By simply messing with some of the closest inhibitors, he would be brought back to life. It was interesting, just knowing how easily it had been for it to return back to life. Though this turn hadn't come to be blamed on it alone. Despite the initial changes, they hadn't spared the chance that they might move around, leaping over the rocky hedges in the distance. It wasn't going to be easy. By the distance alone, it would be impossible to outdo the speed, as far as either of them could make in during the hours. Elated even by the strangeness of the woe, there were other questions regarding the others who had come home. During their stroll, a mach had been revealed as the other beetle-like vehicle came about. Of course he couldn't see them yet. Pourie was still missing what was going on around them. By the sheer magnitude of the place, what had been right could only be the deranged nature of the ones in the front. To him they appeared out of nowhere, still caught by the boldness of their actions. BY leaps that came at each other's feet, there was the first fluke of day. Never could it be conveyed that the hapiness died as soon as they appeared and came out of their way. From beneath the area where the wasted ended and water fountains spread the zones apart, there flute players that had brought their girdles back and forth, missing with their feet as they pushed on. Begining the chase on the bitter excuse that no one could find himself missing, some had drawn to the bloated flying baggs from behind their backs. Failure after failure as they organic parachutes stopped dragging ahead, what transpired next was a show of life endings. Each of them started inflating until not a single one of them made it through. Without a single confirmation, they would settle with going through the rafts. Crafted in the midst of the broken luck they conveyed, now the movement of the insect-looking vehicles was finite. No longer would they walk on the same pace as feet. Instead, they would carry on something else, a filthy missive, draining forth, not to mention the peerless uprfront from the lack of movement that was felt, from around the dragging belt inside the waste. They were simply being dragged with the main structure, whether or not they liked it. Not only so, but thinking of some way they might be able to make it before they'd be broken away, was the method he had seen.

Michelle had oppened the door in flight and grabbed a fistfull of sand with one of the closest punches that could land. He threw them in Pourie's face, temporarily blinding him as he would soon gaze. 'What did you do that for, you crazed maniac. We could've died if we, weren't. 'Outside, where the place had been revealed, now he didn't understand any of it. And why were they charing ahead with the herd. It was impossible to turn back, from this journey as they brought themselves too far to come. 'A mirage you said? No, this is far from it. We're going to follow in its footsteps and see where it may lead us to. 'Despite the obvious lack of progression and the lack of clear satisfaction, it was just this close they got to driving wildy into the others that were brought with them. Just how many were there? And what of the others? More bigger, mor mature beetle-like creatures appeared to have achieved flight despite their sheer size. Not only so, but in their backs, one could see that more or less they had giant shells in which they were carried the rest of their weights. Carried away even, he had wondered what they hid there. How many of them used the human beings as fuel, if any could be trusted at all. The bone carapaces which surrounded the transparent eyes in the front revealed just as much spact as they had in this cockpit, with the key difference being that they were the only ones driving. The rest of them were freely allowed to ride and makee it out. ' 'What's the shaking motion now? ' 'You may need to grab onto something and don't look down. Whatever you do, don't look down. 'His senses only pushed this forward as soon as it could be felt. Not only could it not be settled yet, he couldn't push out for what was the dead. Looking in there, farther than they started to submerge through the sand, what they found were the bodies that were crisp. Some were taking by their wrists. This was a damned grave which only appeared to span around the planet to no clear edge. 'What happened hear? ' 'A devastation, I think. I couldn't explain what happened or why. 'Why would they change now? Why would their skin texture and limbs become so weak? Had it all been an illusion? Despite both of their strange way of working, they reverted back to what seemed to be the same dead look which carried on across the population. Not only obscured but clocked out to what direction they should take. 'Don't worry about take the right way in. I think it's starting to move on its own. 'It should be from this time on. Without as much as a few feet lost, there were those few that seemed to show signs that they had survived. Penetrating the outer rings around the surface made it seem as if they swam under a sea within a planet made of dust within. A land being poured on and stricken like some wild plantation, wrathful as the amount of determination wouldn't even be acquired on. Lost even to the kind that would carry on, there was this missed chance. Softness in area that were hard could never end as quickly as they had before. By no means could justice prevail when everything else was set and done. Far from over, though it may be, the degree in which they hunted beneath was far closer to some pure distillery. Every diver had managed to grab as many of the fallen people as possible. In their reach, as they breached in, feeling for themselves only the worst kinds of mildew about them, it had been clear that they wanted to suck them dry of the marrow and everything else. Though most may have been ancient, their internal liquids had been well preserved, even to the point where it wasn't even necessary any more to paint them in the worse of lights. Coming about the frontier, they would come back up. 'Hold on, I think we're making it again. 'Nothing was as painful as trying to fight through it, without giving in the emission of power the inner walls gave in. Both of them were faintly bleeding from their noses, but that stopped about there. Without looking anywhere but in front of them, they knew of what was to come. Another ascension, to the ever-lasting walking on the desolation. 'It's still too far away. I don't know if we'll be able to reach it. Michelle, I'm sorry that I doubted you. But this, I could've lived without having to deal with it. 'Not only shaken but disturbed, he had lost himself amidst the tracks, being taken wherever the crooked one came. As mindlessly twisted as he had been, he wouldn't even come again unless called forth as the stranger. He leaped about, bringing in one of the long cords of steel linking them together. An entire dark suit with a helmet of a skull, that bore the appearance of a rocky throwing needle, raked about the face. A disgrace which pushed again until it revealed the crossing hands that once tried breaking through. Not only had this one suffered a great deal of pain, as the clippers had probably burned through the mask, but he also revealed that there was a mix of leather and of skin beneath where it had been at last. Punishment was known for both of them, as they threw forth nothing other than what they had, a thing of glory connecting them as they fell through the receding buggers that went back into the earth. 'I saw them again, these were the culprits that wanted to come after us. ' 'Let's hope they won't come up again. I've got a bad feeling about them. ' 'You and me both, buddy. Pourie, I think you should try taking in the reigns again. Could there be a way to make it work faster perhaps? We truly need to find a way to cut them off and make it in time. ' 'What for? Would we be missing something? ' 'I don't know yet. It's just a feeling I have. 'For whatever reason I could think off, this was to come off as a way out. Without it, there would be no wonder as to know what was coming off. If not this desire to strike at it again, to end the pain of quietness, they would find out what had transcribed below. And why had there been no way of drawing onwards where plants couldn't even begin to show. In part, they had been there, though made out of some coarse sand. Their sole reason for hiding away was the fact that neither of them could say a thing, or reflect the fire beneath the crisp, the lisp being apparent as they spoke. 'We're underneath you, hear us as we make our way back. You're not welcome here at all, remnants of the past. Return back from where you sprouted from. The planet and its people are long dead, just as you should be once our task is done. 'Veiled threats came after in the form of brooding heat, moving as far as they could see to it. Lacking in the need to show, that there was a single way to avoid the show of pain, they were up for the taking. Lost for days, there were some ways through which plenty of them might be disciplined. Lost as the feet were thinned, little time had been regained. 'If we make it to that place, I think we may find a way to live. ' 'What other feelings do you have now? Can't you see that they're ending up being bad leads? 'He couldn't understand it yet, but this was the only salvation we could get.

Without it, we could simply wait until death arrived. And what fun would that be when all the bodies stopped working, when they could feed no more? And why would there be no survivors just because some strangers said so? Sure, the circumstances weren't right. But this need to live wasn't completely out of sight. It would only be natural to want it as hard as they could fight or show themselves forth. As they carried on, never to have gotten out, they would be brought to a vile siege. Though it wasn't as apparent as the other things were, it would be far more subtle to observe the chances happening around them. With each drop below, another one came and the others were thrown ahead. 'I think I saw one of the floating somewhere there. But I cannot say for certain. 'Confirmation would be denied until expressed otherwise. That had been the only way through. Without their sake, alone that'd be the way out, breaking through a few of the abandoned cases and the barrels left around the closest picks, for better feet couldn't be replaced. It was only this time when they started going deeper than before that they encountered some of the well preserved minds from an eighteen mile radius. Just by their initial interaction, where they had attempted to break through. Gentler tones revealed only the lost appeal of the lost souls speak. Thrusting from the other side only revealed how hard they tried getting their feet it. Not to fret, or even blow the initial discourse, it didn't go as expected. Fortwright, their struggles ended with them not being able to draw on anymore. Despite their hardest attempts, they couldn't fight the currents, being only struck far below. It was largely uncertain what this mean for them, the rest beneath the lowest depressions, where one could not even claim to have been lost. Mostly, to those that couldn't even feign what was going wrong then, this was the only chance to leave a message behind. Would they be forgotten that soon? Even behind the protection, it was obvious that neither of them wanted to fight against the swoon they presented. Even, as it had become clear that they were undefensible for their acts. What their messages, written through their broken fingers that left the spilling' musk there would be this. 'We did this to ourselves. 'It was the last time they would choose to do something or to interact with either of them. Ruled out of the projection, their disposition largely entailed that only reason would prevail. As soon as there was some way out. It didn't matter, that the sadness rang out. From one of the chronicles, lost in the midst of the great eight wars, most of them would be properly archived in the library of Tsor. Now, as it came to it, there was only one decision in waiting to be spared. Of course, it couldn't even come close to what would be the destruction of the universe but that would have to wait. This decision would stem from one thing and one alone. What was to be done about Catter Radolph's life in that century of lass, when his family had been gone? Despite the sad turn of events, they all went out one night, never to be found again. It was bothersome. Peering like as he was stranded there. In a single house near who's to know, perhaps better off alone. Nothing special could be drawn from him, other than the circumstance that lead to losing his family members, never to be mentioned in. Notes and lost documents that tried making themselves up as they went on. Soon it would be indistinguishable from the gibberish he tried leading others to believe. For the same reason he had lost his shot at happiness, he chose to live alone. Moving to the countryside was his death-warrant. To the present day, now on with it. He appeared to play with a flute that realized no suite. For him, there were plenty of uncomfortable songs for losses. Never could they be counted off. Better to wait for a few more days just to see. The rain would stop and so the leaking city above the top of his clockwork. It was there where the greatest examples of human engineering came at hand. Given life by the most skilled minds and the strongest hands that could turn, or he would pretend it was so. This would end up being just another attempt to deceive himself that the world was coming to an end. Or something just as puerile, to escape from the dangers life presented for him in the meanwhile, when the cold was more dangerous than some kind of destruction that'd spread. In as much as a few good months he could be dead. Perhaps he could do one better and fix the roof. 'Are we going to let them shake the valleys in that case?' It was highly probable that he was out of touch. Less than a few feet away there was a shed in a deep need for repair. For someone who shopped, he was unable to realise that he went there already. The only place in a mile or so where it wasn't raining as hard as he could swear beyond his nose, which wasn't to say that there would be something going on with him. Rather, he would care to show himself back into the streets where he belonged. Long had it been since he contemplated on the mistakes of youth. Of each time he went on and chased the birds around. He was never troubled as a child, but he had made a point now. For that he moved his hand away, twisted at the knuckle and punched himself until he bled. It didn't take long nor had it hurt him as the swelling started making it seem. He wouldn't be caught again like this. Instead, he chose to sit around and steer himself past what cathered to those that lost themselves. During the high-winds he thought someone would come in. It was the creaking door, that'd be no more of his concerns. Not in the dead of the night when it hadn't been fair to look around or search for a way out. No one would come to rescue, not in the morn'. There it had begun again. Trimming the grass with a scythe, looking for the family axe in the end of the shack, trying to figure out just how much wood as he still in need to bring himself with the last week's loss. As long as it would come at a great loss, it wasn't to be exciting in the least. Fealty was a beast that couldn't be hurt. There would be no reason for him to feel like there was something missing from the past. Not anymore. Sealessly, peering back into the ends, where the horizon was taken aback by those whom were trying to be plain. It shouldn't count to anyone, as for the fact that no one bothered to ask what was going on. It was hard. Putting his thoughts back together after such a longer period, during the return, but she came back, she was the first person he had seen in the longest while. His younger sister, Alice, who looked just as young as she had been a few years back. Reunited at last, they gave each other a slightly hinting lasting clap. After that, they both turned their way and haven't seen one another after the day. From the distance it was obvious where she lived. The grand rock upon which they stood had only a few forests in the middle, leading to opposite patches of land that were clearly separated and never into reach for one another, as long as one could think, there wasn't any way in. Other than the clear road in it, but he knew he couldn't make it on his own if he had chosen to go back. Thinking of returning to everyone had already been decidedly wrong, for obvious reasons, which had never been spoken of. Never bring them back. It was something in the atmosphere, no. Perhaps something in the general vicinity which made him act the way, no. That hadn't been it either. Much harder, had it been already the time? Without a way of knowing what was going on, there were other ways to give in. Promises would falter and nothing would last after. A harsh way of living though it may have been, neither of them could faint going in out of their ways to meet at the middle. Despite the rising flames from their fires, despite signaling where the journey had taken them, he didn't falter from his desire to live. They were too far for him to reach. Grass would grow, and in the winter he's have to take care of the snow. Not so much, as the streets were missing and neither of them came into the batch, would he fare better if he were to step it out there. It was so dangerous thinking of his dreams. Every time he hinted at it, he would shake from the cold within his shed. Would it be longer until she came back yet? Over the span of days, he tended to the garden and to the fruits. Relying only on the wild chicken he had hunted and on the long-distance fish that almost leaped against the pillars of the earth. Fare thy well old ways, he thought he may not see them again. Not when the shammer of the green rocks and the moving salt came into view. For the same reason coal could be dug in a few days, never brought again by shame. It was just what he wanted. A meal well salted, a fire in a rocky palor, some days he had sculpted. Yet he wasn't ready to depart from here. Out of some long lost fear of what he might face alone, he chose to stay here. On his way home. What would he encounter on the way? What of the wolves and their howling tunes he had been forced to share with. Through the night, the bears would take on a new way to bring on the delight of making him know that he was there. He could be anywhere, if he had wanted, dwelling with the flocks of bees, perhasp near one of the caverns down there, where no one who might find him as well. Would the tide bring him back at last? Storms couldn't even bring him back. To whatever loss he was trying to cover up. Dust lay with the ropes, he couldn't use them to lower down and find out for himself. For the reasonless ware, that were crumpling just about everywhere, there was an answer. Lost near the coast, the dancers would greet him, if he would make it that far. Otherwise, no, he would stay, day after day, no mugs of beers, not a single pipe, as he would wait with the teeth of a canine in his mouth, growling at the sea-lions making their way in. Not much after, he had seen the beach lay in the distance as the broth of the valleys couldn't sink deeper than where he'd been. It would be uninteresting to admit it yet. They were lost ahead. Bowing down now to their new masters, long after the advent of the trials, a new set of conduits were brought back into the question just as the defeat of the magus came into the light. Instead of him, they would replace, only the ones bowing down to those who had ripped out their only face. A shared detail as in twins, closely supported between them as it gave birth to the fight. It wouldn't even be close to bein brought to date. In this sudden advancement inside their acquiored ship, they took on the responsibilities left by the admirals before them. Choosing to prepare the final onslaught and the assault on the Thorn, though it may had been hard and neither of them could even claim to be as prepared as they had been before, this was it. For what was worth, after they let themselves be caught down there, in the paradises that emerged, the would be no better time to realise that it was pointless trying to make it back home any longer. Judging from where they stood, as far as they could go ahead, and listen to the songs they hatched, most of the people had realise that what they've seen was only a sulken image. One that would dissapear as soon as it would be reached, though hope wasn't erratic, they went ahead. Carrying only the hardest thing they might, a promise to reach the true paradise. In that swollen spot from which it emerged, others couldn't even fathom what was going on. Because the earth, less than what its worth had been couldn't be called on to return to its previous form. Instead, akin to fallen dead, they could see something be left behind as the paradises soon became as ephemeral as an aurora, soon to be lost as well. Not to tell of any lie, but many of the prefered death if it mean never standing in the plains as well. What they were bickering about, in their deceitful tribes and the songs that wouldn't even dare draw on, was the fact that behind there'd be nothing for them to save. Only this nuisance that remained and promised something in the loss, a blessing in disgusise and the face that no one could trust one another any longer. Stronger though the pillars that held them aloft may be, it was clear that there wasn't any other place for them to be in. Cities had been destroyed, the mountains and other formations had gone upon the burning of the ashes in the last deciding factor, as winter turned to summer, into gray. A complete change came over everyone as if from an eruption, slowly as they scourged themselves, there'd be no satisfaction taken from witnessing the demise. Livestocks wouldn't survive the harsh weather, not to mention the taking of the senders. They alone were the ones in charge with making sure no one survive with a broken heart. From their high peaks, they stood invisible and never-touched. With their longest arms that stretched over continents they pierced the people and made sure nothing would be lost. Beating with each second away from a stroke, there would be nothing left for them to hope for. It was simply a stroll, to a nomadic hole that didn't bequeath them anything. A future couldn't be sustained from this amount of pain they shared between themselves. 'May I propose something Kur?' 'What could you possibly say that we may be saved from such a sight? Is it not uncanny that we've lost ourselves in such a short period of time?' 'By the sight nothing was told. They were moving but, it didn't feel right at all. Just by their bowed heads, falling in their hands, it was obvious they had accepted defeat. Nothing would settle at all. Not with them and not to draw back what had been said about this desolation, but it was all in a controlled zone. From the peninsula they were on, struck around by a crown of dark mountains, there'd be no escape and nothing to move on to. Slowly they'd march towards the ruins left behind, thinning even now. As by the time they'd get there, it would be as if there wasn't anything to look after anywhere else. In the marked spot their reminiscences of the past would be the strongest. Lasting even longer than it was to be, calmly looking for a way to be, the desperation called behind. It was through only one of them that the idea came behind. 'We should look for a better spot to dig up our graves. I think that's the only honorable thing to do in this case. If only you knew how tired I was. Perhaps you'd give me a break, perhaps you'd make an effort to observe that we're all suffering here all the same. There's nothing there. ' 'Yet that's where we belong. Unless you haven't noticed, the world has gone upside down. Perhaps we'll reach in time and join them. ' 'Or we'll end up there, bitter that we lost it all. Either way, we'll die, and I cannot say it's worth saying that we tried. ' 'Give up then and lay down. It's none of my concern what your choices are. And I shall never intervene on anything you'd like to say. It's your choice, if you want to take heed and bed here in the middle of the land. 'It wasn't likely that they would realise. Just what the reason for this journey had been in the first place. In the beginning they were looking for a way out, a road or some tunnel or any kind of entry to push on. Despite what was said, no one would accept the inevitable. No one would be repulsed by the choices they had undertaken. With everything said then, they were gone. And I was left alone to deal with myself the only way I could. By waiting there dazed, on my back, sitting and waiting for someone to take me away, by the winds or the other bits of ash that covered me at last. To think this to be an ash-tray would fitting. Justing by the pillar of fire and of red rock that penetrated the far side of it at last was the final touch. Not a single man carried on from where I stood. Heat converged more than any of us would be allowed to carry on with us. A few more braver souls made it farther away than they should. It wasn't a problem of what was said. But the lack of compatibility with the dead surrounding us. 'We have made it at last, I see. There was hope after all. 'Where one saw his hands dissipating, the other saw nothing but a disease. It wasn't happening around them at all. Nor could they suffer pushing through the last remnants. Of what used to be. No one touched hands then, no one suffered any children to be there. It was as if they had died a long time ago but some had never accepted it. 'Get up, we're still going to make it to the other side, somehow. ' 'It's over, have you not realised it yet? ' 'I can still move my legs, I can still pull you from that spot and make you walk the plank until we're there. 'Taking only the strongest and the ones he thought worthy enough to make it through, he gave it in. Having heaved around the world in a few days, he saw nothing worth in stopping. Motions couldn't be erased and neither of the faces could reflect as much of the disgrace as they could now. It was well now. Only a sight was needed, as long as it would last. For the few feet that kept dragging over themselves. It was faith that got them this far and nothing would last more than it should be broadened forth. A few more steps away and it was done. Most of the people fell anyway, never returning to the previous state in which they were. More than that, there would be nothing and nothing at all brought to the quiet time spent there. As to watch the whales swimming in the aurora, as they would sink, never to a hook admit their loss. It was cruel to even consider drawing on from that point.

Carelessly walking on pints of their own, they would be dragged towards the hole from which the paradises emerged. Under its control there would be nothing they could do to carry on or fight against the current. Crawling and pushing on, there was the moment when everything was gone. Pure distillation and the flow of fire finally covered the enclosed space. After they'd be gone, nothing would remain to signal the outcome of their generations. It was so simple yet quaint, never being able to look at oneself again. Other than the lights, seen from above as the cold would spread from now on, covering the mass in a block of ice, from now on then, only the strongest vile spirit would remain. As an embodiment of all those that followed him, in the end where no one had even realised how low they'd sink. Perhaps it was better. To the various other corners of the world, a house for the quire, the deaf would admire the words written there. Despite not being able to move ahead to anywhere else, it was clear that there was only their leader they wanted to impress. Of course by no sounds, but by what they would write, in as few moments as they would be allowed, masked from everything that happened there, it was a loss for the soul, never to be gotten anywhere. No one understood what they wrote or what the reason for it, as it came forth. There were no lights nor any color to look after. It was a far better choice to turn back on in. Safer in some way, not to convey the juttings that were taken, no one could awaken from a slumber without a call. Sadness arose from a life without some appalling reason after all. Through some close observation, you could sink your teeth deeper into a metallic grinder and see them reap each other apart. From the various fights that were taken during the challengers who had mistaken one another for bitter foes, sooner than their lurid mind could allow, neither of them questioned what was going on there. For the same reason, one could look away and realise that there was something neither of them could convey just by the feeling they had shared. Each of them stood on floating pillars, surrounded by giant inverted pyramid like walls that stretched as far on both sides as to reveal that on both sides they were stacked upon one another. No longer concerned even, for the same reason they could throw each other forth. From the far ends, both below and above, only a precious white light obscured the falls, on either side as well as between their marks. It couldn't be called yet. Despite the tight embraces that would lead forth. Shrugging as they tried competing, who would end up jumping forth? A few feet away from the steps that had been made out of the floating platforms there was the cylindrical grinder, spikes and seemingly laced with hammer heads for the battering that would soon commence. They had tiny handles that were constantly moving and hiding in motions despite the picking of a few unlucky men that had leaped anyway. Down there, it might be worse. For the few that managed to even consider that the fall would be a better way to die, most had been pleasantly surprised by the fact alone. That most survive and burned in white flames for hours or days. Perhaps months if some lifespans stretched past what would be allowed. It wasn't likely that they would suffer even more. But this boredom of ages was dragging on for too long. 'Are we going to fight yet, or are you considering jumping in?' 'I haven't made up my mind yet. But the way I see it. 'And he considered it for quite a long period of time, would be either to be killed, either to end himself or jump into the grinder. Which could only lead to the change of him messing up and falling in the binding flames, where torture would somehow remain. 'You're not from around here. 'And you are?' Kolkart had been thinking too. Despite his stance, he hadn't even decided whether or not it would be time for him to let down his guard. Raised to his chin, the double blade could cut anything if he had only tried pushing through a single rim between the standing platforms. Of course this wouldn't fly over without even noticing what was wrong. A bunch of the gladiators that fell down there managed to put just enough effort so they could form a way out on each other's backs. It was pointless trying to stare away. From the various weapons they had got on them, none remained in its entire form. Instead they would've melted, pricked and standing past the cast. They were trying to catch at least a man, just so he could be spared of pain in hopes he could land on them. It was honorable, taking this into consideration, that their adoration for pain would only mean that the fight would go on again. 'Indicent, indicent, indicent!' Would it start again? Not to show too many signs thickening them off. Carrying a large locker on his back gave him just enough time to repel the vile things in there, deeper into the inverted pyramid structure, whether it was about it, as it fell. Difficulty could not be set aside, and for that reason he chose to put his locker and take on the bickering tide drawing on. Sadder times were leading in. With the paling winds, there was nought one could look after. In his break, he thought about it for a while. All the opportunities were missed, to check every closed door and what awaited in just about every other room before moving on. Carrying in the locker was the only thing that mattered to him. It was on the lower angle that twisted in the inversion that the fallen would be converted to crystalline white-power. From their corpses, this severely addicting opium-like degenerate substance would be harvested by locker carriers like him, in order to push them forward to the higher Cresins. While these giant surrounding fat-contenders would lump each other as to get the high, their entires would reveal just tiny slithers that would lead inside. To know what lay in there would earn someone a quick death. Not only coming from the various composures that were spilled and foiled, gathering around the seething beats that were spreading in, but one could see exactly what he was looking for there. Small round pea-like ovarian structures that could be taken in order to purposefully contour the next generation as far as it would go. Otherwise, one couldn't even expect them to survive. From the constant drive coming from the high, they were slowly being lead to organ-failure. Even to the point where they'd be severely punished and forced into it. Clearly the conflict of interest between the factions of the Lockers and the Strugglers was finite. For each new member had to deal with the fight inside and out of their respective feats. Without looking or blinking away, there were just so many times one could fail until realise the numbers were thinning. Severe blows couldn't be capable of leaving marks like those. Instead, gradually as they were attained, most of them had been able to recover. Being detached from the serious illness that had somewhat started leaping from them without a cure. Some would start severely hallucinating thing had a vague control over them and everything which had been held to them. From the hands that grabbed him, he would know it better. Essex, tried taking a break. As if it would be enough, he would pretend like he was understanding what was going on around him. For everything and everyone around, it would be as clear that it couldn't run on for long. Like a portentous plate, they group themselves together in enclosures, waiting for nothing but to. . . It was quiet still. Since the Foremen still called to one another, never understanding what might be happening there, still, as more of them came out, no doubt returned, for the final acceptance assured there of the broadness of the broken entrance to their territory. No one wanted to accept each other's side. The foremen had no desire to intrude, as their chances fell by the moment as they shook around, never getting to know the better. Little separators stood between the pushers. Wide and metallic, though there wasn't something to them yet, sounds were echoing because of the tightness of the walls. Entranced by it, the two superviros follow through. Entirely of a color, both the metal pushes, as much as they were fashioned like giant steam shafts and the rest of the material spreading around were made of one color. Only a bit of shade could be drawn and twisted. No other unnatural touch to the place. First they thought it was the rats who were making all that noise down the shafts. But on the second impression, that couldn't be. It sounded like there was something much heavier down there, too heavy to be able to count on. It was a nightmarish thing, just adding to every word and moment spent there. Vaguely set on finding out what the reason for it should be, he called on the other supervisor. 'Bring on the water cord. If there are intruders, we should either draw them out or drown them. ' 'We're not authorised to do this. ' 'Nonetheless, there are intruders down there. And we have to dispatch them, regardless of what it takes. Do you understand? ' 'If the Diurge finds out about this, about us doing it while we're only supposed to supervise it. ' 'I'll explain it all and deal with it. Just do as I say, leaving intruders unattended, may I remind you, in a place where our valuable documents are being stored, isn't exactly something we could gloss over either. We're more likely to be punished for this rather than, well, doing what I told you to do. 'The sounds were only getting louder as their frequency emerged. It was mostly unclear whether or not someone had told or rather peered in what ought to be held to them. It would mean that less of them could mean to last, as much as he could count on the feet, there wasn't any other way out. 'They won't be able to make it through in time to avoid suffocating. ' 'And? That's neither of our concern. If we have to do it, we have to do it. I don't care what it takes us to get through with it, but I want it done. Lower the inhibitor and release the water. 'He did. It wasn't supposed to go on that way, despite everything being told being as precise as one could hold on it. Perhaps there might be another reason to look back. Something could be changed there, just so we could both be absolved for what we've done. It was late. By the few minutes were were pushing them close, with each of the lids being completely crossed over, there was only a way out, the only shaft from which the water came from. 'What are you doing? You said we were going to let them go. ' 'Not anymore, not like this. I want to make an example out of them. Thieves and spies are not allowed near the Deorchives. It cannot be allowed. 'It had to submit to his decision because I thought he knew better than this. Not a single moment passed without wondering whether or not he had done something wrong. Out of the excess of water, I couldn't even see it past myself to go down there and see for myself. Just who were the intruders? There wasn't any quick realisation. A few beatings against the closed lids revealed as much as I initially suspected. Weak fists, that was all. If they were anything even close to adults, they could've easily pushed them out. 'I've got a bad feeling about this, Lyior, stop the water, now. ' 'But. ' 'If you don't stop it, I'll flood this entire floor and strangle you with it. 'Despite being in a somewhat higher position, he chose well. Immediately caught by all the broken lids that opened at last, a tiny wave of water pushed on past them, leaving nothing to the slight deceiders to know of what was going on. Both of them started at one another as if confused, unable to comprehend what was going on there. It was all his fault. 'They were children, these were children you drowned. Wipe that smile off your muck, do you even realise what you've done? Are you that far gone?' 'All of them, they probably tried searching for food or something else. Strayed moving in from the poor areas, homeless, even, by the look on their faces and their beggar's robes. He killed them like a bloodthirsty water diver, without the slightest concern of the repercussions this shouted off. 'As a high ranking supervisor, I would like to add that this was nothing but a slight hint of some miscalculation. I was merely not accustomed to hearing the footsteps and the signs of crawling coming from a bunch of children. I might even say that I can't wonder at anything else. ' 'Not a single word, Lyior, not a single word. 'Just what was he thinking now? The waves started drawing back, the water would be dispersed outside. And with it those tiny bodies would be taken aback. Most of them would still be stuck in the long tunnel, without a possibility to turn back. 'Do you have any idea of what you've done? Damn you, Lyior, because of you, I've. ' 'That's exactly so, you're the one who allowed this to happen. You're the one who kept the water cord on them for all times' sake. I would be surprised if you were to keep this out of the detailed report. 'Despite the shakiness of my hands, I could still hold him still. At least I wanted to for some reason I couldn't properly entail. He chose to do me one better, pushing himself away. 'Our job here isn't done yet, champion of justice and fairness. Come on now, we have to go down a lever and pick them off. Otherwise, we'll actually have to explain this as well. ' 'You're not actually seriously going about it, are you? ' 'As serious as one can be. Both of our necks are on the line now, don't forget about it. And if either of us goes down, both of us will go down as well. 'He contemplated then just easily he could overpower him in order to throw him around and make sure he'd sink down there. Curiosity arrived from the very thing he feared most, being found out. Other than his colleague spilling out what had happened, to which there was a high doubt to it since he would incriminate himself just as well. It was curious. Just by looking around, the halls were full, the studies had their scholars going and plenty of the engineers and biochemists were working on their chemical facades. No room for wonder and not a single mistake could be left untackled. Obvious reasons could still be called into question. 'Stay calm now, there's no need to force ourselves over since no one knows what we've done yet. ' 'They will find out. ' 'Only if you're making a scene out of it, otherwise, I suggest you return to having your blunt head into it and do as I say. Act natural now and don't pretend you're of no place as you're usually doing. 'Bargas seemed set on losing in. He was almost shivering despite the reassurance of what he'd done. We were in a high society, of course there would be some punishments which were rather offputting when it came to the loss of personal liberty and that. It was something neither of them ever dared talk about or even consider. For that puerile thing couldn't be comprehended in the least. Only tackled in part, not to miss something as hard as a deadline would call back, as much as it took them a few days to reconsider going through the plan, they had minutes at best. 'We'll simply push the shaft around a few times and shake it off, that way there won't be anything left in it. ' 'You know how that works? 'Lyior took a few steps and made sure no one was passing down either side of the corner of the great library module they were resting near. With as much of an infantile approach, he considered making a blunt suggestion. 'Play with it, that's what I'll want you to do. The lower inhibition of the shaft is plainly set to project into a direction. 'Straight ahead into some weird contraption, it would lead below the rim of the uncanny and leave nothing to the mind to fill the holes. Of course that wasn't what it really was like. Instead, the shaft was held by a felt long legs that could be actioned to lift or lower it as much as it was needed. 'There are some pints to it, you see? And a tiny command panel that should control it easily if you know the right combination to it. Easy, it's plain easy to function. The plan cannot fail. We only need to lift it a few meters above one of its ends and the bodies will simply slide off it into the sea, where they belong. Now, with them out of the way, there won't be a single reason for us to be suspected for anything at all, you understand. We both go down our ways and never talk of it again. ' 'What if there's someone down there? What if someone noticed the sounds and the struggle? ' 'Look, the shafts are abandoned, no one actually cated about them. I would say that the chances of someone being there, in that place at the right time is close to being a mathematical impossibility. Just take it as logically as you can, why would someone be there other than us? We have a reason to work on it, they wouldn't. ' 'Why is there a room like that in that case? ' 'Bargas, do you actually care about the usefulness of all the abandoned or useless rooms that are placed in the Oratorium? Because, if you had, there'd be a lot more problems than having to deal with a bunch of. 'He shut his trap immediately, once he saw just the splendor he had achieved. For the same reason he could recall it, there was this thing. He wanted to know of something better, rather than be caught alone. He wanted to know of the reason behind his sudden calmness and lack of guilt for what he's done. The supervisors were rather set on the technical enchantments that were pushed through their brains. It prevented some emotions from going off unregulated and completely shut off when they needed to focus on a task. This was their task, this was the result. Bargas could still substantiate the crime he had committed, not with the help of emotions but cold unadulterated logic. It strung him like the sharpest blade, unable to allow him to refrain from the conditions that had taken him off the pile again. Despite their sudden shock, they both carried on, acting as natural as possible, without giving the slightest reason of a wrong being committed. Another one of the rooms was completely ignored. There weren't any locks in place, as the society decided there were no secrets to get withheld from them. By the perfect machination of time, they were in that wide shaft-condenser without anyone to be focused on. It was reasonless to consider it bland. For the same thing had come to miss him about every second and every immature feeling he could thrust again. Not only had he not considered it a plea, but Lyior at least wanted him to see what he was talking about. 'It's the main panel there and the other ones that are near it, but. 'He hadn't considered the possibility of there being more intruders. And those shafts were much longer and less exposed, leading to farther chambers that were even more condensed than the others. It wouldn't even be likely that they could draw near to something like that. The junctions which had been set in place were working as intended. It largely looked, or somehow felt like an undefenable stance to take. Comprised of more than a few strands, but. To think of something worse, a few feet away, earlier that day, a woman and her child fell, in the middle of the lobby. No one stopped. It wasn't likely to be much worse than a bunch of strays. Yet she was still there, in a single spot that was walked around and avoided. Strange, how times change. But that was exactly the last piece that filled the cup. What went on? Fewer than a strap of seconds went away, as if dropped and shaped just about everything their way. 'It's done, they're all turned downward. 'I wasn't supposed to be there then. Specifically then, not at that hours, looking our way, they were trying to say something about what was going. Either by mimicry or by the inexhaustive appeal they felt towards one another. It was better to think about them as passing. The woman and her child slowly decayed and it was only then that they all stopped to notice her. By the time they had all gathered around them, it was already proceeding to be over with. That was over before it had even begun. Plain and simple, just by looking at what was in store for them, the citizens knelt as she and her child would come under a slanted spotlight which started dragging her essence out of the cask they've been in. Organs would rise on slight occasions but what added up to the light was the fact that it was filled with the anticipation they all proudly announced they had for some reason or another. Less eventual that it had originally seemed to be, it was clear enough that no one else wanted. It never truly went away afterwards. Soon they were done gloating at it only to move on. Even after so much time, there was something neither of them could properly understand for reasons of their own. It was somewhat irrational, merely implied by them moving to the sides, before carrying on as if neither of them paid any attention any more. Begone from that pain. It wasn't likely to be told. But some long time ago, in a wild thicket she waited, the statue of the maiden, weeping with her many hands, as she covered her face, holding over the dripping water from the fountain above her. To her they'd come, hoping that it would finally come to an end, begging for her to take their pain away. Circling around her, they had never realised, just what the pain meant to them or why they were still alive. She wept at time, never after drought. Yet there was something to look after. Even here, farther than the thicket, where the slits of tees' went deeper in. Shameful claims came over her. As attenders who were there for other reasons. Let it be told now that there'd be no reason to look back at what happened before. For whatever reason the mother and her daughter came was theirs alone. From whichever place they ended up seething, bringing nothing in the net. Single stoles of fish-drones only came when it was time to feed again. Interlude, at last. Many problems would simply arise from the fact that they had gotten ride of them, as if they would simply go ahead unreported. Waste could be detected somehow, even by the slightest erratic connections. Both Bargas and Lyior were baffled by it. Fewer than it should be acceptable, it appeared that their subtleness wouldn't completely go unnoticed. Perfection couldn't even get closer to being taken just by the very fact that there was a way in and one out that were more than feasible to get noticed. Later in the day, the Supervisors returned to their needful watched. As they had decided there would be no other incidents to look after, both of them alleviated the pain. No conondrum would remain much sooner. One might've been able to validate is somehow, the amount of shortages that were taking place around the globe-region, which held all the archives at bay. If it weren't for the constant friction that brought them back at those weird unacceptable intervals, a shock might come in place. Hopeless though it might be to deface the shingles, they were there. In a solid, condensed usurped refinery for the battery-plots, they were noticed and called. Though not a single passenger admitted, down the tube-train in the N'Orls, some of them knew exactly what was going on. And for that reason alone, it was kindly asked for them to move on. 'A few seats ahead, if you don't mind. ' 'What for? ' 'I'm sorry. 'It was understandable. For that they all kept their distances from both of them. Not only so, as that wasn't even the slightest of hints. But they were both already absorbed by the idea that there wasn't a way out. 'They know? ' 'Shut up Lyior, please don't make me raise my voice here. I don't want them to suspect us ever further. Have we been accused or not? Because I don't think we have. 'Paying less attention would be considerate, with everything in mind. 'Now, we're going to be presented to the demi-tract in the High-society, don't you think that's something we should be weary off? ' 'As long as you keep your calm and I'll keep mine, we'll find a way through it unscathed. 'Either it would be this or the next stop. Yet the conductor waited for them to carry on. Strangely, this was the only decent set. Looking ahead past the windowed doors revealed more than enough for what would be an unattainable place to be in. The reason for it being that they were trying to paint them as intrusive woodwork crass cranks in their work of trying to peep through. It would be indefensible, just by looking how they were promoting their rampage of expanding tunnels. 'I don't know about this, Bargas. I have a bad feeling about the next station we may be left in if we choose to stay. Just looking at it out there, I know there' will be no other way to return. 'Then we'll face whatever we've been called for and answer it however we can. 'For the slims of exposure were there. It wasn't set in the right way. Just by looking around the place, you could see that there was something wrong. Place outside on a dual-ramp that could keep going either way. It was vital for them not to show any fear that they might see through their peculiar zoning-antecs. Visors were now prolonged from hidden spots. It was hard to see whether or not they could anger the buildings. Wildly moving in strange sessions, they were only there to signal the fact that there wasn't a living thing populating the dual-ramp. From the encicadrophad, as wide of a structure that couldn't resemble anything even remotely human, there was this it. Why, they entered it without the slightest show of worry on their hands. For the same reason they couldn't care about themselves for too long. Especially since the first and foremost five meters in through the first section where the water showers started on. Both of them had to be properly washed and blown by heat for safety reasons. What followed afterwards were the gases, which were slowly being puffed around in the surrounding areas, before they were closed in as two sets of walls pushed back and forth. 'What now?' 'I don't know yet, but keep your guard up just in case. Anything could happen. 'Anything indeed, perhaps for that reason, they were more likely to withhold was going on there. It was now that the entry to fantasy came. Despite the enclosure there was little to pay heed in. Without the likely of trying to obey to the instructions that were dictated through the various voice boxes that were there, it would be impossible to make it seem like it mattered. Far more than that it was a cruel magnificence one had to aspire towards. What they heard there were the song of the schizoids. Spoken from the heirs of brain malaries that spread only through some of the files, never to be understood by any of the cases nor by anyone that tried. Going back a few more days prior, in their quire, somewhere in some hidden crevice, they were chained. Beaten as their agony would prolongue the time it was needed for them to be able to sing again. Not by virtue nor by pain, it would be less than satisfactory to hear them try making the waves like they used to be. By that, it could only be admitted that they had been recorded for hours and days at best. Beastly so, as for the weeks they were pushing through never came to bring back the agony or the woe. A single tone could be heard at best. Only one thing kept them going. Echoes, bouncing around, they were thawing awry their skin off. And after the first layers to fall, nothing could be called into what was to be called, the ebbing of hearing them alive. A chorus of stings, from wasps that could push through their wings, the flower beds and none of the deeds that would sing them off as anything but the virtue of looking around, never being able to admire what was going on around their miserable grown. Shared between them like a piece of cloth that couldn't even last as long, there it stood. Resting as for the way, never pushing it out any either way. None would have to even say, what the matter they might convey. From beneath a potion, the claim of luminescence which highlighted them came from a pair of glowing rocks that stood together and never lasted as much as it could be counted upon. But on the little information that was give, one could see it clearly, as it they stood in front of them. Recorded even as to observe the progress that they went through, not to mention that there was something definitely going on there, as per what they looked like. Slender, thin, unable to put mass despite being forcefully fed, for started. That hadn't been all at all either. To look at their enormous heads would've revealed bodies that were eight times bulkier than they had been. Now only their bones appeared to stay on, despite the obvious changes that withheld them from doing anything even decent. It wasn't likely that they were going to be less abused. Cruel even, to be looked back at, for the concisely placed, almost conical structure placed upon their mouths, connected with the system of hoses that were leading farther and much farther apart than it was needed. Even claiming that there was somewhat a rue, for each clue that had been given about the strange condition, it'd be nothing but a lie. They were chained there, in the worst possible manner. And neither of them could suspect a thing, nor pay themselves any farther than it was needed. It wasn't possible for them to think about escaping. Henceforth, caught forever in the prison of immortality, they sang. Loudly pushing their vocal chords until nothing could be distinguished from looking on at all. Either they might do it again, or shake off the chains that had been implanted in them. But it wasn't clear whether or not someone might pay attention to what was going on. Off to them, it might be said, that there was only a way to play off the dead. In turn, the mourning would missfire. Unable to admire it any longer, they had chosen to cut off the other audio plays, never to hear them again, expect for one spot. Where Lyior couldn't even fathom hearing it be brought back again, as it felt like fear for the ears, a flight of sounds that dragged on and on until it couldn't be forgiven any longer, nor pain attention to. Brought to them again, in what would seem to be something worse than pain, there was the stop. Exactly a few months passed in the span of a few seconds. No physical nor any psychical changes could be detected, instead they were reflected in the song of the schizoids. Freed at last, from what was only the short span of a vile strike, they stumbled upon themselves on the vile steps that lead forward. Never to withhold again from what was going on, they pushed the knots that brought them back. Snatched from the wonder they were getting near to, it had been clear. 'Past this door, we might get through something much worse. ' 'What was that? 'His voice took a strange shaking. As for each reverb added some strangulatory way of pushing on, words and phrases being skipped in his mind. From now on and there, it was clear that they were hearing something about as vile as someone could show about. It wasn't even likely that they were showing any regret. For what would be going around them would soon bring them back from the deathless glare. 'Was someone there?A moment ago. 'The sounds of the hasthing and the moving springs came much later, far longer than they should've been accounted for. No more would they be lain as they were before. Instead, one had to know just what kind of interest they had into shaking them off that way. For the greatest view that carried on, no one could be gone much farther. It was something neither of them should be staring at. For all the guests that were there, also being onsted on the whole pushing on. They were tranquil as they were set on rows, courageously cowardly, as they were trying to carry on the messages they were bearing. Each of them had a few set of key words stamped on their blunt foreheads. Normal citizens even, who were taking part in this strange ritual, whatever season might it be part of. Yet there wasn't anything even remotely null. As to even say to it, there. Intruding upon him were the thoughts that were not meant to be. From one of them leaped another. And yet they couldn't let it sink as louder thoughts emerged since. Clearly there was the cluster she had wrapped around them. Like the sight of an uncanny lover, fastening her bridles, riding past them through the forest, where a smoke rode up like a riddle. It was stranger, so it would seem, to assume they were trying to get away from her, since they were drawing closer, nearing the point, where the ships were sailing past the isle, into a kingdom of clouds above. As soon as they opened, towering masses of fish were dropped, all of them bearing the dead eye. Neither of them could carry one without losing each other past the lie that had been their waking. Deranged in a pleasant way, it couldn't be conveyed yet. Looking through the coated trims, busting through a lost whim, it was much clear to the battering fools. Cooling past the broken tools in which the sea life had been impaled, there stood one of them. Lyior had been greeted by an abomination made out of the sea life. Grabbed by the various twists, cromed and coming from the remnants of a storm, it settled. Clearly on-set to bite, he got closet to taking his own life by mistake. For his own sake dictated that, it wasn't even fair that he was to be brought back there. From anywhere other than the plane, where he could still remain sane. 'Snap out of it, Lyior, what are you doing?' 'I can see them, before the wall of fish. The ones I drowned, they're there, waiting for me.' 'Dirtpounder, you blasted dirtpounder, can't you see what's happening around you, yet? Are you feeling it as well?' He was still in shock and couldn't properly assess just what had been going through him yet. Though he couldn't neglect it entirely, this was the only explanation he could point at. They were both struck by the process of emotion-rehabilitation. Slowly it was all kicking back in. All of the guilt and all of the peculiar assemblies of anger came back. Both of them were stricken by it and what they had done. 'We're not going to get out of this, do you understand? Unless you get a hold of yourself, we're going.' 'Again, he looked ahead and appeared to have missed a few things. He had told him something right after he had taken the steps and entered the fiend made out of all the fish, most of which were unclear even now, as to whether he'd know if they were dead. 'I have no other option. 'So he had considered this alternative. Instead of trying to run away, seeing how the abomination started connecting with the various waves formed out of all the ones that followed there, it couldn't be thought as anything else. If that may be, no one could feel anything else in the matter, no one wanted to draw away. Conveying as little as they could feel, it wasn't likely that they might feel the musk of the tools and the trade. Placed near the entry, which revealed much about the cover inside, there wasn't anything sea-like to it. But a membrane that looked vastly, or strangely superior to that of bone, drawing from other elements that weren't completely unearthly even for what seemed to be the last change of wealth. A simple thing, but not exactly what it looked like, there appeared to be a complete reappropriation to what was being taken from them. Slowly but surely as a moving glowing living lantern pushed through the walls, a lot of the inner structure got exposed as the weird deflowering cyst it was. The place was livid. Somehow bloated between by the fat, spreading on both sides as well, which only lead forward to the realisation that the normal ship that few above wasn't a ship at all. Confirmation to that could only be delayed, as there wasn't a way out any longer. Not for him, not for them. Lyior was missing and the only way that he might thread on was in the front. Nothing came even closer to be segmented into straight corridors of chords of similar excess, instead they were rambling around, unable to go forward into motions of their own. It wasn't exactly quaint or even unexpected. Somehow it got even worse, waiting for something to make a move. But they were there, not being but the inner pores that were being placed like chess-pieces all ahead. Loneliess would be dreaded there, for as much as he could be aware. It had only been a matter of waiting and of dreading being near one another, after he came into view. Stuck there, as he seemed, an opportunity arrived. Per twenty feet in charge, it was obvious that there were a few other moments that made as slim of a difference as one would know. First of all, there was that. Without a reason to look ahead, he was pulled and abandoned, lost as far as one could see, past the hedges of dread. Parted from each other, he had seemed to cower down farther. It couldn't even be placed there. For each venerable tebrity that followed, instead of trailing under him, there were the signs. Broken by the scouraged bland pitch, he was greeted by the moving holding crepices of metal, holding themselves like detached straps holding the men that appeared locked. Behind them, as he notice, had only been a few other connectors leading in their heads. They weren't subtle at all. Just by the admiration they carried over. Improbable though it may had been, there was a way out for him to take. Not obvious at all, just from the standing and the strapping of the. . . "Enough, enough, enough!" It erupted. The giant cluster of humble snickering arms stretched and came apart as soon as they could act and draw close than they should be doing it. Without even a proper warning, they started squaring themselves off, like completely unseparable blocks of stone. Crumbling from the woe' own. Hardened to the mind, the blindness of the turbine started brushing past it, unable to grope the toll, broken crumbling breaks had taken whatever remained of his whole. He carried on with three large heads, two being inactive and the only one speaking being tired of the laps the others took. Just as he was in the middle, they would spread around the circles in the lane. Forming strange sings but never explaining to whom they were for and what reason they were there at best. Resting for the field engrained, by the time he could spare a look he had crossed as much as they could take. 'Leave us be now. We have no quarrel to share any longer. Isn't it clear that your only desire is to disturb us because of your malignant jealousy?' 'I would not feel such a thing if it weren't for you cruel deceivers who cannot see the appeal of stading here. In my spot. Here where I can grow and evolve, here where we could all change who we are. ' 'And end up just like them, then?' He pointed at the ceiling where they all ended growing too soon, into large vine-like organisms that resolved that their primitive forms had been useless for them. Instead they chose to live apart for those that couldn't see a way out. 'In that case, what do you even suggest we ought to do? If there's even the slightest chance of paying less attention, there would. 'There would be a reason for them messing around, spending their mindless games. It had to happene sooner than later, even if it hadn't come to blows, there were separate things that could be said. So many twists were grabbing, so many buds behind the peaks on their backs formed the widest amount of wild depressions there could be about a being. Largely a mechanism of their, as well, it was obvious what the other signs didn't tell of it. Merely, both Lyior and the other supervizor came here because of the mere shock they had been sent in. By the mere sight of him, the dead Carrion waiting in his court, he who had been closed off into the room, unable to defend the reason for the vile things happening there, or what had been the despair for. After he had come to be, near him stood Cower, in as wide as an insectoid chittin for which he spared no expenses. He was the guest of honor, just the thing that ought to be called. No longer able to keep it our of its mind, it spared not a second more. Passing through it was much harder than seeing it more than a few times off. Dusted even from the lost sides. 'Bring them back here. I see that the song of the schizoids had sent them to the realm. 'For that forbidden knowledge appeared to bring them after the judgement could be set. On their way, it neared the trap, he who followed through couldn't distinguish what was going on. There were the tribulations and what nots, the ware was spoiled, as one could simply point at it and rip some of its pieces off. Without a way of drawing forth, they called on the rafts, to draw away. 'The Pleimorah needs to carry on. We need to feed it what we can in order for it to make it through the journey alive. 'The mask, the sails, would never prevail from the strangeness it displayed outside. For some of them, as much as it coule be thought, wouldn't work. Getting past the sails, entering its coveted body would digress into the digestive process that could escape from its enormous bellies. From that regard, not to blast their way out, came the shredding from the cuts. It wasn't likely that they could be heard at last. No time to spare. Charles had turned around and went away. He couldn't be called by name any longer, for some reason that didn't even resonate with him at all. To point at something that may even be askew, he would have to see it through at last. A few roads now seemed to be finished, farther away. It appeared that they were leading to a centralised area that had some debris extracted from just about either place. No one had even the severity of the place could be an excuse, with everything kept low, there were other higher peaks that were kept from entering. Threatened by it, as there was something wrong going by the heart, there wasn't any way out any longer. It flew, on par, away, stricken by some missaligned piece like a missile, being prepared. From the distant hangar where plans had been wrought to an end, they still reserved the counter point. A plan that would bring the end of the levels, completing the entire complex in its entirety, without a way of knowing what was wrong. Why, they were trying to pick his fingers off the ground for the same reason. He, it was him again. Only now could he be awakened after all that unnatural movement that occurred in his prime. To him there would be no arms and no rotation. His presence could be felt aloft. 'Make it stop, make it stop, make it stop. 'He spoke at last. To him there was this red skin on a trunk that was inhumane. Instead it bore itself away as the other limbs would push on to carry. Never to dismantle the weary or care for them in any case. A correspondence of Bled, or so had it appeared. Judging by the size of the envelope and the four letters embded on top of it, one could draw away the fact that the initials spoke of something much worse than that. Put aside by the stragen format, they had somehow went too deep. Already too many days were lost reflecting on it. They were cutouts for the Dngor's sake. So much alike in as plain a sight that they stamped that simple aspect of theirs, being cut out of someone's skin. Ripped off even, I wouldn't have doubted that in the least. For the lack of fealthy to which I would agree, there was a need to draw and eat some of it off, just to get a taste out of it. As it may seem for now, there was a way to pay less attention to the implications that arose from it. Just by it, it was hard to resist. 'This, this thing, it came from a woman's feet. 'It was strange, peculiar even, just to think about it. But the taste had been way too clear and distinct to be even remotely set. Just to understand what was going on then, a set of indignities. Depite the harshness of the world, it was difficult to expand on everything else. It was irrefutable, even by that point, trying to seethe in different direction in order to make a point out of it. Not only would it be shallow, as it would bring nothing else than the disability the thoughts dictated. A dead end thorough and though, but that could do. A clear distraction had come inside the Thorn, looking at it would break through the cuffs and reveal the strong desire to infest. Might you detest the sight, in which case, you should deffer from doing so. It was her who was the cauze of it, the sudden mirage, the durge and the plounge into the uncanny sight. She was the cause of the mildew-infesting daydreaming that started leaping around. Myra did they say. Her name couldn't be contemplated upon again for the sole reason that she stood. A bulb of liquor holding trunk stood as her head sprouted around. From her open jaw she liberated the children that couldn't make it through.

From the afterlife they would be pulled and let to rot. About the place, it was clear that they couldn't bring themselves around. Behind her a single extra long and curved excess of skin-plonging shrouded the sight. IT was likely that she would still fill the place with what needed to be brought to the delight of scum. Brought about her openings she started spilling and dangling about, unable to move as her limbs had never been drawn out. Instead, they had been broken, spread in waste. Nowhere near her would they choose to lay waste. It was a weird place in which he rested. Long and defiled by the maces that couldn't bring her about. Not even agony could make for it. For now she needs be shattered. Not to mention that after her advent no one should come after. Clearly there was no way to admit defeat, not to mention the hare-like entry that was made out there. Pairs and bonds need not be called again.

For the dreaming ended for now, as it would not fare well. From the desperate tender chronicles it had been taken. Loft, of all who had been affected by the dreams, in the mist of a sunless tree, underneath the cobbler's tea formation there he stood. A champion who had been largely misunderstood, yet unknown. 'A call for the God-champion Clot. 'He wasn't bleeding any longer. Instead he approached himself from every angle, dripping away as the people who faced him before lay dead. Implained through the spikes that shot out of him, call back into the pillaging from the other ages and those that couldn't fathom themselves being trapped by the sage. Peculiar holes were moving amongst the filled strage, as the fires emerged from long lost ages, remnants of arrows, and of fights had brought only the marrow back. 'Bring us what we heed and in return, everything you need shall be granted as furiously as you demand them. ' 'Is that all you inquire of me then?' ' 'Just about that I'd say. Do not let us take away from what you've build. Everything since the creation had been set in place. Even the rules of entry, as to look on how to behave. 'The old croon opened for the loon only the key, where they might see the various miniature-like mechanisms that twisted and turn in order to make it work again. It was a strange artefact he held, alas. The bronze hammocks and the doors were of the utmost intriguing design one could look after. Not only so, but the liquid alloy in the mix instead of going forth, it crumbled. Suffering of the most disturbing angle through which it might crawl again. In it, Hrothmaggue had seen the reflection of the man he had killed in his youth. Despite being less disturbing than it should, there was a clearness to it he couldn't take away. For the same reasons he alluded to the strange way he took himself there. As much as it would be interesting to know just what the reason for him showing him how the key worked, he chose to move away and let him get with it before they could come and lay. 'A siege will follow in a few days. I hope you realise what's going on there, I truly do. Otherwise, there can't be any reprise to it, or anything we could do to help you. ' 'I understand what I'm here for. You needn't worry about the mistakes of my past, I'll do more than well to correct them while I'm here. ' 'Oh, and Maggue, you need to take care on your way there. I'm truly afraid that there are hopeless wonders taht might pull you in. Spend as little time with them as possible unless you want to be caught. ' 'I know. 'Each of them took the slightest bow and nodded. Some were still not understanding what the need for the order was. In as much time as had been spent there, they were feeding just about each place, never struggling to get their way. Blessed be his kind, as the door opened and he went out there, to grind. Feet and losses, never near the masses, around sulken areas around town, like one who appeared to look after shelter or refuge or something of the kind. Either way, not to search for it again, he was on to his target. 'You're the madame I have been looking for. 'As soon as he turned her from behind, he saw the clear defect of the mind. Bright though she looked in the sun, clear as her face lead between two mournful dances, she lacked something solid to get her up again. Parts of her were trying to put themselves back together but never again. Not to mention that they were trying to droop, never to swoop themselves apart. For more than a few second he figured something was wrong with her. As the plaster of pick between the lips of ink started melting, her cranium was no longer sheltered, as it began cracking and moving downwards towards the throat. Not only so, but what had been achieved would be a way for it to creep in. Without a way, the leash would keep the others away. Near most of the buildings as soon as it happened, the citizens did laps as they were locked inside the heapless wonders of the law. Disturst couldn't be traded, as they would be soon thrown back into obedience, asked for their guidance when night came. They never rested ever again, from the mere fact that they were forced to walk endlessly in order to see. What creatures dwelled in the plains of walking. 'I see one. 'Dolmac said, he was a simpleton who walked too much but he had been approached by one of the martyrs who needed to ask. As his whole dilemma emerged at last. 'What do you see out there? ' 'A few of them, like us, they're trying to walk. Taller and wider, nothing resembling our appearances but sterile. In some way I think they've carved themselves in order to show the fact that they have no eyes to see, no mouths to talk. But their scars reveals much. ' 'Can I strike one at their heads? ' 'No, they have none, they're headed onward to create a pseudo-imitation. But know that they're fake. It's a method of defence, from the others that hide inside their broken spells of charm. Critters are following them at last. 'It was just his luck that he started to feel. Near this lack of appeal, there was a clear entry for them to digest. If they were found out, that meant that they could strike out and strike again.

'Well I know what this means. 'He spoke with it as if he was the missing part. Why, he even drew away and managed to pull her apart from all the tractions she would make, as she drew in and out again. 'Thief, there's been a thief, stop him. 'Right there, he had taken a horse as well, kidnapping the lady's child as well as her purse once again. Two of them started chasing the winds in different directions. Twins were tied to their rapiers, multiple bags and the same appearances. Towards which they threw knives and small nails, thrown with such a power as one might be able to call forth again. Different circumstances would show something less. It would be important to know of it, again, as for the taking. Saying by the merciful. 'We should spare him, grant him the protection oh Periclot. ' 'Very well then, he, despite already being blessed as he had been split in halves, shall endure the knives and the nails for as long as it needs to be alive. ' 'Most capricious, master, thank you for saving his life. 'A curse had been transmitted in disguise. Clearly, there was a way, to know what they'd say in their weird tongues. Brought about something clear, nearing the whole appeal of words, strangled by the minutes that went on. Not a second more could they spare themselves from wasting. Avast, they ran about the point where they could disperse and hide. With sicker men being brought back today, and workers trailed from the pain, there was nothing left for them to be. It was only now that they could make their way through the gardner's crudeness where the buildings were flat. And no one even thought about checking them off. Despite the rest of the town, they had been nearly sealed off because of the recurrent problem. Tighter than taller, bringing themselves away, it was clear that there wasn't any way of knowing what happened today. So many thieves invaded their piercing straps, that there was a need to bring on the night sky. From the womb's delight, where the tightness of the clouds had been revealed, it the name of Clotton had been cleared. 'Don't hang him yet, my boys. 'Stranded on the platform, looking as the sea of fruit-throwing citizens he thought of a way to be. Seeing how he had almost been killed, there was no other place he thought about being other than his home. Deranged even by the misinformation, he chose to take the first lie. 'I didn't fear for my life for a second you know? Perhaps many of you have doubted my innocence, but I knew that justice would prevail no matter what they might tell you. 'Again, he presented himself like he needed to. Without concern, he stepped to the broadly shouldered Chorkalt and knelt. 'My friend, I owe you my life and everything I earned since the day I have been born. ' 'Don't make a scene here, after what I've done. Grow up lad, I can't be bothered to be stared at for all the days. ' 'But I'm trying to behave, you see? There's nothing else. 'Yawn, a yawn, out here, as much as he pleased himself, he wouldn't even come near understanding. The plot of roses seemed to draw near. Moving on their own with a loss of appeal, it was less than benign. Tried even, by the mind, he stopped. Praying aloud in a corner, to the Clot, who shivered at the sight and at the planning that might be taken even remotely clear as to be mistaken for an attempt at his life. It was impossible, to even think he'd stand a chance against the artillery that was being thrown against him. From the distance, as if shown at last, there were the first signs. Even though it would be somewhat forgivable to think of it, there wasn't any way out. Not through this cope, not without trying to get a head in and say something there. Various other signs of silence lasted as much as they were needed to. Even then, when no one came, no one bothered at all again. From the Clot, as he dripped from his giant carapace, that surrounded his skin, nevertheless exposed to the living stairs that groped him stayed away. Never swayed to return to any other place, it was clear now. What he had gotten himself into by trying to pick some of the bones off clean. From the past blood-infused grunts that made it to them paled. Unable to face him, they quailed and said. 'Do not impale us just yet, there's still something we want to get from life. Cherish it while there's a while for us to swarm about. 'No matter what the thought had been, every place would lead somewhere in the same area, wherever they'd go, unable to get away from what seemed to be the cruiser they were planted in. Through the outmist of space, from the place where the fleet had faced defeat, where the Duke had never bothered to come, there was a floating creature who refused to give away its lumps. It waited there, as the walls between the train, the passage and the world had faded. Always caught by something as the spades left the midst, never to catch it reap the benefits of mildew, spoken like the vileness one would have to offer. Not a single more would he wonder any longer, as he just appeared there. Though this was yet just one of the replicas, he greeted him just way more than he should've had. 'You're Sour. ' 'Indeed I am, and I have acquired a body now. What do you think of it? 'What could he say? Even by trying to inflate his lumps, revealing the mouths that were encompassed by the fat, it was obvious that many didn't care of that. For the others were just there for the same reason as much as it could be tested, a perfect oration never for the leper. As mightily demented as this sounded, he invited him closer. 'I wish I could find a way to express what I feel now. 'Grub Clough couldn't feel himself getting in the way sooner. Whatever the reason for this decision had gotten the better of him, yet he decided that it would be better if. 'If you don't mind me saying this, I seemed to have been lost for far too long now, knowing that my trails can never be retraced by any means had given me just the insight I needed in the first place. Indeed, I not only feel renewed now, but I acquired only the enticing mildoea of trying to look into the lower ones beneath us as they walk into their microcosmic tunnels. Look at what I have become as well, no longer contained in as tiny of a cage as I have been given. There was this tiny amount, a gribbulous sphere that came about him. You know whom I'm talking about. He's hidden there and threatened by all of them. In case you haven't noticed or haven't been around for as much time as it's needed to become acquainted again, let me bring you back to date as far as I know. The one that's worming his way through has promised something that near the disgust, as much as it's needed to push on and eat through all the universes it managed to chew on. I have been made aware of this and that I chose to, well, understand that second change from your past self Dour. Your name echoes here as it's written all around your body in the celestial letters. Do not dare erase them yet, as this will be known just about anywhere you may end up being. Wait for the chance and try making it through. I can assure you that there's a way out for those like us who dwell not in the dark but in the places between and I shall bring you only a piece of the other hidden clusters that we've been trailing for a while. 'He spoke in a suspicious manner, yet Grub hadn't given in a strong sense of betrayal yet. Despite all the illuminescence that were surrounding them, it was more than obvious that there was a plague in their den, a reversal of the uncanny. Glorious though maybe not as much, he pulled away just with his body, just a curtain which had covered much of everything around them, revealing a spear that was being held. 'We have been instructed to make sure they're properly dealt with and armed, but you needn't worry about being found out just yet, we couldn't be farther from that. We're more than anxiously trying to decay the breeds that are trying to bring us to the pleasing their off-set plans. Search inside of them, you'll find the greatest extraction taken from a measly little toxin that was found somewhere. 'It was deranged. Just by looking at the tiny purple pints, the sticks were nothing pleasant to look back at. Even more, there was nothing but a clean desire to make it start again. Pulling everything in place. That's how he wanted to end it, just there. 'On second thought, you don't need to look in there. For some reason, I think it would be better to show you something else. ' 'And what would that be? ' 'Just follow me around, I think this might interest you somehow. As long as you follow me, I think there might be a way to set some of the things right. 'Just what had he in mind? 'It was hard to pay attention to everyone now, especially since they were shaking so hard, unable to control their bodies at such angles. For what would seem to go around and turn around, only a few occasions lasted. It was a humane way of putting them down. Make no mistake about it. Every single resident was being checked constantly and made aware that they were being watched. Cylindrical roots inside their brains made it so not a single man could go unchecked despite their various statements given on the complete control instilled by the authority. Despite the passing rumors, there was no way out, no way in or out of the borough. By no means could this be held on the shoulders of the people, as much as it was a result of the Great Revolution, there was nothing there to even drag them into view. Closely called, there was only the strange entry into the cortices. There they were to be rewired. As wild as an extravagance as it appeared to be, when performed on a human being, there was nothing of the sort, more so, the mere contraptions inserted something to prevent any life-taking from ever occurring again. With the threat annihilated, there would be joy. Joy would be achieved. Joy was to be achieved and longed for. As the reasons for it were more likely to be held higher than they ought to be. Unreasonable though it may sound, there was a need to go forth and keep everything going and prevent stagnation. Regardless of the costs at pay, otherwise, things could end up like they were before. As for what was going on around, there it was. A plain comparison between the world before and the one after, Clark noted. He was staring through one of the windows at what appeared to be one of the old master's paintings that were digitalised. Most of them were lost by now, at the cost of paying too much to the nature of the past, no one had even expected such a thing to happen. There was no silence anymore. Not even when surrounded by them, the holographic critics. Placed around the painting as a kind of admiration, they were supposed to serve as the anchor to the old world, being a sight for them to go to at. Bunch of bollocks, he thought. Someone blew a rock-pop and blew the store a week ago. You could still see the burn areas around the rifts of the glass. 'One ride, to the Quadrant zone. No return. 'It was the last time I'd catch the ride. Full to the brink and seemingly dull. For what the city had to offer, this was it. Some bleak appearances and wild promotions, without a way out, it would be much easier to distinguish themselves from the others. High crests, and plenty of resting tables had been overlain on the general passenger areas. Two levels were there, mainly separated by a static bridge made out of completely frozen protons caught in stasis. If one were to bring the power down, it would be more than obvious what might happen next. Danger was murky in the water.

With little above the rims, it was plain, as it stopped to the nearest drop. A few helipads waited out there in the open. An orange-blue field of energy appeared to surround them just in case there was the chance for a drop to happen. Nowhere near it could you guess who was in charge. A tall Coverx Sargent, embroidered with a body armour and a para-visor. He wasn't to be messed with. Two other guards were adjacent to him, or so it appeared. It would be a pity to avoid him for that long. It felt decent, for the time it lasted, my life here. For a good reason and that as well, I had been so-resigned to the fact that I would be stuck here for a while that I started. There was a good reason they were there. Moisture spread in the air as well as you could see. For the same reason they were there, it was obvious they weren't planning on letting any of us get off an easy ride. Despite the uneasy flight, we were therea, around the operation site. More than a few good years would be spent here, as much as I was sure of it. Despite the strong access to antibiotics, the site was unforgiving. Not so much as the general indecency but the thing that came along. 'Try listening to me for once. Have I not been the reason for this change, I could've spent my life in the cage. 'The cage was swollen, lost to touch. No wonder for the living as they would branch themselves to the curving candles that were brought back. Each of them, of bronze and marble, would defile the things that brought the wonder, in their forgotten woes and plots. It was hard, so to either of the others there, it was a sham of. Daydreaming, in its current state had been delayed. From around the site, only a few long and thin signal curdories emitted a field of protection around the workers, which kept them safe. Despite the drops that would occur from time to time, there wasn't any wonder as to why the reason had spoken of it as of now. Nowhere near them, as it was clearly defined now, had there been a larger surplus of of the mad. There wasn't any way out, not with what was going on around. By that, there was no petty way of trying to get their attention. 'All of them are stuck behind their precious shield. 'But neither of them would be concerned with feeling around the strange feeling of mindfulness. Outside, sixteen fifty-five. It was not meant to be that way. With every shock that came out of its way, there was a way through which none of it might get to make as much of a noise. A loose voice returned. What might even be defined about them? Just by the way some might sharpen, none could say. No one was bothering to convey what was only the utmost perfect way of taking a life. Obviously, it should be set aside, that no one could make up or put it into the light of day. But forget about them, about everything so far. It was him, I recognised him in the groceries shop. You may not believe my first account of it, but I closely trailed around him. With little said, he was somewhat normal up to a point in his face, where it irregularly split in half. Just by looking at it you could've figured by yourself that something was off. By that I mean, he dug up a portion of it and then stitched it back, which was made clear enough once he started ripping through it from time to time to scratch around his frame. So far, there were other reasons for doing it. Most of them being related with the fact that he was hiding something in there. His eye on the wrong side of the face was, to put it strangely, crossed by many long sized neck-coated pieces. Spread somehow and even violently put to sides, shortened as his breathe left his body immediately before he could begin the point of recreation. He was damned by the very fact that he had difficulties breathing. Yet for some damned reasons not even I could explain, which had been as taxing as one could know, he cackled. With his precious grin revealing the spread. A black line of stitches continued around his body, leading downwards as soon as I could expect it to. 'You're not alive. 'I shouted at him, but he wasn't interested into listening to me or hearing about the reason behind my sudden emergence into it. Well, to be put like this, instead of trying his way, he conveyed only what I have come to fear the most. Grave though it may be, I had feared something more so than I could've wrapped my head around. It was his mere stamina and resistance, as he showed me. Captivating, as my attention appeared to be called to him, was the mere fact that I couldn't draw my eyes away from him was enough to signal my captivation. He hit one of the nearest shelves only to show his prowess. With as much as a single dent that reflected on his hand, I was convinced that there was something going on. He dropped his guard immediately. There, out in the open, he managed to remove the entirety of his arm immediately replacing it with a different looking one from the stitched side. It looked like it made its way through his chest, slowly digging and pushing until the point where it had been ever so unacceptable to think otherwise. No longer would there be substances in the adjacent bottles either. Perhaps he's done something to them. Come to think of it, I'm almost assured by my observation that it was him who managed to drain them of their contents. For no reason whatsoever either, he managed to completely fill his insides with as many chemicals as possible. Not only from an alchemical point of view but from that near maniacal aspect he produced. It was like a stain that spread around the nearest clothes, the nearest bottles, either turning their insides into steam or spreading around as if he was making a clear show for me to witness within him. Closely, he drew on, ready to expell everything he had carried on with him. After managing to draw as much as he could he opened his body from the head, in halves and revealed the other five exact-looking species that had been residing all along in him. Now they were on the run as well, spreading as much as one could tell without a reason to set forth. Clearly they were worth something to their kind. As their mere presence wasn't welcomed in the store at all. With the exact intensity increased by their mere presence here, I could say only this. I was exactly shocked by it, even repulsed by the fact that my own shirt had been turning into a strange honey-like substance, with all of the bodies in. I could see inside of it, going as deep as to see a stone circle in the distance, leading farther away to some distant place. With this whole idea being here, I couldn't even near a reason for which I could run. My legs were frozen and I had to reconsider what I would say next. As they all started and waited for me to reveal what I thought of them yet. 'I beg your pardon, dear man. Perhaps I had been a bit too rash when I had merely implied you may not have been completely alive. For that, I should apologise. 'Still open as he had been, the gaze of him still continued disturbing me for the same reasons I could think about. Either the adrenalline in my body dictated it or something else in the manner. I couldn't express just what I felt yet, without risking being trapped around them. But what I saw inside of him wasn't a body. No, it was the insides of a strangely curving door, which had the same texture as the walls that were leading further in. I should've known better than that. There would be a grander reason for it, better than what I should've dealt with. Well to do, in my turn, I was on-set on trying to get my foot in. Less than that, I was caught on by surprise after staring for too long. A distinct aspect of it had been the mere fact that there were less than a few key elements to it. Deranged even by it, I could only hope to pay for my own regard in it. For all those licken-like perilous growths that moved seemed to be shaken too often, as they were the only means of climbing and getting forth. It would seem like their worth as of species, distinct yet similar in their appereance, as much as I could tell came from the chasm from which they dragged themselves from. How have I come to know this tiny aspect they had shared? To be plain about it, a piece of my brain had been lodged off by one of them. Melting through the skull whilst being replaced by something of their own, soon to be called back. I was pleasantly surprised by the mere fact that they didn't strike me back yet. A few more rounds of stounchiness would rise. Farther into the depths, for as far as I could judge, there was only a single thing I could spare so long. Just by looking at it from a different angle, I could see just what was going on around there. Rising from the farthest corners, a great number of them had come into view. Somehow I knew this wasn't the place to be any longer, just because of the mere fact that there wouldn't be any way out if I had chosen it. Without my contenance in store, I had grasped for my spade and made it to the chasier, never to be seen again around them. None of the other people who were there seemed to mind or to get out of their blinds to indulge them. Avoidance couldn't even be the normal any longer as they frozen instead. Grazed by their fast moving bodies that sometimes seemed to be completely phasing through them, it was clear. I was the only one who managed to get out whole. Untouched even, as I wondered just what had been going on so far. Distraught by the mere fact that I couldn't focus onto I, my spade had done the rest. Farther than the spot where the shop had been, what I had done there will forever be prodded on my mind. A great hole, twenty feet in depth had been dug and in there I lay, after dragging the dirt over me until I died. Yet my fate had served as a simple reminder that there wasn't any kind of return to what I was doing. For uncounted reasons, I am still alive. Walking but never remembering where my last step had landed. Curiously though I may be able to think of it somehow, I think something happened to my face. Obvious thought it may be by the first mirror that I came upon, there weren't any visible changes. They haven't actually changed me into one of their own as I had come to suspect. Instead, they pierced me from the inside and placed something just behind the sides so I may be made to hurt. For that I thank them. 'Thank you my greatestes foes. Because of you I feel whole again, even though I may not be able to explain the reason behind it. 'It would be cruel otherwise, just to think about it. For my own sake, I could only hope that there would be some way for me to hear and look for them. But that hadn't been the plan. 'What is wrong with that man out there? Why is he talking so weirdly? 'The Grub remained. A piece of him had been brought there, even as a spectre. As he was unaware of it, the back of his head, where the piece of his brain had melted, where the others had decayed and went through the process of shutting down, there he was, blubbing and expanding over and over again. Indiscriminately pushing as it tried making a point for itself. Never dwelling more than he needed to. In return, he had been allowed to see and feel what this simpleton couldn't understand. They had been his agents through and through, working in his name, performing something that would be considered rather, deranged. He had been given the task of recruiting some of them in order to search for someone to get stuck inside the chamber. It would be recreated, just like it should be, after one of the surviving prototypes managed to do something or make something out of themselves. It couldn't be considered as something even less obvious than a fluke. Great though he may be, the Grub wasn't aware of that either, looking time after time to make a point out of it. But he was being used, just like those flat chambers leaping in the passages, straying away from the corpses as they continued powering the beacon of wombs. So many births had to continue that it was impossible or near impossible to keep up with them. Much worse than that, it would be clear that the strange smoke could drag on more than it would be allowed. In his mind, Charlton had this unique system so far. One part had been the primal information nodule which had reappropriated a piece of his brain into an arching cleivucle that spread the information of who might be able to survive the travel into the cage. Despite being ripped apart, as his soul and body would somehow be taken into the grates, there wasn't any way to tell how they might be able to make it through. It was up to it to work the senses and detect, record and point towards the greater men, the strongest women, the children or whatever might do.

Quantifiably caught, by this process at last, the other part of the brain had been underneath him, which granted the solidity of being aware of the cancer that was out there. Growing on the pluckets of sky, they were trying to come on and spread on the ground. Missing about as much as it could be help, there wasn't any way of knowing. Throwing through the ranks at last, the cost of sustenance was this. 'My dear friend, as I was telling you, I shall offer you a mechanical part, so you may dictate to him how he should move and live at last, being dragged and granted a piece of who he had been. Dour, you shall become him for a good part of time and instead of trying to push away, I know that I can count on you to make a great deal out of it and never disappoint me from the mistakes of the past. We both know where this road might end if we both fail. Of the many others I have come to encounter, I truly think you're one of the greatest ones yet. Somehow, in part, perhaps you haven't moved on and that I can fully comprehend and understand well. But know that I shall not force you to draw on unless you want to carry on by yourself. 'At least for the time being, he spoke of the ill tongue and spend as much time telling him that a part of an insignificant creature's brain shall be given to him, at long last, never at the cost of the dark. Lay as he may, upon the disgraceful remarks that might fall upon him again, there was the mirth of the passers. An exposure could be at least considered as being dangerous for obvious reasons, if one could even handle taking it by himself. Spreading through the mass, there was the cast of a single opening through which a single message was carrier, a dangerous saying that managed to be picked up from distance as well. 'The last side of the brain became active again. 'As soon as a single motion came, the buildings, the land, the mountains, the hills, the sky and the clouds, everything about them started being closely dissected by tiny line that measured everything and carried the information back to his head. It was a pump which the cortex had become. From it, enough could be drawn for the comfort he could draw to it. Some charm remained but it never drew on to bring some pain. Close to it though it may have been, one of the greatest. Immaterial horns popping out, a body that was made to charge came out. From the two cicatric head that dwelled on the back of its many tails, all split evenly but drawing an elastic liquid that hardened as far as it could go and spread into them, removed the closest appeal. Instead, they would bring in the feeling of a strong disease, pleasing for the eyes, listening to the cries of arousal as the two heads moaned. Looking at it from above would show much more, as the fact that the outer layer which was changing in shades as a chameleon would, instead he spread the many legs it needed to draw on. Flying with their help, when no one could even show anything to the side, where the crest of the blood lied, making way for the others to follow. Like flocks of desperate beasts, they tried getting in. At this pace they would somehow revel in the swelling this place provided for them. Otherwise, caught in the guise they showed, ready to outright plow, it seemed likely that they would be caught again. 'We're going to have to control this body together, Dour, remember that. Just the two of us for the time being. 'It was something they both agreed upon as they made do with it. Out there, upon on a largely exhausted, yet lighted field, there stood the denizens, inhabiting the cleft. From there, they could see the shooting rockets, trying to scar the sky. Before they could come through and spread the blasphemy which had been their call. From the ones that were still there, only the giant limb-like blood stings could be seen and counted forth. Destruction couldn't have been more imminent than it could be then. Even so, it wouldn't be called, felt like an unruly fall. From their grances, never tended, blood was spilled, some fell as pray to the ill and then. It was decided. 'We have found a suitor to be brought back. He will come with us and do as we say, pleased by our choice as we convey the message onto the others. 'If they didn't know what the reason behind it was, then it would be for the better. He followed them, even from the distance now. Perhaps this may not be the most obvious one out there for more than one reason. To even lay some claim onto it, there would none other than him who was showing off his knots. For everything leading to one side of his face had been as rather unlawful to spare. Yet he basked and crept as one would rather see less of him as well. From the various rubbing rolled up pipes that made up for each broken limb that fell, there were multiple emulations of various colors that had tempted it for all the nerves and the duress. It wouldn't do well enough to press through the mast inside his spine in order to steer clear of everything near him. Not only so far, as it came from a relative side. But he started spreading wild ichor-fumes that emerged from the discharges coming out of the displaced limbs that fell to his hide. From every blow he took on the nearest hole and uncanny arbor. Cut but unclean, it had been so for the longest while. Not to defile it too soon. He had been able to attune to the nearest of woes, somewhat uncannily caught and forlorn. It couldn't have been clear that it wanted to catch them there, aware even that Grub and Sour were in him as well. As he could lay ahead, dreading every second spent trying to catch the trail and beams of the forgotten pillars to his side, he came to realise that this world was more than gone. Already it had been accosted by a change. By the schism that produced only the repulsive frameworks that could occupy the subterfuge. 'It's time for me to declare, that I am the Chosen of Clot, bringer of uncanny Siskelot. 'He called himself as a wretch, unheard by them. As well as it could go ahead, the right to withhold himself from chopping the plains. However they spent the heirs of the lost time, it would be their business to alienate those who had been once alive. Not only so, but to claim it to be closer to the lookers would suffice. Cleaning thoroughly at the clock, better then than now, had been the touch of a headless separator who appeared, strapped to an hallucinogenic thrush. His chest was practically bursting with it, to the eye. Wholesome, it was just the sign of some derangement that never took off. For more than the obvious reasons, there were some exchanges that couldn't be accounted for. The schedule has to be changed in order to make a few changes for those that followed through. 'My dear Piers, I think we have guests this time around. I'd say, we should try looking into it from time to time and draw what we can. ' 'But Rork, we can't change it, don't you know that they won't likely spend too much time around here? Just look at them, it's simply out of the question. They will leave as soon as their job here is done. Not a second more for what I expect them to. ' 'And what gave you this idea then? Can't you see that there's a good chance they might fill this room with some kind of well being? If one of them were to step in, I'm more than sure we could make a well to do impression on them, well lasting as well. Is it not worth the effort we're putting in now? ' 'But how could it? I've never seen heard as vile and disingenious as what you're proposing. Just look at them, even from the distance, I feel like they're way too dangerous and unwashed to be allowed in. We're bound to get our arms and hand chopped if we consider it. ' 'Piers, that's enough now, I'm only trying to be a good host and change the schedule in order to accomodate with the guests. How else would I be making a name for myself unless I found a way to adapt and change for everyone when the time comes? 'Rork thought about the coming events, and the dinners and the types of people they were. It was obvious he had desired much from them, so much so that it would be impossible to tell just what kind of creatures they actually ended up being. Instead of trying to rationalize it, he attempted to act at fashionable as possible, even if it meant dwelling into the real of uncanny disillusion. For the same reason, peril would be faced again. And through the pain he felt, none other than him, would swallow the chill they started spreading around. First comers, now and then. A giant Illiapod came, as armored as their earthly counterpart, just a bit thinner on the sides. From being accosted by the others, he had only obtained that strange concoction of tails that spread around. Many watched from every side, trying to define as well of a mantra as possible, until it couldn't be caught. Coughing now from the inner-working inside the weak gaps, he pushed on a few extrusions that searched around. 'Go on and offer him a seat. ' 'May I clear one of the tables for you, sir? 'Piers tried decency at first. His best attempt fell of kind of quickly, more than it could've been expected in any case, just for the whole reason that there was a language barrier between the two of them. Less than expected, rather met here, there was the sole case of some kind of attempted mental domination travelling from each side. Both of them were unevenly surmised by the account of watching and unevenly stretching more than it could be shown. Thrown out of the window, there came the last hope that the day might not be ruined. 'They have come again. 'Fiends of the mirrors, two scholars of glass came out, leaping about as they enjoyed their change of pace. Strangely, as this space aroused in them more than a peculiar constitution that was needed to cut and slice. Soon they would be seen. Ready, within second after realising what they were, the Illiapod burst through the window, cracking through it in order to follow through and munch of them. 'Wait, you'll have to pay for that. 'Either one shouted. Ready to emerge, but they both witnessed what had happened as soon as he became their own. Chopped in pieces, caught off guard, the Illiapod had been struck around the gaps. Resulting into a single mass that lay on the ground, thrown about the sickly floor, without a wonder whether or not they would drag him home. Others were levitating in the air, completely ignoring the scene. For a species as advanced as theirs who carried all of their devices, which included those that allowed them to travel here in the first place, they were reckless and rather lacking in compassion and empathy. Wicked even, as one could tell about it, dreadful as beings and caught in their nets. The plasters would fall off them, unable to seethe between their feet. 'Why have you done this? ' 'What do you mean by that? Have we not been threatened by it?Has it not broken out only way out? ' 'Not any longer. 'Said the other glass creature, as soon as it began removing some of the segmented shells off it, pulling the devices out, whilst trying to work on them. It was somewhat difficult, but more entirely. Since the glass and mirror scrolls on the other side well documented as many kinds of fields as possible, it wouldn't be necessarily impossible to somehow work it out. Or even attune them to the right frequency that would lead them in the right place to start with. Plenty of minutes went forth. And for Piers and Rork, this was just the opportunity, the perfect time to learn more about them. 'We may only show this once so keep this in mind. These devices are made out of solid and biochemical materials, which made them all the harder to be worked on. But I suppose I could indulge myself into showing something you may enjoy seeing. 'Seething in the place, his hands had managed to work them well and reveal as much of an interest in them as one could show. Honing it for a few minutes had revealed the whole process. After removing some of the smaller skulls which had been completely hidden inside of them, both of them started storing the hard-encompassed things inside of them. Various tools had quickly by-passed their solid walls, without giving a single sign that they would shatter or break. 'And those? ' 'Good question, dear Piers. I think it would be best if you held it for a few moments. 'Both of the glass fiends merrily laughed for a few moments, out of the courtesy of watching. It would be fine to know that they weren't going to be abandoned so much as they would show what they were after. Drafts of glass would start going through the ground, hiding themselves until it couldn't be decided whether or not they would be seen again. 'You know, we used to be solid once. Not like this, thin and empty inside, but just like you, filled with some kind of meat and bones, a structure which made us much closer to you than those lifeless copies humans keep staring at. But perhaps that's not a of much importance to reveal here, to some unknown people who don't dare step out their boundaries. ' 'We're not unknown, watch your mouth know. I think we got a great reputation somewhere out there. Just around town and. ' 'That's now what he was talking about Piers. He meant, as opposed to you fleshy bones, we were of a different cut that couldn't even be closely related to you from any kind of view. We were white and moving, buds that could replicate whichever form we came into contact with. ' 'So you were imitations after all, just like the mirrors we were staring in. 'Rork spoke out loud, manging to perturb his guest to a sight of anger. Even through that transparency, it would be rather obvious to be seen. Out there, where the Illiapods came into flight and the ohter chargers followed through, grinning in as the streets were inhabited by the strangest people that could come into sight. Truly, this had been a strange day. Claiming otherwise, would be that. 'No, that's more of a lie, nothing of the kind could even be closer to the truth if you were to gnaw at it and find it in a pile of shards. We were only doing what we could to survive in there, as we tried absorbing as much information from them as possible. ' 'You'd better listen to my glassy scholar for a good reason as well. He knows what he's talking about, though you may not be able to tell it now. We've done our share and it got us here. ' 'Don't you mean there? 'Where exactly wer they?It hadn't been decided yet for a good reason, that being the fact that they've been brought to the luster, the strange action not even be called that. Strangely, it had been quaint, looking for a way in, never passing from within the whims of a watcher. But enough of it, this wasn't worth wasting time over. As their recollection was anything but ill-received. 'Know this, Piers and Rork. We have followed you for a while. We have shattered many pieces of the minds and the blinds and everything around the world. Even in dreams and memories and replicas, creations, whatever may you call them. For that you're bound to show something nearing the fear and distrust we're known to have received. For that is out nature and for it. 'They sunk in the memory, without needing to call back to it. Again, they managed to break the land, from a street, into the whiteness of defeat, the plumes of light, blighted as the ground and road shouted into a condensed blow of sparks, a show of flight being shown against one of the men who tried on running. Despite not being the right place to do so, they somehow managed to give into the temptation of showing in some interest there. Something which wouldn't even happen anywhere, as long as they were concerned with it. Plus, it wouldn't matter, despite showing they didn't trust the betterment of what would be. Never able to see past their arrogance as they were being done shoving everything they had taken from the creature into the ground. 'We shall retun here in case something's bound to happen. 'It was largely him, who had been at fault. The sole reason their their retreat had been that stranger who was trying to get away, Siskelot only now being there, in the general presence, whilst trying to make a scene. Not only so, but it showed at least a wonder, stronger than it ought to be. Unclear, unclear, unclear, that creature had tried shouting itself away. Through some blasted need to strike at the ground, it tired itself out. By whatever means possible, there was a show, better known for its fluid body composition, which stoon came out. From his chest, the door opened as soon as it could be caught off guard. While some were trying their best, it would seem that he could only push his body instead. Showing the lack of compassion for the other species that were trying to make it whilst climbing on the lichens, he had pushed them on the side. Enjoying the ride as soon as he could, never having understood what was going on. A far closer thing, a whim of drawing blood had come into him. If at the half-way point from climbing, they had found themselves shifting their shapes into look-alikes to that gate from which they came out, the only survivors would be the strongest species and the more deranged that even came to the point of pushing about an uncanny feeling. Stronger than the disturbance that was being passed around, he revealed some long shot, like bullets that popped out of his fingers, still connected, long and made of skin. With them he started drawing blood from the others, never losing himself from this grips he had on them. Not until most of them fell. 'Siskelot, servant of Clot, let me out. 'He said, the bloodfiend couldn't tell of whom might he fell down, with his strike and with the might. Who might dare show him the place about the wonder. Why wasn't he the strongest yet? Not a single falling cretin had acknowledged it by any means. It was insulting, rather worse. Worrysome for the cost of trying to look away, unable to convey the wonder, he lacked into the strongest shows. Feeling much worse, out there, he ran away as soon as he had been released. 'Grow onto them and join the feast if you can. Because, whether or not you like it, you shall find yourself joining us sooner or later. 'Not a single compatibility issue did adhere to them. As they gathered around from the standing grass, it was clear enough that they were losing interest. While being out there in as much as it could be expected out of them, the servants that had come had been set into a run of ages. Rather uncouth, their faith into the least believable aspect of Clot had come to an end. Frigthened by it, they chose something else for themselves. Unable to continue and rip apart the vestigial antler that were pushing out of their heads, they had been immediately punished as he spoke again. Siskelot had not pity for the traitors and pretenders. 'I had given you a chance to leave. Now I shall feel nothing for you as long as you can be amidst the lost covers. Leave my side, as you may never recover. 'With that they burst from afar, unable to be heard as their agonies pushed aside. An aspect of this had been already lost for better words. Strange, how the departure had affected him. With every strange species that would leave, they might find a way to breed out there. And with them being indistinguishable from one another, it would be much harder to understand just what was going on. Who was who and what did they amount to. Not so much as it would be an excuse, though they would have to settle with being stranded. Even surrounded by those of different kin that would perform the deed as if called. Subjugated at the last by a simple command, most of those who returned never looked back. 'Open the gates, open the gates!' A shout had given them way. Sooner than the succession, as if it would matter in the least, there was only the slight interest that would be shown, a missing piece that would be thrown at last. 'Cast yourselves into the chasm then! Let's see if you can fare well down there!' A sudden opening drew them in, like a flight of winds that dragged them within. Though this was no waygate alone, broken as the illusion faded, had been only the body that tricked the one looking into it as they began being converted. Smaller creatures, organs woe, they would shink in order to be placed inside the bottom of his toes, leading towards the legs and basin, all of them being piled and unable to get away. Through some way, if a normal man were to look inside, he could see only the strangest of heaps. All of the creatures contemplating the reason for which they were in. Siskelot had been a carrier of the most intrusive manner. Worse for the wear, he had been an intruder himself, never giving in to the greed of the lost manner. Remorse would do for some reason. Not to be misunderstood for their lamenting and the way with which they tired escaping with one another's help. No crab would last long as they would only drag themselves to the farthest depths. It would only be just to account for the lost of awe. Better now than then. He declared. 'I shall break the bridge from here and find a better replacement for the chamber. 'He shouted, the reverberating echo farthering away. It could not be denied anymore, as for the worse of thoughts, never to be brought back, it would last for only a few moments more. Being lead away, one could only bring himself through the trough, as to make it so evenly sure that there was a way to know. 'By the time this gentleman Dearth falls from the trough, a suitor shall be found for the room. 'Both Siskelot and Grub turned even from the distance. Though it may not be fully understood, the chamber had to be filled with a grand being in order for the plan to make way. To convey the death and advent, Agamemnon would remain a threat. For, in the distant past, when the world was still young, he ripped the rims of the unborrowing siege, that should've threatened them all between the Basin of the Architects. Where the Nebulas started spreading, with the gas being nothing but distressed by the fact, that they were being brought back to life. It would be interesting to know that they had embded themselves back into the throng. The Thorn had stopped, suddenly into space. From his sudden realisation that billions of spears had been pointed at it yet, desperately it had tried, despite the fact that there would be only a way out. Would it fade or be lost? What would be the cost of starting the siege? 'It would be pleasant, if someone were to bring it back. To push it where it hadn't realised what was going on. ' 'Why, that would be a matter of trying to push through the credance and the disease the cropuscular space carvirs prod into the sea of space. WQ, it should be called, as the few ones that are still in there, be bold. 'Little was known of the Thorn, other than the fact that it was ancient, and the fact remained. Inside of it, there was only a single mark that pushed itself to the point where it had completely embolded itself around each tiny crevice, as the face would cackle and make it so. Unevenly spent time in it would make them appear lost. Costly, even, should you be made aware. Despite the great assault not being ready and the mere fact that it would fail, Agamemnon turned it back, erasing a piece of its head, unable to continue so, to break the siege, as it would know the complete crushing of the universe. 'It turned around before it could see us. ' 'There might still be hope for us. 'Winged and chosen, between a piece of death and the living, bold and lost, throdden by the fact that neither of them could tell what it felt like being alive, they continued the progress, for the assault. Marching forth, as the living ship began making the preparation for the twisted crystals to be called into action. 'But where had he gone? ' 'Who now? 'It felt wrong. But neither of them remembered the dark magus that had been a necromancer. Instead, he'd been lost, eaten at last, as it would be revealed that in front of the siege, a new leader stood apalled, a lapplander's head who had stricken the side and the broth of the ship, readying it for the strike to begin. Inflated to the point where he had taken on the very piece of the front, he stood there, wondering whether or not he was to be called again, for reasons he alone would tell. 'We shall obey your every command, as long as you say it. ' 'Just say the word and we shall pray to do the best. 'Some spoke, behind the windows spares, being looked down by his giant eyes and the strange apperance he had led aside. It was a wonder tha he didn't give out just then. By sheer exhaustion, it couldn't be told, what the reason for drawing onward came to. With what was fair, this wasn't going anywhere. For what seemed to be the resistance, so far, faded. Less than expected, though it was. Worst of all, as it could possibly be, was the need for hedonism which had arrived. Despite the obvious attempts to repel the need, it felt like it tried pushing in. Less demented, as he had looked, the Lapp was largely misunderstood. He may have looked out of place, and in some way, he was rather off spot, but instead of drawing in himself, he spent the time recollecting the information more than he would've brought back. It should not be that numb. Crimson clouds followed through. As far as the border was crossed as followed, repugnancy be stilled. Siskelot could face nothing any longer. Dark hope still remained. He urged his body to produce as much mud as he possibly could. For the same reason through which he wanted to make himself taller, the others were plain on it. Cutting it short wouldn't be enough, even by looking at it. Time was not only limited, but the adversary would make himself appear sooner or later. As if it would matter first and foremost, he was greeted there. It would be hard for him to be satisfied otherwise. In all fairness, this venture didn't lead anywhere. There was a dead end which hadn't been. For whatever reason, everything felt dull now. I couldn't look forward any longer. What was the point of trying to get away? So many false leads lead to the most obtrusive places. It would not only be dangerous to assume there was a way out but foolish as well. At every turn, through every means. Perhaps it would be better for everything to be brought to a stop. For whatever purpose that might last, there was one way out. A single means of getting by, without trying to make too much of a case. Aleksey still remained there. He was trying so desperately to understand the circumstance that got him there to begin with. It was only now that he had been made aware, of the trees of Nyliamoure, who had come out of their way and started passing through the words of estrangement. Locked though he may be, it would be clear that he was to be given a peace of mind. 'What are you drowning your sorrows for, Aleksey?' 'One of the trees asked. Multiple tones only came as long as they would be called, living through the only reason it would go off. 'They are dead, Aleksey, there's no way for you to save them all. You need to get outside and make it so at least one of the Dinas survives. 'There was a hard task ahead of him, whether or not he wanted to admit it. Based on a remorseless scope, he thought he could plunder as many feelings around the matter as he could bring himself to. Generation after generation after Dina showed as much prowess as she had. Before the hemorrhage had taken her into the travel, before the sticks dissipating inside the ground, Aleksey had come out, calling. 'Is there no way out? Back to the village where I had come from?' 'You must've assumed that this would happen. 'How did he even know that? There were no ears in this underground garden of his. Without a way to know, he expected the worst, as if it would be a matter of saying. 'Just walk off. 'I will. 'But he had assumed he had done it so out of his own volition. No other reason would suffice either. He wanted to hope that she was there, somewhere, anywhere where he might be. In a burrow he could dig in or some similar place he could travel towards. It would be imprecise, though he had expected that it was for that reason that he found himself alone, shaping the plains with mere signals from his mind. And for that alone, he never returned, since he had known that the giant molders were that of theirs, his only friends he had known of there. Now, the whole crossed out pace was done for. It couldn't have been the light alone, the reason for it being gone. Even saying it otherwise wouldn't suffice for what was going on. A lightning hit and with it came the night. He knew this had been him whiffing away, from smoking a plume. The dark would swoon as it came to him. 'I have managed to raise some buildings. 'Not by yourself. Be careful now, there is no way to recreate them. And this alone is a reflection of Konstantin, not of yours. 'He wanted the sky to look like the sea, but shallower, like a bleak oil painting that would reflect what he felt then. For the same reason for which it would last, he accosted the perilous danger that came with him at last. A few cats were outside, followed by their long stretching backs. It was noticed by him, but he had admitted it there. 'I've done this. 'You should be aware that there are worse things coming their way, don't make the same mistake as we have, or else you may find yourself gotten rid off. 'From their backs, all elasticity unlike any other started giving in as the shallow forms started drawing them forth, into the farthest reaches of the rock-doves. A dolomite of less surroundings came to be. It would've been much easier to be plain. There was joy and pain and most importantly, a way in to give up. 'I could wait and die here and no one would miss me. If only I had the only way out. 'It was improbable that he would be heard not. Whatever remained of him would be brought back to a snippet of hurt. He was sober after all. It was a joyless disease he couldn't take himself back from. It felt likely to be something akin a riddle or some puzzle he couldn't hope to possibly surpass for some reason. He was trying to swim in a sea of sorrow, without someone to share it with. This choice may not have been the greatest one yet, instead, he walked in his own boots, unable to bring himself to a stop. There would be a long way for him to walk upon. Shaking off the rust off, burning the buildings down after he had just created them. Less than likely manifold, caught between the act of going on a tangent relating his younger days. When he had been but a man, lost for the time being, yet unable to comprehend what was missing from there. 'May I be allowed to leave now? If only for a little while, I promise I'll return as soon as I had my ride. ' 'It's not be allowed yet. Absence from this place might mean you may never return as you have been before. And for that reason we shall keep you here, until the change occurs. 'Without an explanation, there'd be no way to make him truly caught off the fence. In a trance form which he couldn't move away from. Flaws couldn't even remove anything from what the Lidden-Middens have become. Somewhere in the distance, beyond the world that had belonged to the drunk, this was to be the last key in defining the way into everything around. A land of peculiarity which was devoid of bland emotions, twisted and curled in the most peculiar forms there could be. Where the crumbling stones, the land of woes couldn't fit at all in the acres, there would be nothing more fitting then all of the defenders. Everything would be placed there for no reason at all. Nothing could remain whole, unless you carried on somehow. It was likely that there was something much worse going forth. For all the reasons he could think of, the blotched hatch still found a way of discontinuing what was to be a blocked way out. For all the world had been encompassed by a great shell which would be ingraciously upwell. Unable even to continue and push ahead, through the midst of a dreadful end. 'I see that you're still keeping everything locked. ' 'For what reason would you find it important to bring it up now? ' 'You're the head Magnificer, are you not? I see how obvious you are to the fact that you're caught by the antics of being alive. Even as much as you could fashion yourself in the most precacious manner. After many centuries of working on the highest inclined podium, you've not only grown in size, but you have also acquired what appears to be an intrusive way of being. Leeching off the minerals around it, just observe now. 'He brought with him a great mirror which would be kindly used for this sole reason, to show him just the extremes he had gotten himself into. Otherwise, this could be nothing but pitiful for the obvious thing. 'Ah, I see. 'Spoken with a serpentine tongue, it was obvious that he hadn't been alive for ages. For the highest peak of his body was brass, largely pushed aside with the spires that carried on from his back. More so, there appeared to be a degenerating awe that drew in the light, making him seem unable to carry on by himself. Supported mostly by the life-machines, he would stand there forever. Or at least until he was no longer considered fitting to be left so, now, to look upon his robe would mean that one would notice where the brass was thin. There, in a single degenerating or melting cut, one could see the tonal change in the bones that he had displayed at last. Ingenious even, to the point of watching, it would be stark to assume that he could be saved. 'You're a wreck of the past. I have come to realise that as well. Perhaps like would've been much better if there was a way for you to discontinue your research. ' 'I have been named the head Magnificer for a good reason, you know? It was because of my destiny being forlorn to the fact that I was bound to know something of the life here, beyond the shell. After spending so many centuries somehow,

I've come to realise that I'm yet to have found out anything about them. Everything unwell past the walls and not only that, but I feel as if their lives ought to come back and return to bring us what we lost upon the schism the land has suffered. There are tiny markings on each side, spreading as far as one could have the time to fully encompass himself into them. You may not know it yet, but they tell of everything that had been, ever since the beginning of time, where it was much more obvious to our ancestors that there would be a better way out. 'And what do these marks say exactly? That war had worn our people? As if we haven't been aware of it by now. Perhaps that our generals had activated the generators that ripped out many connected worlds apart?' 'I don't know, that's the matter of the fact. I can only read from the embedded pieces that describe where they were. Somewhere in the past, everything was lost. You know it started from only one spot before degenerating and spreading ahead, right? There couldn't have been a better route to look on ahead, right?' 'I would suppose it to be so. But what does that have to do with your time spent here all alone?' The great Magnificer revealed a second side of him which couldn't even be remotely pushed on, it dragged on and on as he drew aside some of the brass in his chest, until the very point where he had given way for some pain to be had. He had brought himself way too close to the disease of brass. 'Look at them, these were just like yours, once beating, breathing and pumping. They've all stopped now but I remain. Soon I think that all the time I had spent here will soon be rewarded. For everything I've ever done, for my research and the times I thought I would be lost if I weren't paying enough attention. I think my direction leads towards the outer rims of the shell, where I shall join the others as well as I can. 'And what if you're wrong about it? What if you'll find yourself trapped in a universe just like you are? I need to deliver this great information to the general information. Otherwise, we'll all stand at risk of being encompassed by it if we followed in your footsteps. 'But you needn't worry at all. As everything will be resolved by the time I shall be gone. Worry not for that reason, as I have decided that I am never to return to my home. What visions came to me whilst spending my life here had revealed that, once I shall be fully encompassed by it, there would be no reason for me to ever be caught returning here. If I may show any guilt for having left this place, I shall be in great peril as well as. 'We, we shall be put in danger as well. And I think you've more than realised that fact alone. Perhaps you must've realised that there's no way we could deal with such a great betrayal. 'He approached with a great desire to break him. Despite both the Magnificer being in good terms with the Diplomat, he was more than aware of what his quest meant to him. Not only so, but there was only one way to know. Not only was he threatened by this, but it was simply out of question, whether or not he could be gotten rid of as easily as the claim could come. By no means was he defenceless either. Despite barely being able to be sustained by the machines, he still had access to some tools around him. 'I think you're bluffing. Perhaps those devices are the only ones keeping you alive. What do you think it might happen if I were to remove the cables that are connecting you to them?' 'Suppose your claim is true. In that case, you'll kill me and your problem will be done, without even getting your hands dirty as well. Bravo, good sargent, caller of defence. I suppose one life is worth taking if it means destroying any chance of change. 'That's not the type of change that's needed and you know that more than I. What you're doing here is blasphemous and it goes against the principles, with which we began. Have there not been peace despite the fragmentation? You who had stood the highest of us all should know that there's little to no hope for us if we were to open our gates for an invasion. We rely on the very fact that we've been forgotten by our descendants. 'And what if we were not?' Asked the great Magnificer, as he started backpeddling in order to get out of his way, while still holding everything in hopes that he wouldn't be completely removed out of the life-hopes. It was truly a test of chance, whether or not he wanted to admit it, he couldn't figure out what was the reason for him still being alive. Either the tools or the brass, tool or brass, tool or brass, tool or brass. It kept popping through his head. He was unable to tell or even think about it any other other way. Well, to say the least now, he was unable to defend his stance. Would he jeopardise them all? Why not? It was on his mind, and after all, the Diplomat was right. Everything below them, underneath the platforms, the stages and the other legged standers addressed one great problem, the fragmentation. Everything, down from the beings, the creatures, the plains and the plants were unconnected for some reason. To put it this way, there would be giants made out of pieces that were largely detached. Yet for some reason, everything was still being kept together despite there being no reason whatsoever for this to be the case. One could see where this problem spanned from as much as he could understand that there wasn't a way to remediate it. Problems of these kinds couldn't be quickly fixed. More so, this curse, as it could be called wouldn't be resisted for long. 'And you have fallen to it just like everyone here who has remained. Can't you see that there's no way out of this unless we get help?' 'So it isn't about your desire for exploration any longer, it's about getting help now? What is it with you, Magnificer? Can you not make up your mind or have you fallen so deeply that you started believing your own lies?' He kept trying to avoid the subject by whatever means he could. It was understandable at first, especially since there was still so much he could glance over. So many of them were trying to live their lives, large mammal-like walker that had their fure become predators of their own, only to end up being double-headed, drawing ahead. One of its legs started showing features akin to some primate-like breed, that only drew on to become something of its own. Sometimes pieces of some land became reanimated as well as everything out there stood chance to repeat the same reanimation process. It couldn't even be believed any longer out of the mere fact that this had no reason to happen at all. Many were clueless and cruel. Societies were otherwise broken or abandoned. Giant mechanical units rested with no bottom parts, now changed into the most peculiar dens for the lower savages to come in again. 'Can't you see it happening already? If we were to break the barriers somehow, we could achieve a perfect union that might last. We could finally give in and terraform our world just like in ancient times. Just like the scribes had written on the shells. That's the reason why we're affected by it. The entire universe was once filled by some outer organisms that started creating everything around them. But in that process, they began crushing each other apart, eating one another raw as their rage continued past the stars. It was because of them that the world had been created and for the same reason, it's because of them that it had been destroyed. 'And that's what you want of it now, right? Can I at least get it right for me to understand the reasons behind your transgression. You want to bring them back, during an age where no living being could lay without being a fragment or a piece of this malignitude that occupied everything right? What would happen to us in that case? How might we still be alive? What of everything we have ever achieved?' 'You said it yourself, dear Diplomat, it would all be lost. For the same reason we're both here as well, I think your curiosity and search for an alternative has delivered you back to me. What you may not realise yet is that we might eventually be completely broken into pieces until the point where we would all face complete annihilation. Is that not a reason enough to avoid the destruction of all life? For so many living beings out there would give everything they have just for a chance to avoid succumbing to that fate. 'But what if you're wrong about it?

You've only known this life up here for far too long. It's impossible to know what might happen if we were to take our needs and try fixing it. 'My dear Diplomat, I cannot stress it hard enough that it's pointless to argue now. I know now that I had no need of the life-support device any longer for the same reason I came here to begin with. In my search I have managed to reflect upon my decisions as well as I could look on that of yours. They had all managed to waste their lives, though not by choice, by the mere fact that they existed in the state they were all in at the beginning of this strange experiment life had been. I cannot even stress how awful a life like this would be. Spent unruly in a world where nothing seems to matter, where we would revert to our last vestigial instincts before succumbing to death. That isn't a fate worth sharing with anyone, so I would assume to it. And for that I suppose, it's worth it, you know? Risking everything for one piece of living, for that spark which made us start creating in the first place. 'Before he could stop it, in order to find out more, the Magnificer pulled out the rubes out of his chest, showing himself slowly be pulled up against the shell. Slowly yet thoroughly he was being drawn, without leaving as much as a single mark where he would land. 'I shall leave now and make way, towards a greater place. If life managed to survive out there, I think there might be a chance yet for us to avoid the great stagnation and the complete destruction that is to follow on our sides. Otherwise, if my plan somehow plains, there would be nothing more to add and I will have resigned out of my position and existence. 'He spoke without a single shiver. Slowly, he was being drawn as if through some hole, becoming nothing else but brass particles never to be seen again. Where he had gone, he stood there, resting, unable to understand what had happened or what he might tell them down there. What could he tell them now, in any case? Since most of them weren't even there to begin with, this would be more than obvious to the case that, neither of them would keep their structural being long enough for him to arrive. It was pointless to hope them, more so as he waited. Not even more likely to be told, he couldn't be wasted in the peaks. Admist the agony that swallowed him. For each piece of metal that kept on, there was another rubbing off in the wrong direction. Not only as the key to leaving the place, being there for the reason his mind hadn't gone away, but he chose to wait. And as he had, there came the realisation taht there wasn't any way out. Not a single miss or hit, not a bloating reason to come it. Drawing to the world out of the rifts, where nothing would matter as long as they would reach their feet. 'What happened? 'Alan rushed inside Charles' room after he had heard him awaken with a shout. It was his wild nervousness which gave in the most unnatural dream he had. 'Alan, you wouldn't believe what I had seen. 'His eyes were wide for that very moment. He wasn't there in the same room with him for a great reason as well. It couldn't be told what exactly happened as the ache began all around his stomach. The smell of acidic garlic pushed through his nose. IT was hard to even realise that he was visited just that night while he had been alone. As if the face that bore the skull hadn't been enough, the warrior drew out and instead of him, the swollen image of the Magnificer came. He hadn't wore his brass armor, instead he wore himself in a tan of colors, the skin of an elongated figure that bore no resemblance to the human beings. No apparition either, as he simply touched and crushed the lamp around his room as he entered it. Without even realising what was wrong, there would only be a reason for him paying so much attention to him in the middle of the night. 'I bestow upon you some of my memories. With these I hope you will do better than I have ever done. My journey is over before it had even begun. 'Lain in waste, his robe of masses wouldn't prevail. Tatters even like the remains of a skin-crushing travel, he decided to embark on the ravel of woe. 'With these I can only hope you shall manage to out-do what I have done.

Where I have failed, you shall bring victory to what I have started. 'And as he was done opening his maw, from inside of him, a living kind of air began travelling through me, feeding the rightful information I needed to begin with. With the means of praying, the abstinence was done with and I could sleep again. My mournful gaze had fallen then as I had told the man who lived in the same apartment as I. 'I need to get out as fast as I can. We need to get out!' Followed through this sudden embrace, we followed through the door. 'How pointless it appeared to be. He had achieved nothing in his venture, other than the colors of languish. He was bent and ebbd by it, just outside, where he found the only way he could trust his companion, as if it would matter, it would come from his search. 'Slow down already, I don't know where you're taking us. 'It made no sense whatsoever. But it was time for the past age to go back into britting. Way less than some guile was shown. For whatever reason, we all gathered in the same spot.

As if it would matter. It was unfixable, a gap in the mind he had assimilated instead of trying to reason it out. Because of it, as much as he could tell, he found himself trying again and again to no avail, to get into the circuit that mismatched. Glory to the signals, near the long-watch standing a few kilometers away from where he landed. While he wouldn't descend from that point again, he chose the next additional step, going out of his way to find a way inside. 'Alan, I know this might be sudden, I know it might make no sense, but I want to hit me in the head, just hard enough to make a dent on it. ' 'Why would I do this now?' ' 'Trust me on this. I have a bad feeling about it and I can't stress just how important this is for me. 'Despite this request being somewhat outlandish, he proceeded to do just so. It wouldn't even work the way he had intended it to. Without a reason, this somewhat peculiar request would end up doing more harm in the long run. Broken even to the point where he had to rely on the strangers to do his biddings. 'I haven't seen you before. 'Charles wouldn't have been able to reach this far on his own and this was no miracle he could think of. Despite what he asked, he still found it hard to find a flaw. Raw bones still caressed his side, to the point where the train he left behind started drooling. Whilst looking in the back, to him at least, it looked as if the entirety of the bunker had been finely transformed into a passage, with everyone being either part of the walls or not there at all. Only his good friend Alan was there, completely encompassed in some funny alloy that prevented him from moving. He stood there, frozen and unable to do a thing. Not only would he try pushing it through but he felt likely to show some signs of drawing away. Not in that kind of way. But he was reserved, even to the point where his glowing eyes stopped emitting their peculiar glowth, revealing the complete state in which he was. Like some automaton, unable to heed his strange movements within the nearest corners he could approach, he tried suffocating the nearest two dimensional trapped neighbors out of some sick or maniacal whim. It was disturbing, just as a mere fact, that he was not only unaffected, but he would be strangely represented as a defect. A watch-uniform started waving back. As Charles turned, he realised that it wasn't worth running, not from Alan but from the cretion of blood which needed to draw closer to him for some reason he couldn't explain with his own thought. It would be much easier to explain the clunkiness of his knees and that fact that it wouldn't suffice for him to go on. Not only that, but it would be harmful to think of it as anything other but a weakness he displayed. It would be much harder to convey something as the simpletons showed. Depite this passage being thin, well, not as much as it would at least allow a few people to stand near one another forming a line, but it would be hard to contemplate on anything else but it. Seething would be pointless and unexplainable as well. Just looking at it made him feel unwell. Every building had stretched towards the top of the ceiling. Which, again, it shouldn't have been there, for no other reason could call it back, bringing nothing to fruition. An admirer's woe came there. It was unexpected and displaced or thrown from a locker of some kind. But Charles took a few seconds to look at the love letter, as he understood what he was talking about. Brittany was the name written at the end. Quite unnerving, having a second touch, as one would have to snatch it there. Yet, it would take too long of a time for the watch-guard to come. He could only listen to the sound of the lover as if he had written in before. 'My dear Brittany, how much I miss, the time that had taken me to find you, as the promise faded, you never came back. I still think of you to this day, even though my mind is ill and I'm desperate to do anything right. If only I had just the time, to make as little as I could set it right, perhaps there'd be no trouble there. And I might even be aware of a way of I might still be with you. For now I wait, like a foolish lot, never to come back from where you left me at last. 'Just looking at the handwriting made him realise how atrocious it was. There wasn't a single way he could explain the awfulness it seemed to bear. He wasn't of the same cut, about a credence that had been about. He wanted to turn on the jukebox as well, as well as he could acknowledge the fact that this passage had become something so great and magnificent that he could see the lights from the various appartments, and the other things that made him think of the quaint time he had spent inside. All because he wanted to get a tiny bump across his head, which prompted him to check it. 'Alan, you blasted man, you forgot to punch me in the head. 'Despite being blood there, the despot understood. It didn't belong to Charles, as well as the spectre dissapeared as soon as he observed the fact. Brought to him, he wouldn't care. Unlikely to be called, he wouldn't be there for far too long. 'Citizen-man, I need you to give me your post. 'Charles started rummaging through his pocked, trying to pick as something, as much as he could do. It was highly unnerving, just thinking of a way through which he could do it. Yet, there was nothing but some kind of derangement which made him think. What does he truly want from him? Should I sing and dance for whatever fate he wants to pass on me? What if I were to refuse? 'No, I think I'll keep the post to myself, there's no need for an identification here. Not since you cannot even pin-point where I live, can you? ' 'I suppose I cannot, but that's irrelevant isn't it? I can see it on your clothes now, you're from this sector. ' 'And what If these clothes aren't mine? The way I see it, they could've been left outside and picked up by anyone here. ' 'Yet they weren't. 'And that's where the promblem stamped itself past the point where it didn't matter whether or not he had been right. About this issue, a few others emerged, trying to get over the fact that this search was unsoltcited. 'You're not acting civil. 'Charles was apalled, he didn't understand what he wanted at all. It was an one on one conversation at least, for the ver few moments they had spent in each other's presence, there was no restraint which prevented him from freely speaking as well. Neither feeling would prevail for long, over the hedge. It could draw on for as long as it was necessary to guess that he wasn't interested in sparking a conversation with him. Both of them appeared to be too bored for this, as it would be called, a routine check. He even brought a small pack of notes he had been carrying around with him all day. For this officer to somehow act civil, there would be a problem with showing some kind of compassion for some who appeared to be so. Out of himself, as that was the only way his experience could be described. 'Round the watch-tower he went. 'Come with me. 'I followed through. Without showing as much of a contradiction between the spades, I had been a man out of himself, a snail no longer. Unable to realise just what was happening here, I kept walking in circles. Desiring even, something which had completely overcame me, of a conversation. I wanted to be heard for the first time and move ahead for no other reason than that. To socialise despite having spent too much time alone inside my insidious apartment. 'I should've been able to call it, you know?

Somehow, I think I have. Perhaps it stems from my short trips outside which allowed me to see the world being portioned into my room. Or I stood too much time in it that everything started looking exactly as it should.

'Everything was spat into place, as would I. This couldn't be anything but an atmospheric trance I had been set in. As the jukebox finally started playing some kind of jazz music, which changed the mood, the lower staircases began being lowered down, making me feel well about what was to come. 'Go now, I'm supposed to be taking you in for the interrogation. Do you understand? I cannot fathom looking away if you're about to make an attempt to escape. My colleagues wouldn't stop teasing me for that reason alone for as long as I can stand a guard. ' 'Don't worry, I'm going to do my best to make it feel like you got me out of your own prowess. Nothing should change as long as we're paying some heed to it. 'Backwards people, that's what they were. Up there, as soon as we came, everyone was turned around, but not with their backs. Only their heads were pushed onward as if they were placed on trays and offered for a diner. Their bodies were just as twisted, their legs crossed and the arms were pushing back. It couldn't be excused any longer, just showing some kind of admiration for the uselessness they showed.

Some tables were tied to the ceiling. Every Dictaphone was rewinding speech over and over in the wrong direction, going backwards, skipping tracts. And worst of all, even the coffeecups began levitating in the air. Each drop would do nothing else but push away. To say the least, the angst was unearned there. He felt unwelcome for some reason since one invited him to the table; they were too busy walking on walls. Without delay, they spoke of little tongues gnawing at the windows, trying to deceive the ones who thought they had been wronged in some way. It was much worse to admit the faults that brought them here in the first place. For a short while they decided to play games. As soon as the hatch closed and the staircase suddenly disappeared from sight, it got much easier getting to know them.

'New comer, you're a new comer. '

'But I've lived here for a long while. I'm not actually new. '

'That's now what he meant. I'm Jack-Ham-Four Blue by the way, it's a pleasure to meet you. '

He would be called Blue from now on. Obvious orders would suffice for the time being. Insufficiency aside, it would be much clear that no one was there for the full ride. They were waiting for the nearest chance to overcome them. That way they might actually come to get away and leave through the windows that were forming around the tower. Despite the existence of a few others that were nearing their use, these small fractions of hole would serve as their intergoers, drawing them in like air-hatchling set to flight, or bullets that would be shot. 'Catch this. 'A few marbels had been dropped in his hand. It was hard to catch them, but he had done it with much more ease than he expected. Despite that he wanted more, like a voracious person who couldn't have had himself thrown, perhaps lost, even to the touch of many, clearly cut from a grander piece. He tried to reason why they were laughing. 'They're eggs you fool and now they're hatching. 'Startled by them, he dropped all the hatchlings on the ground, seeing them spread inside of it as they ran about the place. Like plaques of red, carpented by the whole armoa of dread they produced. It felt uncanny, jousting against them and leaping out of the way. In the short shapn of their lives, this entire place felt as if it belonged to them. And for that reason alone, he thought of nothing else but trying to scratch at the windows like some cat in heat. 'Don't try it, they won't work. And the hatch below only opens when someone's making a lot of noise. ' 'Then why aren't you making noise?' Charles said indignantly, as he couldn't even fathom the instability of this place. Sharper things came into the tail of his eye. 'Look out now, they're being worn. And when that happens they would stop at nothing until they're getting a shot at their host. ' 'But I'm not. ' 'Come on, entertain them, dance or be stung. 'He could barely stand. It was impossible to resist the spice of their appearance, the scent drawing near, the thought of boiling and eating them being on his mind. If anything, he had either been dazzled by their speed, or trying to hump at his feet. Regardless of the preciseness of what he's done, it was time for him to mess around. Charles took the initiative they all wanted him to take. Though they may have been caught by the need to drink and to push themselves past the ink, now they paid attention, curiously wanting to see what was going on between. Not only had he danced for them, but it was obvious that he wanted them gone. Farther away that it he should've done it, now came the time for a choice. Would he leap here or there? A few paces away he could almost see their motions to the point where he had almost lost himself. If he had picked the wrong side, he would only end up losing a toe, perhaps more. For that reason he was weary of waiting, of wondering and being guilty for what he'd done. It was necessary for him to believe that this place was his home now. Caught in the manifestation of a place he had wanted to run to. 'There, you missed me you tiny ravagers. Angry, angry, tiny ravagers you are. 'With every missed sting they became annoyed. So much, in retrospect that they began smoldering with rage, it was a fool's errand to try annoying them, especially since there was almost a great chance they could get really aggressive. Extremely so, to the point where even the other members of the watch started getting up in order to twist everything back in place. 'You'd better grab something and hold as hard as you can. 'Said Blue, with as little of an idea of what was going around as he himself hadn't known. It was rather fast, the way in which everything twisted and he ended up on a floor of glass. 'I told you to hold it. 'Into place, they made it closer, drawing near, trying to make it for a strike. IT couldn't be thought as an attempt, but a failure at his life. Stings missed his neck by a mere set of inches that came as adjacently as they would. Had they only come it rows, it would've been much easier to prevent them from coming forth. Danger was alerted. Their heads started producing the light. 'Crotten-Barthollomew-Five-Zero-Clue, grab something now and make this place stop. 'It was neither the place nor the time to ask about it, but I could almost feel myself being blown away by their unique control of the surroundings. As strangely compact of a place as this had been, it was obvious that they were almost lost themselves on the whim of a single man. 'We should reconsider what we're doing here. ' 'Not a single word. 'By the looks of it alone, they had plenty of unwary contraptions they should've accounted for. It was noon now, despite everything accounting for a different hour. Perhaps it should've been better by now. After all, no one dared complain for as obvious reasons as they could spare themselves. It could be more likely that they saw themselves unfit them. Just because the dazzle which had occurred twisted the hatchlings into place. 'That should take care of them. Now, Charles, if you don't mind me saying, would like to join us for a cup of coffee? It's on the house of course, if you don't mind the steam. 'Vaguely threatened he came near. Never had he realised just what the implications would be like. And for that he simply joined in. Now he felt well, for some reason. After walking with the same defiance they had shown, it got much easier to throw them around and pass the sugar, right in place. Milk would be used as well as he could stand. But he had been invited to sit, and it hadn't been all she wanted from them. For as long as they would stand it, there would be better ways to express but. It felt like he had been served a drink from heaven. It was unlike anything he had before. The taste was magnificent, the backwater inside the cup bore a fragrance which couldn't be compared. To him, this restless hope had only come back for a few more seconds before he had joined them again. Wondering just what might go outside again. He couldn't feel anything going through his stomach any longer. For the few minutes he had looked, he noticed a great deal of things happening outside. If it were for him to describe what happened to the spectre which had followed him, he'd only think of a vague river's mist that started flowing and drawing away into the air. Without the fair chance to look into it, he resorted to thinking of a way out.

'It's pointless. 'Blue said, while he had looked into it as well. Without telling, they all shook a single sight, they stared at him with deep gazes, trying to make him stop. Clearly, neither of them wanted to withhold it from him. It would not only be interesting to know, but it went as well to show that they were all cutthroats as heart. And neither of them would be as reluctant as to show that they could backstab one another if the chance came to arise. Plenty but less, it would distress them if they even considered showing up after the dark. 'The sleeping hour is near, I hope you're used to doing it on the floor because there are no beds in here. ' 'No beds? No covers either? But what am I supposed to do in case it's getting cold outside. How could I even show remorse to what's happening if there's. 'If there's even a chance I could get out. Everyone turned. Would this citizen find a way out before them? And on his side, Charles thought about it for a second. Just how many other people like him had come here to begin with? It was truly hard to know or guess at. Just now, he had considered whether or not there would be a way for him to pay less attention to it and know. Just what matter of business were they performing after the dark would show? A silent law came into question, an unspoken rule. No one made a single noise, nor would they speak of what came next, oh joy. Strange lanterns started coming in. Yet the lights they produced were illumescent-dark, which could only be seen by those who touched and held them at last. But the lights didn't reveal what lay inside the room, just a few centimeters from it, that reflected on the bodies of their holders. Creating the useless deranged effect, the reflection of what would creep inside them, if that were the case. It was a strange feeling, a violation of the body. Yet this had been endured by a few. The longer they held the strange lanterns, the more they would be revealed, until they could see through their own clothes, then the skin, afterwards, the muscle, the bones, so on and so forth, until there would be nothing. One of those lanterns came into the hands of Charles. He had considered the reason behind him staring into the abyss and the reason behind him never letting go of it. He could see why the others were reluctant to warn him. Clearly, as it was called, this was his initiation. As clear as there was, the passage was all his. Alan walked, slowly caught off and blown by some bits that were spread around him. Despite the thrashing of the walls, he tried deciding what the reason for it was. Not only had he not been a part of it, but he couldn't understand why there was such a huge structure stuck there. It stood up, poignant to the point where it looked as if it tried pushing through the ceiling, breaking some of it off. Clearly that hadn't been the way. It looked vaguely caught, brought to some fruitless conquest, pointlessly he walked. He hadn't a voice. Instead, he shone the point of a double-sided flashlight through his eyes. Like ciphers looking for someone, he inspected the nearest peg he could land his hands around. Only then had he noticed just what had become of him. Without a proper explanation, he missed on far too many things, because of his decision to stoop low on the reactions. It was unfair, they weren't there. No one guilty enough could spare the wares. All of those ingracious bastards would hide inside flat walls. Unable to get back at him, as he simply jagged a tiny spike latched at the edge of a lost boot. It was a complex yet slightly intrusive procedure. For the same kind of interest that lay ahead, he dragged it over far too soon. He had looked out of the shingles, with the stars all alinged, placed in the most unexpected corners he could try his hands on. With as little initiative as could be involved, there was the need to draw along the curb. His fingers met the metal case and as soon as they were able, they had been lost somewhere. He tried compensating for his loss, without a care for the fact that his hands were never to be used again. Reason need not apply. Apalled by the fact that there wasn't any other way he could touch anything without risking a further loss, he chose the only decent thing, that being, going forth. Unknown to him, as much as it could be guessed, he had undertaken the task bestowed upon him by Charles. Who, he himself was nowhere to be seen. In some better days, he could've sprint through the passage, but now he felt far too heavy to do it. In order to even attempt something similar, it would take him more time to think around. Just by this mess of turn, this muddle of networks he had been lead to, he failed to understand just what reasons would there be for them to be sliced together right in front of his eyes. Momentarily, despite the quickness in which it had been gone, there was nothing as clear as that. An illustrated hall of gaping wounds-like slits of people went in, being closely deformed and long-legged as they mourned for their many losses. It was much harder to focus on them by default as everything else forced him to take notice of them. He had just witnessed what he had longed for so long. There were fewer things that appalled him there. Just by judging by the details in the crossed-out lanes that brought themselves near the band. His legs felt much lighter as they were dragged farther than they should've been called upon. Now, to claim it as it were, he was out there for a good reason. With the departure of the good-fellow, he had less than a few alternatives to make a change to what was going on around him, being struck into the body of a tourist. Left alone to a venture which needed no guide and no one to tell him he was wrong. 'Hey you, stop there for a moment. Could you help me out with something?' 'The thing which spoke was flat up the the lips where a key-hole was placed. Unfortunately, there wasn't any door. Instead, a brick wall laid in place, pushing on as soon as it could be touched and scorned for no reason. Despite no obvious pointer, he knew what he was aiming for. A cigar near both of their feet, where they intersected one another, whilst paying no attention to their bad habit. Both of them shared it, or he had done it once in the past. Nowadays it was all over, as he had only given in to the fact that he would never have any finger placed. No touch for him, not even the kindest embrace he could dwell on. And it was much worse, considering the fact that he would've smoked it himself without delay. There wasn't an immediate response. He hoped he understood it, until he threw on a second look. Oh, right, his eyes were stuck in a single direction, looking forward. With a lunging buzzing, he couldn't do much, other than the weird way through which he had attempted to make something of himself. Short-way said, he had failed, leaving nothing but the illusion of movement as he was shaking in place. A tendency was there as well, though he couldn't do anything about it anymore. As much as there were others in need, searching for him in order to ask some favour, or some kind. 'Here, I need my hair-brush, I think I lost it somewhere. So, would you please step over and pass it to me now?' 'Woe, as much as it could be, had nothing to do with this choice. It was wrong for many a tides, less than it should happen as well as they could release their cries. Over the span of a few days there were some off-putting events that happened. In a circuit of eight, they went as far as they could occur for a few minutes at last. Night became day several times until the cycle could somewhat be over before it had even begun again. Now he wondered where did the one man with a key-hole in his mouth gone. It was strange, simply admitting that he missed him somehow. Whilst trying to open his mouth, only the sound of intricate devices could be heard, unrelated to anything a human would make. It was a somewhat peculiar dead-giveaway that things were getting much worse from now on. The passage wasn't made to be traversed by anything other than human, which was the very case for what happened here. No lack of appeal would gloss over the transparency of the tin-case he was. Walking there made him uncomfortable from the outer-aspects of the spots.

Where sometimes he had remembered going around, yet there was no explanation how he knew or how he had gotten in that spot before he moved on. Everything was so limited, static, even, like paintings that were unrealised. Some ethereal plane was he in, that soon dragged him deeper than he should've been. 'You will have to go ahead and pick something for your friends. They'll be waiting near the mid-way point near the spot that was once your house, the horizon and that. 'That voice said too much. It stopped itself from giving way too much information that it should be expected of it. Moreover, it would be grainy, looking at the veiny plain there. He was out there, but unable to look away or question what their reason were. For that lone, over the fact, he had lost more than enough when it came to questioning him. What did he want from me? Sprouted from his mind, he had even commenced to probe around and feel everything around the place, in search for a way out. Luckily for him, there were fewer things that could still be tried. Less than would it be denied, there was the breaking of a nail which startled him then.

Suddenly he couldn't tell where he had been and who had seen him in that grith. It was more so probable that he wouldn't make any noises any longer, as he attempted to stave all of them off. Filled with the bitterness a mercury tongue, it happened. He had been stopped by Charles, made out of the same material at that. The two of them were alike now, just like they had been before, with one great exception which had been the fact that yet again he couldn't even move his limbs like he used. Unable to fully get used to this, he chose to point onward, towards the direction they would be drawn towards. Without a way out, to see, he was freely able to flee with him. Together lost, like toys of metal made by forgers of the dusk. Yet Charles had also remained in the watch-tower. Having spend the night and day, the various cycles which conveyed a certain level of frustration, he found himself unable to look on. Rather caught by the smell, he asked, if any at all knew of a way out. Again, they were unlikely to give an answer for some important reason. Why haven't they rushed through the stairs if there had been a chance for them to get out of there? 'It's obvious, or it would be, if you had spent a considerable amount of time here. Otherwise, from the looks of an outsider, we've been pointlessly standing here with nothing of our own. I say, you should reconsider your stance and the fact that we tried, we actually tried, time after time to get through. But only one at a time would be allowed to pass. Even for a short period of time, unless we faced the risk of becoming encased. Just like we used to be back then, when we were allowed to go wherever we pleased. 'It was the best time they could hint at. Before all the marches inside, everywhere outside being locked, to that, it should be duly noted that there was only one way to redeem the choices. Point taken so far, as for everything else, there wasn't any other reason to fret over or to look into, for as long as it took him, though, it didn't take him long enough until he started thinking about what life had been for him there. 'Watch me try making it for one of the long distance plumes. 'Wherever that may lead, it should be noted that, they were both at a loss. Blue and Charles. 'Out there. 'It was another intruder who made his way. He was depraved. Just by the aura underneath him, circling around, like an enveloping myrk that changed in shape at the sound of his command. 'Rise now. 'He spoke, and with him all the mad candles provoked him to begin again.

There would be no better satisfaction than trying to approve the ill. By the devices applied to his hood, he revealed only a few features before he retreated inside the nearest structures, if any could fall for it, that happened next. Yet he had something to long for. By the time he came back into the open, he had a scepter and a strange hose-like connector that went through his neck and body, everywhere around as well as it would be obviously seen. Without giving in too much, he had failed to the test of distance as the scepter started cackling at last. That had been a treacherous move, even for him. Not only had he been thrown off and lost, but there was something clearly wrong in the way it tried popping off its jaw behind the forehead. Somewhat attached by the brows and the nostrils, it started simply by attempting to draw away, pushing through the feistiness they were displaying out in the open. For now, it was hard to see why he was there at all. Him, who'd be a stranger, if anyone could call him. There was no spirit left in any of them. 'Of course I had seen all acting up, I dare say that there was no reason for the scrutiny I had received then. Even by their standards, I was there for a reason. Perhaps I hadn't exactly known or understood it but I could almost swear to it, the profane feeling had almost come to me now. 'Not to dwell for far too long on what would appear to be inductions of glucose, which turned him back to examining the place, but this had been out of question. For obvious reasons as well, he was trying to figure out where had the lantern went. Henceforth, the question arose, and as soon as it came, the faster had it disappeared before it could be tried again. Two more point of having known nothing better. It should be noted that they all gave a couple of different iterations of the same answer, leading him to believe that it was true after all. But how could it be? Though he had searched himself around the chest, there wasn't any saying as to where the marks might've been. If the lantern had indeed entered him, it would be more than obvious that he'd know it. 'It's already too late for that, friend. The lantern is not only gone but with it, so had the aspects which turned you into human to begin with. 'What do you mean? 'He means to say that the abyss inside of you has been completely filled with some loss. 'It was an even field, as much as it could be expected. There were lows and highs. Better than paying for any kind of tie, that he were, he stood there, looking at how easily they spent their time smoking. Even so vaguely interested into doing it again, but what had been that? Out there, in the waste, in the place where the passage hadn't even been there to begin with, they walked. Domed and struck, the cyborgs were brought to life, as one of the few good-dealing that could be had. It was only through this good experience that they could somehow be brought back to life, in a less expressive state. And each of them were trying to out-do one another in the fight against the strident plainers. Coming from the strangest places, widening as more of them approached with their high-pointed guns. From each side they struck metallic bolts that put the Stidens down. From as wide of carcasses and weird-a-masses as they could be held, it was obvious that they couldn't be held again. Not at a gunpoint, not to be released. Underneath their large plaster-like falling debris, nothing could be held again. It would be more tedious than anything, but they had to do it. 'Skin them alive. Our masters need to push them around and make sure everything is done with. 'It was costly on them. Just by looking as who joined them. A second apparatus of retractors came from their behinds. Within their forms, eight cyborgs and four androids could work towards making them full again. Despite what they consumed out there, it was obvious that underneath the armor, a living creature rested. More than that, there was something that needed to be said. Their armors weren't made out of the same cloth as theirs, but instead appeared to be bio-chemical, yet in some way looked like the insides of some pomegranates, all of which amounted for damage control. Nothing could get past them in order to penetrate them.

What would be even more awful than that, as it could be cleaned off immediately, was the need to put either of them away. It felt like there was an old memory there which couldn't be conveyed unless you took it off and relived it on the otherside. This was out of question, as much as it could be said. They were the Contol unit after all, armed with nothing other than their fists. 'Urrrumurrr. 'Grunting now as soon as they came into position, some indo-knowledge had been attained. Whatever they were doing there had nothing to do with the strangeness they showed to the others there. It would be much more likely to call of them as soon as they left the place. It would be more likely to find them disgraceful, as for the other kind of of perilous attachements they grated the place surrounding the victim gave them the feeling that they weren't wanted, nor needed either. It was a strange realisation that passed between them. Neither of them knew what to make out of it. But hey were standing there, grunting as if waiting. And then, it all paid off. Slowly, from their strange and disgraceful manner, something sprouted even longer from the body long defeated, a stalk-like rot that lighted their many succumbing spheres, until they had made it momentarily levitate in order to be pulled in. What came after was a need to bring on some suction to the ones hiding below. Though it had been largely unknown to most of them, this proceedure served as a long, largely extended root channel which led below, to the entrance of a ship where men and women could be used as they were pleased. Changed into some useful beings that were kindly to be reformed as fuel, well, at least those who weren't turned into food. As for the ailment they needed, this would do. With each appliance and each of strap, their voices could be heard as they beeged to be released at last. It wouldn't be forgiven nor forgotten, what had happened here. And for this reason they could be welcome to try again. Less than it should be accepted, they were whailing because they were in pain.

Thought demolators, demonstrators, units of the grunt. In reality, they had been the head pieces of the great leviathans which had been ripped apart and repurposed for this. Not unlike them, as it could be said, there wasn't a way out. Not while ratting each other inside the abandoned buildings taken in the name of the great gangs.

'Urrrurrrururrr ururrrurur urrrurur. 'Came the thunder, never seething, nor contending with the batterment they showed. As soon as the pieces of the giant creatures had been taken apart, the cyborgs and the few resentful androids started following them around. Everyone wondered about them for a good reason as well. No one could tell where they came from and why they took the lead so far. It was a chance for the better, a disease no longer, not an illness, the ailment be called. The sound-foam, it had been used for a good reason there. One of the only deliveries which had been carefully given by the Great Industry was lodged in some place only they knew the end off. It was much clear now, just what the purpose for it could be taken from the ground. Not only that, but they were playing favorites, exchanging glances of defeat. Cursory trying to get into each other's way, as both the machine-like hybrids were so different than one another. Clearly no one could be a winner, or lose as well as they might tell. Each of them could fel well for this one moment. 'Look now, as I have told you. We are of the Obsidian race, there's no rason to doubt me, I, Khelungresh Hunyr. Doubt me no longer for what I must call. 'Shame would be called back.

And for that reason alone, they were brought back to life. It was uneventful at first, how they spoke to the worst creations yet. Sculptures made out of the human-hybrids and the other jelly-like alloys that they could find around the planet. Despite the strangest courts they had, nothing had been decided yet, to be done about the being that had resided on the place where they defeated him. Call again, mourning in pain, there could be something to be done about it but not again. Some things couldn't be changed, no matter how one tried pouring himself it and dragging over. For far too long had they taken pleasure into their shaping of material, only to be met now by the consecration they had made. All of the sculptures had now been just as likely to be alive than anything they could spare. It was more than obvious what they were after, just what they were looking into, and what the reason behind it might be. 'I shall start by removing a few pieces of him, rightly so. 'Far too many problems sprouted. It didn't feel like it would rain today. For the same Reason there was no one about the other site, there was no cloud and nothing approaching the nearest horizon. Though they had somewhat manipulated the weather with the high peaked tops they made, it hadn't been completely under their control. Other things got in the way, such as an immerusable need to deal with the aspects they created. Despite the obvious attires of dirt they wore, it was more than clear that they were not of the same breed as anything ever seen before. A glorious lack of hope still seeped in. Curioisty had been aroused way too often to be forgotten there. And when life had been thrown in the mix, they crept between their ranks. Even though they stood still and had no ability to communicate, they shook themselves and somehow gravitated towards the conversation despite the lack of obvious entried being shown. Abhorrent looks crept into them, especially during moody nights. When the stars alligned, they only appeared to be moving faster, yet in place, they made a lot of noise through their wind-tunnels, never after the dark. It was agony that was felt at last, by everyone watching and everyone disturbed. Without the need to show something for what was going there, not a single mass would stay. 'Not a single one should stay. We need to bring back the council and talk about this immediately. This issue can no longer be postponed or avoided for the obivous reasons that they shall soon devour us as soon as we let them. 'For the time it lasted, that was clear, nothing nearing the remarks had come to and end. Everyone was focusing on one thing or the other, the northern ones, the southern ones, until long, they had been surrounded, pounded into dust. Either of them could've extended their fingers thoroughly inside, as to sneer and leer their way through. Most of them were yet unable to do it properly, ending up creating more borroughs and more windpipes for them to make noise through. As flashy as it appeared to be, there was one important detail which hadn't been assailed yet. Despite everything spoken and said. Moving farther away from home, it was necessary to believe into something, as much as they were telling each other what was wrong. And whom was going away, into it. Disabled crooks had been met again. In the mouldering remaines of the creations brought back to play. It felt unnecessary to believe that what they were doing there was right. After all, they hadn't been exactly produced out of any kind of wool of any piece or tool. Instead they appeared out of nowhere with the sole reason to get to the brink of forming a road, farther away, more than it was needed. Past the necessary bulks and the wretched that brought about the only function they could wrap themselves around, it was obvious now. All of them were in it for themselves, never interested in hearing about one another's torment. Though they spoke in different tongues yet, it was obvious that they could push on and creep in, dealing with the lack of peace and the uncanny rythm of eating their way through each other in order to get higher towards the heights. From their dealings, it was more than obvious that not a single member of their clave could deal with the stress of slowly falling apart. Just as they were eating and forced to form a larged bridge for the others to crawl from behind, the way ahead could slurp in. Less from the falling, more from within, up until the cruel emphasis, luckless in wonder, the wind wasn't going to get stronger now. It'd be more than impossible to account for such a loss. Costly, even to the point where they had paired themselves with one another, making smoldering amounts of battering trots. Sprinting around each side of the canyonette they had remotely created, it was obvious that they wanted something much better, less so. It could be needed and thrown away, to side and in the ride. Access would be denied, even to those who happened to be there for a reason. Largely, it had been, though no signs were seen, a problem into the decay. From the falling organic-debris that came out of them gave birth to mosquito-like kings. Archaic in the way they seemed to be growing, even remotely accessing the way left behind. Whereas their counterparts tried climbing, they would do the opposite. Instead, trying to get as far ahead, in the opposite direction where they might stay. And wait for something grander, a mouldering disaster to bring them back to the shouldering access. Into the least frustrating cutting press that waited for them to arrive them. As a remnant of a different time, to the tip of a dime, it had tried pushing on, clearly at a loss. IT would be much better to accept the entirety of their deal. Most of the flying clots would be smashed and forced inside the envelopes, manifested as blood as their forms were lost. From that point they would succumb, to the various nettling hands that dragged them on and pushed them through the porticullis, trying to get them as far as they might. In order to be read, they would have to be interpreted again and again. Until not a single one would do. And less than that, it went off. Likely left alone, they could destroy the planet on their own. At least that was the general consensus, for the time being. Wrapped around the broken seals, decrepit to no woe, furthermore, they would be stopping in order to aggrandise the fear. Everyone dwelled on it for the sole reason that some day it might come and haunted them faster than it should be said. With every strike from an Obsidian, the mountainous shaking statue would cause some organic pieces to fall. And from the nearest sides from where they'd hide, neither of them could perceive it again. When it came to it calling again, the voice stopped being heard. It could never go away. Wherever mixed with it would matter. Explain it, the thought came. Though it couldn't prevail entirely by itself, there was a time and a place for everything. And the more obvious it had become, the easier they would adhere to it. Without the care, they weren't there for too long. Not a single man chose to pay his fare. Obviously, fewer than usual, though they were inclined to it now. As worshippers were dully so, most of them taking it far closer home as they dug a can of worms that should've remained buried. Of course there was a good reason for it. I've come to the realisation that I didn't need it, any longer. Said the voice, with as much force as it could carry it with, feeling contempt for the first time. That was the last thing I heard coming from the ward, from inside the nuclear submarine. It was safe to say that everything inside it was a mess. For what would seem to be the last chance to achieve anything of worth, after this there'd be no looking back. Completely abandoned by them, without any human contact in months, it was the sole reason they could ever think off that came remotely close to showing. It wasn't a prison, a shrine would be more fitting for the undercurrent inside of the submerging cylinder. Dwelling too deep inside of it would mean that there was no way out. Ever since that lousy day when one of them climbed inside the later, they managed to crawl just about in every place they could find themselves in. A few of the inmates-disciples were startled by the very few tiny cockroaches that appeared out of tiny honey-amber beads that were spread about the place. Less interestingly, this could be placed only on them, for the sole reason that there wasn't any way out. There was pain in the gratitude they showed. More than a few reasons lay behind this choice, as some of them started pushing some of the amber poxes inside their mouths in order to prevent them from spreading. How long did that last? Of course it didn't last long. It didn't even last a few months before Malt left again. He felt inadequate for some reason or another, which prompted his absence initially, that culminated into him completely abandoning them. As well enough as it was, he had embarked on the submarine, with his only desire being to get as far away as possible from the scene and from the plan. He wasn't virtuous, nor completely defeated, whatever that meant. He simply left. Without any kind of trace, he relied on the metal frame and scaled the place as he descended inside it whilst lowering himself down at the time they had docked around the surface. There wasn't any welcoming party there to greet him and most of the other men that were working appeared to be disinterested in him or the others. See now, they were in dire need of more hands across the place. It couldn't be thought as anything else. It was definitely something he didn't want to gloss over, as much as he wanted to think of it again. When have I left? He thought then, while mopping the floors. Of course, he hadn't received any training in anything else, but there was a real reason for that. No one complained about what they were given, and no one wanted to change a thing despite the obvious wonder at the lack of light. For those who came were nowhere near getting used to being this deep under the sea and most of them had no clear consciousness about it either. 'It was somewhere near Easter. 'The date was somewhere in the middle. And just about everything else was at a loss. It was less than clear what the reason for it were, or why they were pushing it on the deck either, but they were bringing a few oscillators to prevent the pressure from being released from the valves. Less likely that it would matter, there had been clear changes shown around, mostly around the walls, where it fell on them to show what was working and what wasn't. For the barrel-like protactors started pumping in, bashing the molecules in the air. Around them, a set of armor-like dark-ironed furnace had been pieced together, in order to make sure the heat prevented anyone else from interfering with it. No one seemed to like him there. It was a crude wake up to reality, which turned him backed in the way he had been prior to their meeting. He slept in a tightly shut room, with a bed-bunk mate he didn't want to approach. He didn't want to think of it any longer, hence he dreamed away. Eight levels below at least. Despite all the wrong turns now and all the delays, though the guest of honor wasn't there, for a short time, everything was well again. With all his flaws and defects, history and everything which made him who he was, it was there. He dreamed of it and never felt like he had been away from home. There would never be a time where he would look back and think of his past, for all the good reasons and the ones that had him do what he had planned. Broken dreams and shattered hope, he lost it all on his way home. His journey would take a long while to achieve, but at least the destination brought him back to the place that reeled him in. 'Drop it already, can't you see that I'm trying to check the batteries?' 'I know, I know but everything's gotten to repetitive already. Just admit it, we aren't actually the great engineers we thought ourselves to be in the first place. I mean, we've been trying to fix a broken piece of coal for how long now?' 'Eighteen months, I think, give or take. Perhaps it's better this way. 'They kept talking about the same thing, whilst popping a few of the tennis balls around the wall. Linings showed just enough of that for them to feed into it. Without the scores being settled again, it was clear. Sall wasn't going to bring himself back again. Despite everything they were trying to do in order to fix them, everything appeared to backfire for some reason or another. With little doubt to it, there was no reason to push ahead more than they could take and drag. If they even made too much of an effort, one of the higher ups would notice and the gates would open, the bars would lower and the candles would all fade away. Fire could spread, the metal could turn into the touch of natural biochemical emobodiments of wretch and the wheat would burn again. From what might be told again, they were trying not to face the issue head on. Avoiding it almost entirely, it would be more than cruel to even hope for a way in. Broken by the knots botched in, it was clear that they scheduled another week of rearranging the batteries with the claw, moving in into patterns that forced their holding splices to swell. It was a worthless and thankless task, they were looking out for themselves then. Not knowing when the last time they could attempt it again would come, they stood there, in the middle of the openly generated field. Why did it still hurt? No matter how far you could dig inside the quarters, nothing made the feeling go away. It could not be drowned. There was nothing in it that would leave them now. No matter where you looked, you could still feel its call. And not even he could deal with it in his sleep, restless nights, insomnia, loud sounds, death knocking at the door, only to find him walking outside, again, through the same floor he found himself in. There was no escape, there hadn't been one in so many days. So many pointless endeavours ended up nowhere. No fantasy, no day dreaming, nothing to pull him back in. Malt found himself trying his best to go back there, in the only place which made him happy. It wasn't behind any door he knew off. So, an alternative had to be on its way by the time they reached their destination. So many countless minutes turned into the first hour he had been awake, yet he hadn't made a move. He hadn't prayed in a long time, and now, out of all things, he hadn't known to whom he'd speak. And who might listen either. No, it would be hard to approach it again. As soon as he was done testing the waters, he looked around for a sign. He couldn't curl yet. Soon enough, it wouldn't matter, just like then, it started popping back in. Though it couldn't be explained, things weren't like they used to be. Instead, they were somewhat much engrossed into the half plain of looking into a part-world, a mirror-hag that shouted back at him. 'Come now, we're merely scratching the edge, there's a long way ahead, especially on foot. 'Though, it wasn't the most subtle of entrances. He couldn't take away from his experiences just yet. There was no defending from the vile currents coming from the east. With their cascades of cold stocks, they made the the pass. But it was getting in the way, the deluge was only drawing on with time. Most of the workers around the greatest pile of stone heaps were exhausted, as they looked for a way in. Though the last of the great storms had devastated most of the rafts and the boats, taking away the only ways back in. It was time for the great fasting to come. Around eight camps they set themselves around the nearest stone depressions and waited. Enough work-force remained for a tiny settlement to be built. It was indeed the only way through. It took a while to round everything up. But their materials were only improving by the looks of it. One of the stoneblocks rooster-like folded beaks that held upon each other after each bite. To say the least, it had been an impressive feat that couldn't be easily outdone. But if there was one thing more important, it was the moment Sall started gambling down the road. It was a special kind of game he enjoyed playing for a good reason as well. He enjoyed playing the wheel just near the batteries, somehow giving himself an ecstasy he had never encountered before. There was a rush going through him from which he couldn't get away. He brought something from behind one of the counters. It was euphoric again, something came back with each card they picked, with each pinned eye they pricked and threw around the wheel, hoping it would land. And at every mark there was a date, each of it bringing back some kind of fluke or ailment that went to their heads. What mattered less for them was just the ardour they felt every time a new card was dealt as well. Symbols had been lain just around each corner, with various depictions of unearthly riders, decaying lords of various shapes and sizes and a few missing pieces, given by the company. 'I lost a finger. 'Said Sall, just by looking at it, he could plainly see that the stakes were high. And that wasn't even an understatement at all. Twenty more fingers appeared, just for the sake of raising the bet. It wasn't likely that it could go any or either way, just for their whole sake. For what was worth, there could be one thing they were both set on. 'Should I arrange the card then? '

‘Not yet Sall, not yet, until we’ve established something. ‘Basic rules appeared to be way too deprave, for starters, the various cards held in their arms, as many as eight that appeared on either side kept them all as they spread. This way no simple card game after all, as if they couldn’t even make it any easier for the eight decks that were used, it was more so in the counter for everything that would be missused. Eight fingers, a few objects that shouldn’t be found around the submarine were just, there. In the cards, each exchange would bring in something much stronger, as for the scent. It was there as well. Threateningly pushing through one of the cards, through a few holes in need to release a few of the locusts that were caught one between his nails. Whatever the reason might’ve been, he saw something much worse to them. Down from their oyster-like heads, to the excessive festering wound caused by the self-nesting in his head, he had realised that there wasn’t anything near the pain he felt them. Just by the expectation of finding a way in. Through one of the black-heads that were trying their way in. ‘Ah, I see you’ve made the proper preparation this time around. You’ve switched just about everything, haven’t you?’ ‘Indeed I have, you won’t find any mishapen card and no jester that’s trying to push through on our side. ‘Vault covered one of the images with his thumb. Though some of the cards were supposed to be completely exposed, somehow, he had been covered entirely in the plasma instability. A corn-like bead had formed out of his fingers as well, on his dominant hand through his arm, to the ribcages which now showed against the nearest sides of the shirt. ‘Well, I want to see something now. ‘Something happening, anything, even remotely so, if there was a way to show even a sign of weakness, he would do it if it meant that he could make it turn back inside. One of the voices couldn’t even continue blabbering again, though it wasn’t heard any longer, there in the distance, in the depths, it had received a body of its own. Damned, though it had thoroughly been, it tried pushing through until it got through. He laid there like a patch, trying to swim through, unable to submerge, and drawing on and on. Though it couldn’t properly infect everything, it had pushed through. ‘Ah, I see you have returned. ‘He spoke. And despite his past failures, there wasn’t any hope to regain him just yet. He who had barely gotten hands on him only to have been brought to a loss, he couldn’t fail to come back, of any time. ‘Be broken. ‘A wail, which pushed through the various water-plants and the reefs of crying shak-like pillars that raised from the ground. It was even more so, that they were trying to revealed their madly encased songs. There wasn’t any fear to be had no longer. As for the master had returned and he had completed the time where he had paid his due to become stronger, to him, now the shout. It came about in the middle of the night, as if uncaught by the wrong whereabouts of the lost. Nearing one of the broken hours, the Compatriot came back to his wits, never coming to gloat and longer, and he had passed, there wasn’t any reason to look forward. ‘Where have you gone?’ He asked, unable to rejoin the hunt. He had forgotten all about them, making his way through the decrepit room, making sure he would be understood as soon as it could be. One moment there, drawing a card. For some reason, this action resonated so much with the presence inside the lower hulking zone of the bottom level inside the submarine that its magnificent reverberation shot in every possible direction. So much power got generated from one spot, that Sall almost destroyed his entire hand from the one card he pulled from the deck. It was simply blank for a second. Yet in the few seconds that passed, it felt as if it shot its reflection came into the light. Through the trasmission of woe, it appeared. The combined image that overmerged in its complexity, akin to some animation, or rather, the frames of a movie that combined everything in existence, every possible universe going into tightly-placed bands that shot against one another in hopes to make themselves be seen. Though it couldn’t be distinguished from everything else, this strange image on the card bore everything and beyond. Not only every reality, universe and parallel world, but it also bore the frames of the past, the future, the present and the combinations between their parasitical embraces. Most of them not only combined but they also appeared to create something for themselves. Until that point nothing appeared to be dysfunctional any longer, over the sudden appearance. He had no intention of finishing the game, out of the same reason that the submarine stopped. But it hadn't been so. The entire water stopped receiving its properties, giving nothing in return, other than the strange amiosis on the ocean-floor. From it came the entrance, and as it had, the whole water-scoured cylinder began being drawn back up, slowly. Sall's colleague succumbed to a change of pace. His face had been undetermined. From his collared blue-suit, he wasn't an engineer but a crystal that produced some kind of shake that spread around him. Part of him had been broken, and as soon as his hand fell, there it was. 'You were bluffing all along, I knew it. 'Sall rejoiced, now of all the times, when reason called him to look back, into the pile of batteries, where he couldn't feel anything but the peace of mind he had been looking for all along. He won the hand, abandoning all of the other cards, other than this. From in he drew enough of its essence into his body that a few veins started popping and extending from around his forearm to the point of being botched aside. He had painted its corners not with one of his fingers but at will. Just like a builder would slowly place the bricks on the line, slowly adding a bulk to the frames, Sall started slowly placing thin shades of ice that stood there. It would be immaterial at times, just because there wasn't any way out for him. Clearly and mostly defined, the freezing would go both ways immediately. Under his gaze he saw his eight' finger from the right hand suddenly submerge and get lost. At first it looked like a tiny splatter, until it had truly stepped in closer to the emerging worlds. And no longer would they look like frames, but tiny pops that were emerging from their peculiar surroundings in order to complete themselves. He would be ironed there, just like a man who had succumbed to the poison of coal. He felt it burning in his throat and caught it up. Just what was the reason of the card? His fears prevented him to hand it down on the table, out of the very fact that it would destroy everything. Reflection or not, he could scratch through it and feel it rip off. But it wasn't the world being shattered, but the encasing around them. If they were freed, the disaster would be unfathomable, over the fact that as soon as his finger stopped travelling, it returned and threw itself out. He saw it suddenly emerge, crawling on top of him, changed, somehow. The obvious thing about it was the fact that it could move on its own, something he had never seen before. Why, he even considered looking away for a moment, in turn. A twist started gnawing at his wrists. It would appear that the finger hadn't returned alone. Instead, it had brought several look-alikes to eat more than he could spare. Blood-masts spilled and the cells would start degenerating any time soon. He could see them gnawing, changing, as the nails started converging into their armor. Dirt laid outside and inside of them with a slight amount of peculiar debris that changed just about everything that ever counted. He felt like a Count now, as they stopped, revealing only how deep they sunk in order to have him properly chained. Iron would prevail as they changed. 'What else can you do, my dear card? 'Though he knew he was in need of something much wider than that. As soon as it had occurred to him, he turned towards the wheel. A magnificent idea spilled onto Sall, he was to finally get away from this boredom he and his ex-colleague had encountered. With a throw, he saw the card spill, be poured like a melted pill or some water in the grith. Yet he couldn't comprehend just what the reason for this reflection lay, the middle pin, the one that stopped it from spinning pulled it in. Every number there came away until the reverse dome had the sight for its own reason. 'If I could jump in there. 'Sall though for a few moments as well, as to try a few more times, in order to achieve anything at all. Of course, little confirmation remained, whether or not he could run away and not look back.

What would happen if someone found this out and mistreated it without knowing. Seeing how it was, this threat evolved more than anything he could ever set himself again. It was the murkiness in it that made him shake and think and see. Just the ripples that made everything larger than they should've ever been, and on top of it, he was still disturbed by the cockroaches, nasty creatures that followed him around. During some of the previous encounters, he could almost swear that he heard an old man talking from somewhere inside of them. As unruly as it were, he knew it would have nothing to do with what was going there. More likely, they would try coming inside. Just to be sure of it, he covered it with a carpet that had lain around, picking of one of the small battering rams in order to hunt them for the time. It was tiring after a while, just caring about hunting some tiny pests. But he wouldn't pick up any rest, until he saw, as soon as he had drawn something like five meters in range of them, small fingers started popping from their insides. Instantly killing them in the process, giving into the same process of hulking through the ship in order to dig deeper before they'd become encased in iron. And from the few laps he had done, he managed to hear the sound of multiple roaches being encased. Just about everyone he had every approached there. Now what would happen If I left this room? Believe it or not, it was certainly something he had a very deep thought about. He even dwelled, what would happen if one of the other crewsmen suffered of the same fate. It couldn't be brought back into question. Not while trying to defend it there. 'From now on, my dear wheel, I shall never leave your side. 'Like the throw of a dice, he came back and threw the carpet back into the motion. Without the slightest hint of emotion going through his body, he couldn't believe what was happening. Not after so many great times they had spent about, trying to pick up from where the others left. Something crept on him in the same manner. Though it was the span of few sections made out of a few half-hours and few lost minutes, he couldn't be deceived by it. A mirror that had been there wasn't to be believed to have appeared at all. Unlike his paranoid peer, who would've questioned this to no end, who would've been mesmerised or theorised about it until he couldn't approach it any more, Sall simply walked to it and punched it till' it cracked. Satisfaction came onto him as soon as he could think aloud. 'Nothing will keep me away from it. And I shall become its protector. 'Speaking of which, he saw a tiny glass-pearl which had fallen from below the cracks. He wondered whether or not it could still work, just if he had to make a play out of it, to dwell and move. Looking through, around this place, just the mere fact that there were some gambling toys they had brought with them from the realm of dreams, he wondered just why were they there? It was unclear whether or not his partner had been lying about it. Or whether or not they did share the same dream that one day, but they both ended up in the same casino, one night. Despite being inside the submarine all the time, they could vaguely remember the dream as if it hadn't been a dream at all, but the image of reality, lost somehow and reclaimed by them. It was hard to recollect it now. Especially since there was something wrong with the owner. He hid one of his greatest tables because it had been cursed. Though neither of them dared approach it for some obvious reasons, they had never dared question everything else either. Some of their wheels, decks and other gambling debts had been taken with them from there. And then, they simply appeared there. He still wondered, just what happened there after dark. When only the most daring, life-risking, worthless scum dwelled upon, to the point where either way, if they had followed through, both might end up through the same sinew of scum. Bodies becoming numb and being taken away, even devoured as one might say. 'Brush it off, this isn't the dream any longer, this is reality. And It's time to test the spin. 'With as much of his flaccid state, he threw the pearl and saw it roll ahead. There wasn't any way of knowing, just what the point of it would be like, after throwing went aside. A lure of thought brought him back and then he wondered what went wrong. As the marble kept spinning, he reminded himself that there hadn't been any bets, and there wasn't any number there yet. It stopped. A moment later, he did not know what to do. It felt like the batteries would shake themselves out of their spots, just because of a hulking magnetic force that threw themselves off the wonder. No one would know better than to throw themselves away. IT couldn't be questioned any longer, just what the reason for it was yet. But he appeared, like an unfinished statue, from the forearms down, trying not to move his head as it was bobbing around the ceiling. It was a giant, though he hadn't known how he appeared, nor could he reason why he was still alive. An accent came to him at last, after seeing where he was and the motionless body that was his, at last. He asked. 'What have you done to me? You're the one responsible for it, aren't you? Come closer, I'll chew up your face and spit it out with the rest of your dead. ' 'Wait, this isn't. It's, wait, I can explain this, I think. This is a misunderstanding, you see? ' 'Misunderstanding? ' Asked the giant, now even more flabbergasted than he had been before, it would be more likely for him to be thought as something more of a vibrant thing, one that served his own interests of the whim of never knowing or not asking the reason behind it. 'I will give you a chance. ' 'And. 'Sall couldn't see the threat any longer, not after realising he was stuck there. Unable to move, which prompted him to move onward just to see whether or not his theory still barged in for some reason he couldn't describe as anything but his intuition. 'I will strike at you. 'The giant said, as soon as he saw the sudden movement, instead of pushing ahead, instead of trying to defend himself from the stranger, he lifted his forearm like a stranger would. Before any mass could be put down, he had been pinned to the ground as soon as he could wail. Undefended as he had been, untouched evenly, he looked as the giant fingers that appeared, which looked near the ones he had owned. Most of them had put him in his place, going as far as appearing on both forearms instead of the only one that attempted to draw on. It would be likely that he could be caught and even brought back. He had spared no expense to care, nor any meaning instead. He had tried getting past the raft and about the pain inflicted upon him at last. 'Have you brought me here for no other but to torment me? What have I done wrong to deserve this kind of treatment? ' 'You're the one who threatened to strike me before I even had the chance to explain. Can't you see it yet? You're inside a submarine, does any of this make any sense to you? Just think about it for one second, will you? That should put everything into view. 'It hadn't of course, though he had taken the time to explain it for better or worse. Luckily the giant hadn't appeared a few meters forward, or else the metal claw and the hook might've been damaged, hardly even able to make a difference, with the batteries ill-doing what they were supposed to do. 'Are you mocking me now? First you're bringing me here, then you're placing my arms in place and now this. You ought to be ashamed of yourself, you mad alchemist. ' 'I've already told you, I'm an engineer, nothing more. And in case you may not know, perhaps I should warn you about making too much noise and disturbing the ship. We're near one of the nuclear generators, which is just behind you, make too much noise or shake too hard and, and. 'A mighty grin had been claimed by the giant. Clearly, he was up to something as soon as he heard it go. 'So, I suppose that leaves us with only one great option. Spin the wheel and see where it lands. That way I should know whether or not you're telling the truth or not. ' 'Can you not see the worlds and the planets inside the wheel? ' 'That's a bit too tiny and too far for me to see. I suppose this could be yet another trick made in order for me to lay down my guard. Shaking may or may not result into anything I could know off if you're asking me that. 'With a sly smile, he looked for a way out, of anything he could use against the tiny man who fashioned himself a thinker. Would he bring it closer or see the room fall? Could he feel how far they were lowered from the main unit of the submarine at all? For one thing, each section of the submarine could be temporarily detached from the main unit, though not entirely so.

There was some resistance to it, that went as far as one could fare in an unmoving sea, where fish were frozen, starving. Just like the one shark who was about to eat the head of a squid. Or the sea-lions trying to ride the waves through it, struck by the gloating of the air which was consumed then, after all most of the oxygen reserves had been consumed already. Now, to begin with the transmission again. If there was one more reason to gloat about, this would be in. Though there wasn't any charm to bickering, he had plainly seen something wrong. It was a deal, after all, and he couldn't draw back. Without the slightest change, there'd be no way to pass around. He would rest and think. What would happen if he had only, turned the table without being seen? Slowly now, though the giant appeared to be staring, and then it came to him. Sall tripped and fell, just like in a pool. Falling through it made him fiercely swoon as he had been broken apart. Tied to just about everything out there, as much as he could push on to reed in and fight, but this was out of his control. He couldn't tell what was happening around him any longer. For the same reason, he faced just the treason coming from his friend. Unable to defend himself, he had become a patch of skin within the great talon-like protrusion that partook into the moulding of the planes. Nothing was still, some levels would be made akin a dungeon, or a castle only to be lead down the line. Stairs didn't allign, yet they lead to plantetoids and stars, all connected but useless when it came to destroying the ones charinging through them. Somehow it was simple now. For whatever reason, it was destined to be told again, that some of them would resign in pain. In the deepest hold that a normal looker might yell at, the glorious fighters succumbed as their amors broke at last. From inside of them, the excess pushed, until their features dissapeared or like gluttons muled their way in.

Holding the anchored roots that held the Hold from falling into space, though that in itself wasn't endless as the cosmos forced them into cubical holds penetrated and withheld from drawing on. Yet some would be wider and other would strike for infinity. No rule could be applied, no one would be denied the glory of the hold. For in the old man Malakerth stood there like a cherub, damped from the drought. Brought about his metal knees, the prosthetics that had been made for him withheld in the hall. The giant long and curbed path in front of him held the grandest wall, curtains would be twisted about, holding all the metal pieces he needed to replace. Eithe rhis face, the head, the legs, the arms, he could rebuild himself if needed. Even strike upon rebirth if he called upon it or asked for something near the kin, and to that his servants called. 'Malakerth, you must heed our warning. Someone had pieced us back together. ' 'What happened there? 'It would be inconclusive for now, yet he looked about the place, wondering what went wrong. The twisted peculiar prison inside the bridge brought him to the hinges, pale. He was chained to this place emotionally though he couldn't tell the difference as well. 'Break it down around the surface. 'He spoke. And on his whim, the power thinned and shot along the curved spire. It could be, if anything, admired, how soon it penetrated the entrance to the submarine, blocking it, stopping it from within. It would be anchored, as from the wheel the liquid spread. A good quarter of the floor being completely absorbed, drawing it still through the rifts and the unmoving vortexed that ripped the rest of the water edge. It was then that Malt had been taken aback. Though his journey should've continued forth, something broke the edge and his guide. She died instantly and so would I.

Thought Malt, as soon as he had made a turn. It wasn't worth it to push on for too long. Not only would it be impossible, as well as for the fact that he had a reason to be there, anywhere, but he had crept for this reason. Driven to find the source that hit the closest to his heart, he reached about the nearest wall and walked through the night amongst it, with the role of a seeker. Trying to search. Yet Agamemnon resonated the most as well, as he joined him from the distance, knowing. Spire or not, he would recognise his doing. Malakerth called upon him servants in the hall. He had risen from his throne and pushed everything down. It was done with, his songs and the words written for the ones that would hear and would know how to interpret them. In his mind he had done a kindness unlike any other. Sparing the others from the horrors of their deathly chairs from which the paralysed demigods he had created came. Silken to the skin but prunes, unable to deal with the fact that they had been forced to a swoon, he whipped them back to life. Faces that were unnaturally red and coaly stretched as far as the skin. And most of them were unfit for procreation, kept alive by the insight he had gathered from a piece of brass inside their minds. Everyone woke up at once. 'God, god, god. 'They said, like a chorus spread by locusts instead of one sang in glory. Upholding their honor would be a mistake as most of them were unfit to walk again. Instead it could be said again, given to them by the means of fighting back, armed with glorious spikes and needle racks and skewered body-functions that acted wrong, they levitated, yet they were held back. No more than a few meters in the air, until the invisible ropes activated and held them from achieving flight. Their legs prosthetics had been taken away, leaving them long torsoed yet somehow bearing them like tails. At times they'd grow or shrink as the meat was taken back and grinned within their bodies. From their facial ends, only some large holes remained of their nostrils and sockets, pushing on long-lipped, eye glitter-like bobbling ends, drawing by living devices which were thin as well. Some wonder came at last. From the fastening remark it could be said, that there was something unwell. It was nearing the point where they could eat from the masses that came into the air. From the various realities they could see in, though their teeth weren't on point. Corkshrew-like and pointing like needles, they drew in from them and ate. It was a sight that was uncanny to behold, yet their leader wasn't bothered by what his expression told. Yet Malakerth was wearing a mask and nothing could be seen from it, alas. The thrones started moving on the pointers. Subterranean compressors would force them to feel pain in order for them to be more focused on what he had to say. 'I brought you here for a good reason, I may add. Look at me for a moment and you shall know what I'm talking about. 'From beneath the mask, he pulled his face out. Like a hard block of meat, from it he had revealed the method of pulling it off. Though his peculiar, defragmented skull stood there exposed, all the focus was directed to his face which lay still attached by the tubes that cast the shadows. Words weren't written on it, yet the map was there to be held. He claimed that this was going to lead to the end of the universe, where nothing could be grabbed. And nothing about the darkness lasted, nor the light might be had again. Instead of pushing on ahead, he had been filled with the dread and the lack of knowledge his species faced. Again they twisted, turned and started yelling again. 'God, oh God, God, God. 'They spoke with their deity again, pain filling their surroundings and the heir who emerged from around every place that may be. Eighteen replicas of him stood forth. And each of them had taken to themselves to show the exact lack of pleasure they felt on the field. It couldn't be believed yet, there was a reason for which they show the remorse. A lack of luck brought their heads around. Going as far as to achieve the strike within, they revealed their diamond-long sharpened blocky foreheads. Bearing all the broken features of teeth that had been completely remade and molded within their thin throats. All of the throats extended from their backs, reeling into their heads as the chewing began. Soon the brains would be digested, only to be recreated again. More than a few memories would be erased but the purpose for it couldn't be denied as well. As much as it could be believed, a reason had come again for their morbid way of acting. Dancing even though they started twisting themselves off like nails, they revealed the bloody kegs inside of them. Hardened and filled with the matter of body-recreation, damned one be if he had even considered damning everything else. It could be brought about into question and laid, lost for the sole reason that pain couldn't be told off from the cold. Told off from the shattering blisters, they were worn to the sensation of disease. It pleased them to know that in the kegs they had stolen and his children to watch over. Like pickles in jars, they would be submerged into liquids and forced to grow and grow on until they couldn't be recognised as human any longer. And their strong arms held them from falling and breaking apart. Shallow ends ensure there could be no reactivation instead. He waited. God or not, he searched for one stop from the chanting, to pick on one of the distant channels or signals and know. Somehow he was aware that there was a way of pushing on and finding out for himself. Something was about to be told. Someone should be held accountable as well. For endless reasons they were watching their father in his moment of peace. After being forced to look upon the map that had allegedly marked the spot leading to the end of the universe, the channels would be sent around. Either of some had to have had a chance to pick something off and lead him to it then. Otherwise, all would be unwell and lost, at the cost of losing himself into the peaceless heap he had fallen in. It would be my only chance, if only I could grasp it. They were all caught in a nastily in awe. For the fornication of the great liver had not even begun yet. Yet from the ceiling, it had been simply lowered below, without leaving a trace, for the wonder could commence again. Various machines held it in place as they signals would be even more amplified by the beating it produced. Despite the perfection, it was ill found. He reserved something for himself just then. Echoes would sing for the pioneers of space travel. The experimentation had somehow begun in the most notorious fashion. Despite the up-beatings, there would be some rage, so much so that it couldn't be contained any longer. Pain had dulled emotions and the fear of mistakes. It made them all act that way, so uncanny. They were other ways he could get his revenge for this cosmic joke. For the same reason he had been mistreated after the decimation of the spores, he had taken upon himself to find a way back through the high heavens he would create. Far too many deviations had been spared, and not a single one could be left behind. 'How have I gotten here in the first place?' 'He hadn't gotten the answer to it yet. Despite not referring to the overall main demise the hold had been tied again, he still questioned why they would be forcing themselves into that stance. Countless things went without saying. For the first time in what seemed to be a few titan-like forced years, they had spared no one from the time spent around. It would be more important to come to admit, to the seething rage they spared time after time, until it couldn't work no more. That had been the trade, for the amount of hatred was evenly spent between all of the prisoners inside their chairs. As the greatness of this process refused to stop ahead, what came after was the age of regret. Shortly-lived as well as forgotten by their sect, he became aware now. Malak drank from his chalis, finding his inability to choke or be poisoned a disgrace. For some reason, it made the others feel unworthy of him or his gaze. He had spent way too many spares on it. Spilling it in order for it to be refilled again, if there was even some kind of drastic change, it hadn't been there. To begin the process of revival, nothing would make him admit of the countering sightings that descended from him. It was harsh, trying to get through it again. A tormented-looking spire that pushed on ahead, nothing could last from it, as soon as there were parts that would be taken and dreaded for the likings. Not only could it not be believed that there was not reason for them to free the channels, the signing wouldn't stop. A signal had been picked just then. He had pushed the face back in, then the masked and looked back in instead of waiting. His desire pushed to the point where it had been less uncomfortable to wait, whenceforth he acted. Through the vision, he would look and see. A dainty mystery he had fancied for himself then, at the time when the Carrion-Leviathan yelled.

Scheloris

It wasn't much, but, it was the first time he considered it. While passing between the giant sparrows, he looked at him. He wasn't heartless, perhaps it was this sparrow gathering which made him feel this way. But for the first time, Elegant considered getting old.

A lot of the birds were gray feathered and in a sense, he considered it. Chasing the world was the quest of the young. As much as he had looked at it, he did not want to think about it now.

Why was he so sad?

Last didn't say a word after taking that cover. He only looked down and kept to himself.

It was the sad dance of the man, surrounded by the moons once he found out that there was nothing waiting for him any time soon.

Wailing at the countless watch hours not to mention the showers of the falling men, in his perfidious look he forgot all about them. He was blinded by no reason and forgot. No life would even get close to it, not freedom for his thought. And he wagered, and he wagered. Listening to no danger, as the migration started. Feet were draggled.

Listening now he walked only on their turn, touching his head and casket in the back. From hich he opened the door, getting out all out of the bones. A man pulled himself out of the bone-carcass, still of meat. He was on his two hands-feet. Whichever mattered now the eye came out of eight foreheads he carried in the back. A flute on him, he sang, he should. Be listened to, at times like these. It was the loss, the fall and the break whenever and whatever came to it.

He carried a stick and felt some pain. He should refrain from smoking bloody wheat and say.

'I should have not, taken the moss. Now I don't what to do.

Please. Please help me, I can't get away.'

Passing under the breath, but the songs, I heard them again. There's no more, he wants out, off onto it, least he'd know.

'I am defeated.'

That was it. The excitement was gone and without it nothing of value could be gotten from the body of a man who only continued doing it in vain. He sang with flutes time after time after time after time. End it now, he thought.

No feelings remained in his arms. Of course, it could only go worse for him this way on. And it was no pains that entered him and no wonder he wanted to stop after.

Defeated his fists lay down. He was pained, he was beaten, he was nothing, he was gone. Zoned out they say, piss-poor and lost. Ahead of him, there was no point. No hope for the man, nothin'.

They froze. And when it happened they rose. Arm to arm, nearing their bodies, holding, after which they couldn't stop it. Making long walking poles, rising beyond the reach of man until their tiny arms gave in. Words were sang and it wasn't any matter after. It didn't matter any longer. We were there, standing on a platform, surrounded by a sea of blood. A roundabout of knees was flying in our gods, all of whom were trying to swim out of the sea, out of the pools that started swirling inside of it. And then the pops and the rolls. I heard them matter, as if they could twist and gnaw at each other's blood bones.

'Yes, of course I knew what was happening there, this had progressed for too long.'
But as soon as I came to know it, I wanted to eat my own guts instead.

'Dear friend, I have a request for you. If you don't mind dying here, someone ought to feed the Gods. I cannot do it by myself.'

'But how may I do it without getting myself killed?'

'I can only hope you'll find a way to do it without.'

His fingers started shaking during a pandemonium I felt, the chill. 'I am the last survivor of a lost time, hear me before you go on your way, vile defuncor, man of no tribe.'

The old brute was standing with his arm dislodged from the tomb he was carrying around with him on and on around the head-compactor. He had been built like a chunk of rocks in his youth, though now he gave everything to them, in body and soul. As his loyalty progressed so had this strange encasement his body had been abased in.

Sickly looking as he were, this creature, if he could be called a man only now began questioning what was going on with him.

Beware of him now, for he may only come to realise his aggressiveness by chance. Most of the ford around him had been ruined by accident and by a chance not even him could have counted on. You could see it in his eyes, the vileness that pushed on.

We who had been betrayed in the past would now be heard and make no sound of correspondence. They were listening even in our most timid moments, when we couldn't even, as we were long forlorn, move from the ruinous formations that loomed around us as we slept on the broken pillars of our own body-growth. We began producing them when we had become incapable of emotion. Those were our guiding-factors, the cancers of our minds. We had become their servants and did what we pleased with them as long as they kept us alive.

It couldn't be accounted for any longer, this travel through the depths. Our history and plains hadn't prepared us for what was about to come. From around the piles of feastering dead-fish, inside of which they buried underneath, inside of, while surrounding our feet, they suddenly started coming out for light. And they were nothing to be shouted or looked about. For whichever reason, they were much paler than expected. Even, somehow aromatic in dread.

Each servant of these mounts, upon which the bodies of whales and the giant spider-like cubes joined started molding and spreading on top of them. Until no release could be called for any longer. Many trunks erupted from inside and the voice of vileness resounded beautifully until it couldn't be contemplated on.

'Serve us in our wake, feed us if you may but do not run away.'

Was the message which was so thoroughly imparted on to us. For what I knew to look for, once I saw it, I decide that I could be of no worth and no value any longer. I was no man of spirit and despite wishing I had been much stronger, I had been weak. Blind and corporal in countenance, someone who shouldn't have been there at all. Represented by some insignifant weakness, I followed with the other man. Ah, now it could be seen at least. Thy desire for pain betrayed you to him and to my own. I could see why they were doing this and why it was so important that they would be allowed to carry on. Other men gathered from around their giant hidden porcelein shells. Inside of them they had made fires but they only serve to signal the fact that they were closely listening and making sure they covered up their mild desire. Yet so much as it would be held, their minds were listening, they could tell that an exchange in spirit was happening between those mounds and the man who had been impaled without realising it at last. He cast himself in a small puddle of cat-mice ribs, all of whom were trying to run around a wheel they had made.

If it weren't for them, to suck on the marrow instead of dying, he could've certainly joined the piles. He was instead spared for now.

'We shall feed you if we're give something instead.'

Then the rigs of the first man's chest got impaled. Pain was anything but felt as it started implanting into him an unnatural amount of glutton fat. Scum at last entered him and pushed out.

A champion of ages soon arrived in sight. No delight could lay to him in waiting. He couldn't spare himself of looking too much, and much more, he chose to stay his hand. Spoken like a knight to many, he pointed at the land mass near the shore, where this travesty of madness was being spread around and show less than it could be called to them in the wake of torn.

Torn apart as the creature were, he could see its real master pushing through it with giant nigh-invisible thin wires, which almost resembles the sails of long ships, which awaited the breaking of the broken-fires of bombs, the sea at large crying for them to return as if they must. They couldn't fiddle with pain no more, the uncanny only listened to them when they needed to, elsewhere and the rauncy.

Most of the fat had started pushing away, it was looked upon and listened to, fet as if needed to. Reeding in without the slightest desire to show the filth a chance to rise.

Despite the fact that from it rose the first child, a mild-looking infant who walked only shortly before he died. He served only as a way to open the gates from inside the fish-piles. Thence came the crab-formation, which looked as anything but a hook-suction unit that sporuted from the back of a man. This pillaring brute was much younger and had misunderstood his own creation.

Before coming to his senses, he darted forth, carring what he was asked for, a giant arachnid cube, modified to store the body of a single pearl deep sea fish which glowed.

We were frightened to approach him for the sole reason that he wasn't one of us. As a matter of fact he was there during ancient times of slumber, dwelling in the sea. And from the opening of the cube, a heart came out. It had been given to me.

'Carry it as far as you can and plant it beneath the ground instead. Then it shall be required of you to take your life.'

He only spend so much time making sure I would get the instructions right. Though I couldn't digress, I confess that I felt more frighened by what would happen if I refused, instead of going where I went. Out of the way and into the distance where I looked back and saw no sea.

It was all land and the piles of fish were mild dead birds stacked on one another. All of them had seemed to have changed the land so I could see a vision that was much darker. Woe to it, the liar should know that I would never do such a thing again, no more.

My mind was broke and I was carrying a blunt wooden cube. What was going on now? I understood now.

A few more nights were spent alone, dwelling on it back home. It was a dead giveaway, wasn't it? He was eating candles in the small attic chamber underneath the lantern pass. Soon enough he was talking to fruits and vegetables that bore his own eyes. Scraping at his own face made him realise that there were worse things about to happen unless he ran and got away as fast as possible. Far and in-between. He could hear them finally, making the shouts and the dances as they prided themselves with the madness of whims.

'Ah, I see, I'm given a retreat.'

He who listened came to him then. In nights of sorrow, the break between the bridge of land and the mass of stone which was his house broke. A plen-wire of emotion faded, thence came the jesters as their journey faded for a minute in some unknown land they couldn't pinpoint it themselves no matter how they looked about it. Listerless to the woe, apathy in their ranks and now this, they decided it was time to return home with another man in need of help.

'Who are you?'

He asked instead of wondering, realising where he was. The room he was in was no mere attic, but the inside of the lighthouse. Some lost apparel, some symbol lost to him. To them it mattered less than it could be counted upon. But to him, he realised, this was a prison he was in need to get out of. At least he had to do it before he lost his mind to them. Up and away the mind took breaks without making it seem he had an understanding of what was happening around him.

'Join us and enter the leviathan. Our dear friend here needs someone to look after. An aspect after another in case you wondered.'

Named like an emperor, the man rose. He had to be a moron to seclude himself from those who rose. From the antic and the talker. Whatever came after this would have to wait. Now it came to him that it would be painful, this transition into the hellscape inside the leviathan. Which indeed changed with time. Such was the skin fading, filled with tiny disgust batters. It could only matter for only a few seconds before being caught after.

Breaks were taken, bones rapidly decayed, but pain could not be conveyed for long as he would remain obscure in the mind.

Stop it, his mind said.

There were better, father worlds to look after, which couldn't even mind such an insignificant creature as himself.

A man could not resemble the mad case of Siskelot, who lost himself in the outskirts of town. Walking on planted feet, he only wanted to seek some place he might be able to seek and loom forth with some retreat. It wasn't likely he would find it today, for the same reason he had conveyed no emotion than the general feeling an outcast felt.

'Aree, aree, aree.'

Surrounded by a tiny cult of other shot-takers, he survived.

Woe to him, champion of Clot, for he alone could have no mind for it.

'Aree, aree, aree.'

Spoken like a militant body, something stricken down, a nobody that could not be approached, as Siskelot became way too violent to be approached any longer. A peculiarness took hold of his body. He couldn't be questioned by anybody other than his own. They changed as well as they could in order to remain, what could be called, subservient to him.

Woe, he hears songs today. Hear him say and mutter the same songs that would take him away to the distant lands in his dreams. What better way of spending these lost nights other than the wondering if there would be. How could they possibly understand what was going on here? No way of knowing yet.

They drove me to a place where I couldn't even fathom being out yet.

'Alas, I wager we need to got.'

And as if it were naught but a plain action, he took all of them around him. Pushing forth the long hose-like varnished tinted needles and started draining them enough. Soon enough they were placed on top of his back and used for his own desire. He admired that about them, their mere countenance and allowance, so he might do what he desired with them. It couldn't be forgiven yet, he knew he would use them again and again.

No tear drop and no fealty would be lost on him. He wanted this and they wanted to please him. Though he appeared to grow in strength, the lower body he carried was weak, as much as it would get. His eyes were still trapped in bars, all of which prevented him to regain his sight. Out of the madness, came the final shout. A retort he couldn't even fathom thinking about.

'Ye lord, of spoken needles and of pain. Blood of mine and yers remains in me' veins. Yet I feel forsaken even now and then, for whichever reason I could not possibly convey. What of ye servants and champions might you look before?'

But he hadn't listened to his God no more. Instead he chose to the path of flight. Siskelot had achieved something they couldn't have done for, even if they tried. He sniffed the streets and loomed around the giant buildings, trying to get a grasp on this land.

Grabbing their strange abortions when he could out of the walls. He fed of them but never said. He fed on them but never again. He couldn't do it out of distrust, that they would spread the news, be heard at last. 'Hear, hear, the lord of Clot, the one that came in our land at last. He's done something of the vilest act, unforgivable, yet. Missdirected at they would not lat a moment's span. Thinking out loud, he med them, without a doubt.

Two of the fat-guards who looked after the runaway. Somewhere, they waited for him but that would not be this day. I want to say this, the least, they didn't look like they wanted peace. With a grab, a short of at that, they both broke his shoulders only for no other reason than the establishment of dominance, which was yet to be conveyed on his face.

'I see, even through this agony. You're nothing I ought to be afraid of.'

He wasn't tough. Despite wanting it, he didn't think of it like that. Instead of trying to make it seem as if he would be repelled by their action, he took it in for now.

'Thank you my masters. I know now that I need not forget who's in control.'

Slowly but decidedly, while shaking their heads they made sure he would see both of them. Large circular barring barrel-heads, used for the battering as they were impaled by poles instead. It only seemed to him then that there'd be nothing and nothing then.

'I see it now, how could I have missed it? After so much time staring at the walls, my surroundings.'

Petal like floors appeared in front of him as the substance only kicked in now. It looked like a greenish-yellow he could walk on, a patch of grass that was made out marble-candles flattened but fashioned by a sculptor and various porticuli' that looked like drone-walking homunculi. These were something he better watched.

They could make a move on him at any time. He knew it was the substances, making him dye the floor. He saw it, like a ghastly color sprouting as the land bled.

'It's the dye, I see. It's the dye, I can see it appear. You need to listen to my warning before it encompasses everything before us.'

But they only nodded and ignored him with tinted turned backs. He wasn't to be listened to any longer as much as he could count on it now. He was fluke of a mind, a brain broken in disgust. Woe to him, for having no meaning. No end.

Instead of paying attention to what was going around them, they chose this: Walk away. Need be walking away from this spot. That's what they thought, without scanning for danger. Without seeing the blushing yellow sky that almost came to bloat the land with the magnificence of a billion suns that started crowding the place.

Oh to his visions he could not think of the vile ends, how the blater giant Carrion buildings looked like strange wind-traps, basked in light and golden. He was sold to them and taken back, dragged into the dark as an attempt kicked back in.

How can it be prevented again? There was no reassurance that it could be stopped after it started. He was lost.

'Stop that, for a moment, please, ma'am. May I please take a second off the table? I'd like to have a cup of tea.

'Certainly, take a break, I 'm sure to be here by the time you're back.'

She whifed a strangle. It got close as soon as she got off the chair. It got way too close this time around. She was only trying to be on the verge of ceating a piece of the sharpnel alloy the table was made out of. Now, looking at her brow she saw it beating. It came off, then it fell. Entry to the eight poles inside of it, both worming like blunt drills that were used to carve the cavity of her cranium in, in order to sculpt her brain into never working again.

Somehow, it showed. She was paranoid now, the kid was only trying it. SHe was trying her luck, her senselessness only pushed on.

'AH, I see there's something on the floor.'

'What is it?'

The cast asked. She was only trying to imagine it now, the hole wasn't about to grow by itself despite her plebian attempt of getting through it. But she stuck her fingers nonetheless. Little Anne, little Anne, she remembered the voice travelling through her finger as the other one got pushed in her ear hole. It was a long distance-call she wanted to hear. In fear she lost her wits. Of course she would. It was a poor attempt at it.

Talking this was was dangerous. She could hear the sound bouncing it. Every time she did it, somehow she felt the presence at her back. A quick turned at that only came to her now. She saw it, a blasphemy of little words, nothing which could be described by her. Not here at least.

'Who are you?'

Too late, she missed her chance to ask. Now the cat reassured her again that nothing waas wrong.

'Take care Anne, don't stick your finger in for too long. You know what happens if you do it.

We both know the risks, don't we?'

'I know. But I have to face it, don't I?'

'Anne, didn't you say you went for a cup of tea?

'Of course I have, but a lie here and a lie there won't count.'

She knew better than that. She didn't have to lie to her cat, especially since she was as impartial as he could get. It would only get closer from this point on.

Looking back now the way was clear. Her teacher wouldn't ever near the corner while trying to get a glimpse of her walking. As a matter of they were justified. She was, remember Anne, there's only one you and the cat. Don't make it sound like there's two of you because there aren't.

Again she tried trusting herself, because she knew better than it.

Though she was concentrating on it now, there was no way of telling it. How she could turn at time and walk around the mansion whilst seeing the eyes, those golden-green picks at corners. It wasn't likely that she'd know it yet.

But she wanted to say something to her mother, dead. Right around the room, rotting. She was bloating and trying to pitch a word. Anne was too young to know it, but corpses didn't talk. Not while in the trace of scum, where she resided in.

Not a single side of the room was solid. All of the giant moths started growing and gnawing, trashing and bashing each other as they started extending their lower abdomens until they resembled curled caterpillars. And from one of them, Call came again. His head was defiantly produced as if it was regurgitated and pushed.

It started jerking in and out until it couldn't do it any longer and only then, it started pushing through the cattle-box that it carried into his appendages that didn't belong to humans. 'Who are you? Why are you talking to my mother?'

'Greeting young Anne, I have heard a lot about you now.

Allow me to introduce myself for now. I am Call, you may call me Called. That's what I shall be Called from now on.

After spending so many months inside the walls, I have been Called upon here. You wouldn't understand. How could you? You're a child after all.'

'I'm not a child, I am an adult. And I will be treated as such.'

'Will you now?'

Well, in that case, Anne, would you mind getting closer and giving your mother a kiss?'

'I wouldn't want. Well, I wouldn't want to disturb her with my bad manners.'

It dawned on her that the cat was trying to pull her by the scruff of her pants. It was clear that she felt just as uncomfortable being there as she had.

Well enough, she couldn't count on it, despite everything being said. She was disturbed, but came for a kiss.

Her mother wasn't in the best condition. Her face opened, revealing a map.

'This is what I'm talking about, this is right what I need to take out of her. You wouldn't understand how important this is for me kid, that's why I need you both to be separated for a few more minutes until I'm done doing my thing.'

'What were you intending to do to my mom?'

He hadn't explained it. But Called started opening his face even wider than it had been before. Some tuberculii-claspers started coming out, merging with her insides, slowly and acidly cutting through. It was by no means easy operating on her.

For now they could only watch, Anne and her cat being just as shocked by this display, as the map was slowly being pulled out in front of them. But then she leaped and intervened.

'Do it.'

The cat said and instead of listening to her better senses, she chose this instead. She couldn't help it any longer and pulled at the claspers until the mouth dropped the map on the floor. As soon as she could pick it up, she drafted off the snore of vile.

Unable to listen to the filth and profanity the creature spawned before the moths could trap her inside.

'I won't forget this, Anne.

Don't you know I am the house?

Aren't you aware that I live inside the walls?'

For once he wasn't stopped. He hadn't cared about who might see him or what they might think of saying. Prying on the poor child brought him to the sense of madness he had desired more than anything he had felt before. It felt flat. No rain inside the house for now. Only the strange drawing she had spread around some of the cosmos inside the jars. They were blazing stars in there as the clowns started dancing in the mid-dark. But that had been only the start. She hadn't known the reason for it.

'Where have you been?'

There was no tea, there was no biscuit in her hand. As a matter of fact, for some reason the map wasn't seen by her, since it pushed in her arm like a needle-carpet that could stare for long. Engines of destruction started, Anne couldn't know it darted. But her arms were slowly being destroyed as a nanoscopic level she couldn't see.

'I am the Jackal-killer, I am the Jackal who shall kill the world.'

He appeared out of nowhere, bursting through the walls. With such a might he started that he couldn't be stopped at all. It was a painful dash through which he counted, no blessing for the countless souls he killed.

'Anne, stop this, he's here because of you.'

But her smirk didn't pass. She didn't mind another one of the teachers being killed now, especially since she couldn't stand listening to her useless babble. It got on her nerves. For now, it could only go on two ways and only two would last for now. Either she'd do as she pleased or else.'

'You're way too cruel.'

Said the cat-pumpkin. She was a remnant of the Great pumpkin's invasion. He destroyed the gardens and managed to plant carved neanderthal-eggplants that started eating about the place and drowning in liquorish mazes. For that was their way and they could only listen and convey mad sounds.

Pushing wretched pawns around a board that didn't move. He who shook the world would understand what was happening here. An act of painful chase as the Jackal-man took out a Jackal-faced axe out of his pocket. What a primitive sight, the many eyes being on them at last.

It got close this time, Anne almost missed it. He drew on, that called for her attention. With a single stroke of luck, she barely escaped before her guts elapsed into a knot, forcing her outta way. There, instead he conveyed the pain and elation that pushed his veins to quiet.

'Almost got you, little Anne.'

But she could only look at the moth in pity, despite barely knowing the meaning of it, as much as it could be gotten now. It seemed like quiet took the churns of beatings. Too much pain could be handled this way.

It was quiet, that was the case.

An awakening of broken fading lips conveyed no quiet. He remained as bold, struck forth, as both the teacher, Anne, the cat and even the Jackal stopped. They were met by a disquiet such as the likes of which they have never seen. It was no use, it was of no use trying to explain it. For the same reason he had receded into a curl.

A snap of his other necks pushed him instead of crying in the misleading filth he had pushed himself in. A corner after that wouldn't even stand to compare to what was going on. He was being eaten and beaten right in front of his own eyes.

It was a desire he hadn't known. The glass which had become his body as soon as entry was given to him again.

There's no escape for this, is there? He wondered as he looked at the girl. Despite her fiddling with the map inside the arm, she was it, glass, for him, instead of the other way around. She couldn't see him now, despite the fact that he walked like a normal person. As much as he wanted this to become reality, he chose to deal with it the best he could.

Detestable connected to his peers he was taunted by them now.

'Can't you see that we're nearing an end? We'll break if you keep getting out.'

Said Crane, he couldn't even think of a way of avoiding it.

Determined or not, he wanted to shout and feel the glass-cancer be revealed. It could be there, in a moment, then lost, anywhere.

'We'll pursue this way out, somehow.'

But for now there was no clue as to what they were planning to actually do it. Another thing, it could be the tension.

The Jackal started pushing through, in the betterment of the classes, whomever entered in. He jeered as an upper-man, who fashioned himself in a suit.

'I seem to wager there's something we ought to be talking about, my dear girl.'

This man you brought into this world is too dangerous to be contained. Would you mind telling me what's to be done?'

A yell, a shout. Her mother was pained, that's why the new man came about the room.

He brought poor Anne a small envelope which started bleeding desperately before she could deal with the migraine. It bounced in her mind as a, as a tv static image would flash with a bunch of flies which leaped around her head.

'Red herrings, red herrings, that's what they want of us. It's clear that they're trying us, we're being tried on.'

Was there a reason to eat more or top the masses. It came fast and knicked him in the back, pointed. There they came and showed no fear, nearing a close defeat. A pain of making, a cackling, so far.

There were better days waiting in the north, the scowel started the withdrawal process. In sank in deeply before it went at it again. For a reckless wonder, he kept at it until he had become so strong a rolling cliff a hill, the hile-block a chain around his neck remained rounded as it was painted with some iron-allocated pin. It must've shaken him as well as it should've, messing with the whiff of an emerald.

He was a gentleman-general to no end, though he spoke in a foreign tongue which fogged her as soon as he started spitting the frog out, right before he choked on it.

'Step away from my daughter.'

Came the voice of her father. It was unexpected, out of the pouting of speed, it had been difficult for him to climb on the stairs since he had been numbed to pain. The Jackal-killer remained.

But when met by this strange apparition, he immediately killed his daughter's teacher. Nothing of the kind could be allowed at all, out of nothing more than personal reasons. It was the only safety precaution he could draw from her. A trap, indeed for him to stumble on. And then, remained, something pushed again and he took out a switch-blade.

'Would you challenge me now? This is my domain, this is my house now. Would you willingly sacrifice your life out of stubbornness?'

'My daughter is in here. As long as she's threatened by your presense, I shall not even entertain the thought.

I'll take your life if I have to now.'

'So be it, then we shall fight for her at last.'

Anne couldn't have foreseen this happening at all. Out of her experience, there was nothing she feared more but the possible harm than might befall on him, as he was a poor old man who had remained, swollen at eyes. Cut around the belly and even more rotten than her mother. Both of them remained the same, time after another lout, to pry in the lock, she'd feign it. She'd feign being hurt for once. The Jackal was the first to notice, thenceforth, he'd be the first to be distracted before he could push on. As soon as it happened, the advantage pushed near, past him and in the bed of death, at the direst hour, he wouldn't make it through. Up and ahead of him, Anne's father drew on. With a cut and with a slice around the belly he shook him off. Neither of them were prepared for what was about to happen. An invoice of pain, something should remain unsaid. The Jackal-killer hadn't seen it, the gentleman ran away and pushed alout, unheeded. He would warn the cowlers, the ones speaking without thinking of the repercussions which might follow after. Not likely, as much as it could be thought off, alas, but he wanted to piece everything together for one last time. One last great arrival, another slice, he was to be placed on a plate and splattered.

'Stop it, father!'

Her voice sank in. Despite the fact that it was her servant, there was no word to put it. But for the fornication of a second, the blood stopped spilling. Instead, from the bottom of the neck, it started piling up, like tormented blood ants that served the clot. Clotted, clotted soon after, they wouldn't happen to push after. In a fierce amount of time, delighted, he stopped recounting what happened after. It was dangerous, waiting for peace.

'I see what you did there, my daughter, you've disturbed me for the last time I rest on my feet.'

It was tiresome after a while, trying to defend her from the world outside. This place was yet corrupt and in the pain and strangeness, he came at last. He'd have to clean it all. ANd what a sight had been prepared for the Janitor. Most eyes averted from him, though it was seen. As nothing could even come close to explain what happened, as well as they could push it in. They tried making it seem like they weren't responsible for it. And in no case could they decide.

'It wasn't me.'

'I can see the bloody switchblade in your hand, you got a daughter there, don't you?

Don't you think she's seen enough for today?'

At once he pointed at both the Jackal and the lady on the floor. It struck him then, just how worse it got. Even since that point he knew something was off. It fell on him, the responsibility of cleaning and of making sure they would be fed. Even now when he met them in shame, he realised they had somehow managed to, they managed to follow him instead of staying home.

My poor children, they want to eat.

'You know I've always been in service to your family, for countless generations. And I even went as far to undertake the missions of taking care of the entire town, haven't I?

Well, I can only suppose that there's something waiting for me once.'

He was done talking. The man of the house raised no finger but he grunted. It was enough to let him know his place, to make him be aware of the light of day, in whichever need it was needed in. Despite that, he chose to carry on. Anne was taken from his sight immediately and he was left with them. Another cleaning duty. It seemed dull. Duller by the minute.

Especially with those blood-ants which he could not have prepared for. He could only sense the duty that was needed in order for them to be greeted by the others. A brotherly approach was needed to make sure.

'I will eat and I will play.'

Refrain from that once again.

It was hard to keep everything in check, especially beyond the Isles, where the mind was burning again.

'Alas, I feel like I have truly reached something, for that I know.'

The old man thought about it, for once he showed it once more. It was the once chance to break through.

He had to come up with something to impress the creature. He could imprint his very soul in the writing, getting him closer to exposing the flaws, trying his fingers at that and splash. Here comes after, he could only count his blessing farther away than where he stood.

'Signed by Euclias.

Is there something I've done? Something which I may have said, my daughter?'

Young as she were, she couldn't count on it, again. Her heart sunk in with dissaproval, as the cather couldn't die sooner. Pass and the pastor could've called on her faith; none of it remained with him as she decided that she would disobey his wishes, in the veins of pleasing herself in the upper room. By hiding from the callous hate he scorned for her without understanding what he'd gone into. My old man, she thought of him this way. He's way past gone, he may not know how to convey affection or follow any sense that may help him escape. Then she turned towards one of the plain must-like, keen beheld objects of woship, holding onto them during the time her whole being lay exposed in the blindness of being immoral, she asked no forgiveness and waited for an answer.

'Please spare my father from this disaster he's to bestow upon our family and remain with us, no matter what might befall, our family cherrished your council in the time of this dire spell.' As there ought to have been a hole, a window-mole which dug itself out, cracking the walls maliciously as an egg-shack in order to reveal that they were still lain upon them in the air. There could be no possible escape or way of knowing what was happening to them.

'I wish there'd be a way of knowing, if there's even a chance.' The chalice she held between her arms bore only the most deceitful of posion, a fragrance not even she could resist today. If there was even a chance that she might survive it, she'd take it.

But there was only the promise of disaster, for a man like him had no heart. He only cared for himself in the most disgusting times, even when directly met word for word from a creature from another time. Lo and wonder, at the life, what kind of misery should once face while being met by the stranger faces that gave birth to the birthers of their own in a land they didn't belong to? It was clear that they hadn't care. Nearing the death of her, they would have claimed a civil victory that's been fought before the day she was born. And to answer he inquiry, she knew that he would pass over her death and make only the most disturbing claim.

Her heart sank even deeper just thinking of him writing her notes and sealing her thoughts only for his mad avarice, as long as it mattered. He mustered no yonder. Plain as it were for him to see, she was already dead by the time he reached the date of his victory.

'My dear, I have finished my latest piece.'

Though he barged in only to see her sitting on a well. She had always known how to behave even though her sould had not remained. Pity, as a scene for crime, from the hole came one of them, at the very least alive. After a close examination, he saw the old man embracing his daughter, with each tear not being felt, as anything that would even count for him in such a way.

'You wasted her, haven't you?'

'But I didn't intend on doing it.'

'That means nothing to us. We've seen plenty of em' die off in worse ways.

Consider this a pity and a mercy-kill.'

'I would leave if I were you.'

And there was little more than scorn in the mans eyes. Not even the slightest hint of guilt left him eyes, as in the rivers of crocodiles, they could only count for something he hadn't cared about for now. He was plume for the taking. A tome that wasn't needed. As a matter of fact, he should've heeded his own advice and left the place. Who could spare him a dime now. He was laughed at for starters, for something he had no control after. Petty with the greed, he couldn't even pay for her proper burial when the time heeded his return.

'I will bash you head with that rock over there.'

It was startling. He couldn't get out of the way in time. It was one of the bad one. The rotten-minded billard-munchers that came out of its way. He had been made out of small pebbled that gravitated around them, pushing through their brains of skin, the worming motions cutting through them until they peeled off the draught of wonder. A plume of flies then pushed after.

'Get rid of it, please, I can be useful, I could do something in return of your aid. Don't let him slay me now.'

But they couldn't help it as much as they detested knowing it.

As a matter of fact, only a few seconds could be taken back from the time they started paying close attention. Euclias was a good runner for his age but he knew better than to waste his strength on it. As in so far, he's made some wild choices that got him from afar.

'Our village-talker seemed to be in sight. He's soon about to join his daughter.'

'Help me, my dear friends.'

Suddenly they turned their back out of the way and ignored him with all their beings. It was no wonder any longer, for which reason this might be. They had been simply taken out of thought and couldn't handle being long-shouted at. A cancer tome appeared to one. He had the old man's life pinned down. Of course he'd like to do something with it the others hadn't even a clue or a sight. But the mind for the taking and each of them a vulture in the making. Wasn't that right?

When they weren't busying themselves turning from the pitiful sight of the man being dragged in whichever direction, they stumbled on the fool. A sight as many understood, he cracked his head by accident while falling, never knowing of the taking, just what was so appalling?

Where thine the river flows a single spackle of shimmering sound that's been travelling through ages uncouth. Counted by the wild tranzition through the season it had counted them, as every sprain had given him a chance to stray his arm and bade a fair pass.

'There's only a a single trunk that should serve a passing.'

I sees only the wood and molasses. In it roaches weren't seen. No bees, since they died off, the verdure not being green any longer. And it was the dope of brain o throng in false muscle. He couldn't carry it past this aroused bridge no longer. They were only a tiny group, short in the spring o'er younger than they were. It was flattery to the spoiler, who had brought the spoils of war with him. He crossed the path months ago and waited here in the snow. Until he melted he hadn't felt like they could do it, see themselves up the pass.

'Only one shall go yonder, for a fare. Two coins of powder.'

Going on around their pockets, they were preparing the bags. Sometimes it would be much more difficult to perfectly carve the coins. As a matter of fact, the toll would be paid of ten times more if he had a whif of what he was taking from them. It pushed through and got to him. Pain in ten-folds, smaller coins entering his nose. He was lost. For a few hours he would wonder around until he fell in the chasm and died.

'Do you take pride in killing men like that?'

'It can't be helped, the man wanted to do scam as. The way I sees it, this er' eye for eye, a tooth in the spine.'

He took the last part back and considered it for a moment. Least of all he should know this. It was a hard fall, yet they wondered. They could've used the man's insight in order to cross the bridge. They could've done it easily if he'd been spared.

But lo this vision couldn't be further than the truth for out there came the noise making flying machine. In the distance, it could wonder at itself, never to look onward at what was going on and how, they missed the pieces of the thinning air. A blast from the Alabaster, they called home instead. They saw the distant flaying ship fully taking off on a whim. Such power emerged from its giant engines that the entire sky looked as if it would be caught. Sometimes sound would travel instead of being caught in clouds. Benign approaching, thence it mattered.

'Where are supposed to take him to?'

They wondered.

For a moment, they had shown some sorrow, for their lost man, a louth, and cowering and cowering they couldn't press it. He had a simple button inserted in his head. One push and it would open, allowing the insides to crawl out and be freed, running along like a young lizard in a sad attempt to escape its mild encompassing fate. For that was what they needed now, even more trouble spoken about. It should be noted that they had no control over the way they acted. A scene such as this would be enacted in the ardour of sunken-needle rings, amongst whom they'd travel and never see the spring.

'We have to make the pass to the large surmounting area in the South-region pass whence they know of it and might be avoiding.'

But they hadn't know, it wasn't decided yet.

If it were so, they might've settled for less, getting away, trying to decide how to get out of the way before the one fell.

'And yet.'

They stop, no longer marching. It was a filthy play they couldn't embrace any longer. Pointless, as much as a headache would be allowed. In that case, they stopped.

'Let the marching armies kill us.'

Hawks said, he had enough. Enough of the walking, enough of being lost. They were on the road out there, somehow and he had been nigh-responsible for tracking it down. Let alone see what was going with their minds, to shatter the road and walk on it. Thence thrice the more and little less could it be. For whichever way they fell, they couldn't rise away and saw a way in.

'So be it, we'll set camp here, for this night.'

Unless you clearly counted the pebbles for each time they managed to land a foot off the ground, you missed it and you should. Every displaced pebble hid the corpse that his in that malignat place, it could. Be counted, so to account for the entry into the occult. They had no dignity any longer, passing with the others, as they waited for something to go on.

Nothing happened, and a universal instability could not be denied. It was that cancer of the mind which started walking on its own feet right in front of them in daylight. From the amount of tusks that emerged, a blockage came from them. A lighter turned the fumes in a decider.

Hawks suffered in silence. It was all those countless nights he spent scouting the places in order to make sure than none of the others would have their throats slit during the shifts. It started getting onto him.

'You okay?'

Startled he prepared the knife. Rat-fellow or not, he almost slithered his face as it started turning into the vermin he didn't like the look of now. He was much lighter than that and it was much less of a bother to search or shout. They should've said something, but most of them abstained. He was clearly affected while they paid him so much to remain.

'Here's some more power. Use it if you must. This extract should keep you going for a few more nights.' It felt like snuff. Bad, worse, abhorrent, most of the particles felt like picks impaling his nostrils, dragging forth. That's what he couldn't shake off.

How did I manage to get here? Of course nought would suffice his interests, let alone would he be aroused by thought. After a while, it could turn on him, he had to match them, wit to that. All of the heads attached to the pipes resembled him by every feature he looked back at. He was met half-way in. Why? Would it matter if he pressed in?'

Psychosis

It was not going to go away. Regardless of how you looked at it, there would be no other direction to which it'd go to. They waited for him to say something. It took him a while to get around and make some noise. He was mind-busted. Walking in a desert of combs around the same town everyone else appeared to have already gotten accustomed to. And it was dry, his hands and his throat was perched but his body was way too dry for a single human to deal with. That would have to wait for now. It was obvioust that for the time being they didn't care what was going on.

The Corps called, it was to go.

'Are we up to the challenge then?'

‘As always, you go first, I’ll follow.’

Though it was deplorable, trying to make their way through the whole process, it was required. Small radion-waves gnawed at the skin, making sure their pugintily shoved their deposits inside of them, in the reverse way a mosquito would desposit them. For that was way too close, it got way too close to comfort. And that didn’t even account for all the blood they started losing in the air as the molecules started combining. It was a mess, the street was filled with them. Snatcher, purse-watcher, it had to stop before it got too far. Their hands were already too embroidered in the fabric. Even by a slight chance, both arms shouldn’t have been welded to their shirts or to their broader faces. It was the only way they could go through.

It made them slack off, it made both of the men invisible to their eyes, even though they couldn’t have been farther from it if they tried. And worst of all was the smell. A scent still managed to infest their nostrils. They say that helps you concentrate. It helps you look away from the action which instead of making you even more trouble, it somehow saves you.

‘Are you serious this? We’re still eight miles from the station.’

‘I’ll be fine, I only need a breath of fresh air. And all this fabric feels like it’s about to smother me.’

‘Can’t it wait for a few more minutes at least? I have a bad feeling about it.’

‘Zipp it.’

He took no precaution in taking it off. He even ripped some of his skin off because he couldn’t help it. For someone who undertook the role of a protector of the citizen, he certainly was out of it now. Worse than a drunk at least, he took a shot to his head and one to his throat. The fabric had a way of showing, of making those marks pop out despite not being touched by it. That’s how you first detect them, it’s the first impassible test. First fabric gets attached, then he gets his patched checked out and if they’re growing. He needed to go. As far away from this place as possible.

‘You can’t come back with me at the station, you know that, right?’

‘Why not, I’m still clean.’

He wasn’t clear on it though. He was out of it, bottle in hand, a gun in the pocker and all cards were dealt with.

I should’ve known better than this.

It certainly was peaceful, wasn’t it? For once, everything I wanted went my way. He rested there with a bullet behind his ears, the kin were already on top of him, covered in the fabric. It spread and ate at them. It was straining, for the same reason they were nastily in awe. As much as it would be allowed, I had no idea who the man who joined me was. But were both headed in the right direction I think.

He was flat headed, too much for my comfort. He asked for a cigar but gave no change. He got into my car but I did not know him yet. He had a gun and an explosive device implanted in his both. Respectively his arm and his chest, but this wasn’t happening that often to begin with. It was somewhat safe, or so I felt. Without looking around me, I would've known. Instinctively, I would. The city was a trash-heap , a ruin of its former self. At times, I wondered what was going on and why there were no lights signaling my return this time around.

‘Allco, I need you to pin me down and my company...’

‘Joe.’

‘Right, me and Joe are going to head around my office. Bussiness trip.’

She didn't notice anything suspicious. Nothing was being pinned down for now. It was quaint, thinking about how many people were here. It went too smooth, it was uncalculated. We were both out of it now.

‘Check the first shelf, you should see a few credits stashed around there.’

‘No interested.’

He didn't show much emotion. As soon as we entered in, he came only as someone who was indisposed of hearing what I wanted to say. I asked him for a drink, he refused it. I tried persuading him with everything else I had on me. My car, my plates, the insurance on the brain-boxes I was to transport. But he kept refusing.

‘Lock the door, I want the two of us to stay here undisturbed by anyone.’

‘You're one of those fellows, aren't you? I suppose you're planning on doing something we're both going to regret, aren't you?’

No nervous laughter, only cold steel from which neither of us managed to move on from. It was only how the life was, in the city. And these were its people. Of course, he would have to get away from it. Eventually, he promised to himself, he'd find a way, not to make too much of a case out of it, a solitary house near the sea-side, somewhere in the New Pacific Coast, right under the rooftop of the nations. He's worked how many years now? It was hard to track any longer. Twenty, eighty, fifty years? The passing of time and the systems became so altered that it hadn't made any sense in the longest time. It made him realise that some things can't be forced.

This time around, something could be done about it.

‘Show some emotion, you're a human after all.’

‘Only animals show emotion, you know that, don't you?’

The directive already established that the chemicals released in the air took them away from us.

We were headed only in one direction and it was never clear where. He had his hand-gun pointed at me, just in case I had the nerve of thinking of a way out. 'Hello, hello, who's there?'

It was a dead line. Thoughts in check but there was nobody trying to get away from sight. No one spoke for five minutes. Then they closed. It was loathsome waiting whilst standing on a dead-couch, listening to radio tunes that were never even starting to play on when needed. And it was all so empty, seeing the phone receiver being eaten little by little by non-seen termites. They came from inside her finger. Asthma thought about replacing it. Ever since the vibrations started pushing through his ear, he knew he couldn't handle it any longer. It was all on the line, the call he needed to get from the company, he'd die otherwise. Bluntly put, it was the only thing stopping him from jumping out the tenth's story apartment floor he lived in. The chasm which surrounded the building didn't help either, it only made everything much worse. For now he rested. It took him a moment to scrape the skin off his temple but when he did it, it finally came out. It was a phone-receptor, an old one, one of those antiques you'd see in black and white photos that you'd refuse to touch for whichever reason. It bothered him for some reason, the thought of answering it. It was shaped like a foam supporter wrapped around the handle of a wine-cup. It was fashioned that way, like a sealing valve, verdant but it bore many small puncture holes. He placed it at his ear and listened.

'Who is it? Hello, hello.' He spaced out. All too likely, he spent his time running his fingers in circles that were never there. For once he questioned what he was doing and why. It was clear, he needed a break from it, but the hole ran too deep. Eventually, it would reach his brain and cause a brain hemorrhage to occur. Blasted thought, it came to him. There was an easy way out and an easy way in. Walls were being around by the emission. It came to him only then that this wasn't the same house he had been in before. If it had been, she would've been the same person. She wasn't. A key difference that made him stop was the presence of un-seen walls. Those were eaten as well, and without experiencing pain, he could do anything but grab them. So he had tried, as ever. Picking up one of the long-knives he carried on him, Asthma made a cut. It ran as deep as one could suffer making himself bleed around an invisible mattress. As soon as it became encompassed in red, the opening revealed itself. From inside came Esklot. He was a man hiding inside the mattress, not a humanoid, otherwise those long metallic sizzling arcs wouldn't make any sense at all, but, one that was similar to them. He had a haircut that pushed inward and the hair springs were made of iron. He offered a single match which had been taken out of his gut. He wanted me to burn the place.

I agreed to the arson and saw it fit to listen to the received again, seeing how with every step it started pushing out of my neck, battling for a single spot in line. I was sure it was not meant to act that way, but I did as much as I could pay for. They had me sniffer. After hearing the other line reveal the other end, I knew my wife was dead. Second wife or not, she was an intruder. But that had to wait for now, first the fire and afterwards that. I had to look to the point where I was being taken and what would wait for me after that. Every time he did it, a single further-burning cut appeared. But they went through with it, the apartment had been scorched. It was done for. They wouldn't be able to restore it any longer, especially since, after judging by the amount of damage that had been done, at least several years could be taken to put everything in place and make it so it would never be lost from there. I saw it fit that I was just as scorched. Seeing how one of the mirrors was untouched, I looked back at the place. Both of us did. Despite both of us looking the way we were, he was up-standing, more than I could ever say about myself. Compared to me, he had a bunch of metal sutures that prevented him from falling apart. I could see the intensity he was trying to push through as he gazed at the mirror then back at me. He saw the receptor and asked about it.

How come that didn't die in the fire? That much he couldn't even hope to point in the right direction. And there was another thing he wondered as well, what was the other wall, the fake-placed. It was flaking out of the way. I could feel some scent coming out of it and as I followed, it just dawned on me. We were both intruding in our neighbor's apartment. What a weird thing to say, at last. It was one of the deformed buildings that we lived in. The ones that didn't allow for much to be seen or heard. But there had to be more. After scraping my other temple, I pulled out another receiver. It was natural, despite what common sense dictated. I wanted hide it but I couldn't. After a while I would get used to it, from the amount of acoustics that bounced from one end to another, to the other noise. That one was of another kind I couldn't stare for long at. Every second I listened to it, both cables on both ends hardened. They had not only received a life of their own, but they appeared to dictate my every action, my every move. I had to prove it to myself that I wouldn't allow the deeper thing to rise. It wanted to get out, that's why the images of torture started flashing in like cards that were cutting through my throat. It was the only thing I wanted now, some reassurance that I was fine. Relentlessly in awe, I figured I would do the only thing I could put my mind on. I would do it well. It would do well to at least try it.

It was the speed of the mind at which the hands were created. They were overly exposed and limited to a sight unlike no other, for the sole reason they started cutting down many of the spores that began ruminating around the sea. Anglers joined them during noon. Then it was finally understood, exactly, as it happened, where they were coming from. It was distasteful, trying his hand. He was a thief. He stole pockets. Pockets turned to blood, just like diamonds, he ended up with a few piled off. Right next the shore where the sea would take care of the rest and he hadn't had a need to look back for what he's lost. It was mid-afternoon afterwards, when he came back home.

'You got what I asked of you?'

'Of course I have, here's the pray. That should cover my expenses for at least a week, shouldn't it?'

'Were you seen?'

'I wasn't followed.'

'It wasn't what I asked.'

'Then you should better than that.'

It was night, he would be night-followed. It could be seen by the counter-measure of his neck, it dug deeper than expected. It was lost on him because his mind didn't allow it. Perhaps it was thrice when he came onto him. He was shot, soon, blasted on the street with a pile of feet in his sack, which only had to have happened on the streets of Sicily. It was here where the sky was laughter and a pocket-grabber like him would get some work. It wasn't going to happen. It was all wishful thinking at its best. They detested that, as a matter of fact, it could only come on them this way.

'We won't make it through this way, don't you get it? We're only stalling for time.'

And time and time again, there was nothing to look after, not after one another and certainly not for themselves. It was conductive as well, the scent they shared.

Stopped by chance, he wondered what could go wrong. It was somewhat useless trying to get through. It had only seemed like they could spare one another through. By chance, it didn't happen.

'What is the meaning of this?'

City of mind lost

Elegant darted to the Proto-being, without the slightest expectation to his mind. He had tired of questioning him or doing anything even as slightly harmful as he would. From what he seen now, he could only, or should only stick by him. Careful as he were, they descended through the peaks of sparrow and basked upon such a graceful society as of which likes had never been seen. It was a dangerous but benign lout that showed on them. It was in this light that they started thinking as it ought to be, as it ought to happen and it should. Just by the roads they had been waited for in one of the most peculiar carriage that landed there. Both of its sides were feathers, but not in the same way the sparrows were. Instead, these feathers were only getting darker until they came into contact with them. At that point on, they fumigated like a continuous storm that was kept inside. Even the mahagony was somewhat ill-surrounded by a disgusting delight, painted faces and the heads of birds which hung around the top, and which surrounded the wood of block they entered in. As soon as they offered, the giant Sparrow responsible for dragging it, as if it were cart reassured them that this ride had no need to be paid for. It was a crooked way of pushing through some unneeded bankruptcy and solidarity of pain. But they chose to take it.

Last was the only one who entered. Henceforth, of course he would be the only one to bother going about its insides.

‘I don’t like it in here. It’s all so old. I don’t like things that feel old. They give me a feeling of not belonging.

Really, I really do, I don’t think old people belong here. Do you think, do think I’ll grow old once? I can’t seem to find a way for it to happen, you know?

Every time I look in the mirror, at least, when I lived up there with the high-folk, I was detested, you know? They said things about me and they appeared to be true every time I looked at my reflection.’

‘And what would that be?’

Elegant faced only the white blinds through which he looked outside. He listened but conveyed only the slightest indifference he couldn’t draw away from. With all being said, he found himself searching for that magical place filled with strangely lit dove-statutes, whoemer might entrust him, he’d look at him only with the slightest thought of rubes. It was only then that he turned and question Last. What did they do? He didn’t understand it at first, but then again, no one was supposed to get something as vague as this was.

‘I know better than not to mind my own business here. Call me what you will but for once, I feel as if I can breathe again.

Perhaps it was a dark cloud which took my mind but, I see the world differently than before. You’re looking at me as if you don’t believe.’

‘I do, sir, of course I do and I’m not planning on trying to make you sound like a liar or someone struck-up on the rank. But.’

He considered this at least, for what was worth there was no sign that he would have some peace of the mind. It was only this.

‘You remind me of them, that’s why, no. You don’t remind me of them, you are them.’

After which he shot his mouth and remained quiet. Something like this couldn't be muttered more than once. It was unsatisfactory, it was a loss of his so-well earned compassion he considered getting rid off. First, the Elegant was to rise, they arrived at the place they were invited to attend to, whichever festivity they may come to, he had never considered this. Without the slightest hint of remorse, he pushed him down. And the Proto-being did not appear to mind much. At least I know this much, you're on my side, no matter where I'll get to and no matter what I might do. My dear murder-friend, that's what you are.

Both of them looked at one another and even in those wooden eyes he knew there was something going on. Perhaps it was a spark of life he had never bothered looking into which only now started manifesting. He rested on blocks of cinder, as they fell. It would only come to him in time as well.

What neither of them now was the Rot and John and the Wool-merchant's body were on their own out there, reunited for a short period of time they only spent messing around and trying to make do with the apocalyptic-wather. In it the sign of red, the plethora of chemicals lead to the imbalance which gave the strangled look they feared it would shake everything even tinted. Rising from the lands the sparrows minded not a second more in which they leaped and bothered themselves no less than it should be allowed.

At the top of one of the desolate buildings they stood and waited. One of the many heads managed to roll its way over only to leap and bite John's ear. If it must be so, it spoke through the beak without moving. An image like this was hard to count on.

'Don't get lost down there, you need to stay away, grave-digger.'

It flashed on his mind. The words had almost driven him to the blinding sight of a long last play, beneath the theater where he had once been called to attend the rising of the glassy-beings, whichever had remained the same. But there was more to it, which he hadn't enjoyed admitting. He tried to swallow but failed, pushing through his throat instead one last time.

A constant melting coil pushed the organic matter into one direction until pink had become boiled red, until it had become muscle and instead of spreading, a carapace grew on top. A hard-knocker rested inside, fuming as only a few bar-holes appeared inside of it. So much strength was being generated by the mere act of teeth claspings at one another that he felt as if he offered himself to one of the melting beings there. As the grave-digger he wanted to be eaten. He had been given, failing to realise that he was the one feeling the pain.

Meanwhile, as he had imagined, the creature whispering in ear already managed to implant the dot-like tiny blots of scum that would deposit every filth-ball he carried around.

Farther away yet.

It was their fault alone, and for this mere act of treason they couldn't fathom turning. Thumb thumb thumb in the jointer, they were always trying to get a single pointer. And the headless basin came through the reeds. He stopped and threw a few other spears. Dreadfully as they were, it was through the single hole picker from the pouring yanker.

Then the rage came back to him and though the disaster could not be dealt with, they started creeping in, the veins. So much power could not be conveyed. It burned like a bomb that thrashed his skull-knuckles.

So much for his mind, it was gone.

‘I see, it all makes so much sense now doesn’t it?’

He search for a second in his mind. Of course, of course, it all made sense, too much for his own good.

Twenty days ago, of course.

‘Why not buy into it now, good man?’

A supreme command was given into the poor man’s head. He couldn’t draw away from it any longer.

‘My greatest work yet.’

The old man thought, while unmet by Agamemnus, he had almost done it.

‘The Convenent of the elders, I think I shall make it blunder under their bones. Why yes, I shall exploit all of them until I will not be able to do it no longer, hah.’

The old man thought. It was a nice trick, pretending he died, even then, with a cracked skull and a pierced mind. It was just another filthy trick, another one of his exploits, his racial blood being red, red, red, of no human color. Masked in rivers of corruption, starvation, exploitation and filth.

‘Yes.’

He said. Unable to contain his mad pulsing desires, he only made notes, fake notes at that.

The God-box spoke from its metallic envelope:

‘Search for them, out there, by their filthy facial features.’

It spoke in mad intonations, never drawing near the creation of the perfidious creatures it hunted.

‘Go forth and let us not settle until it hath become an obsession, driven by madness never-ending.’

Soon the mad voice continued, in its never-ending contortion-turned.

‘It was clear, even before I heard it happen, he had become obsessed with what that box started telling him. He’s being fet by the minute, fed by the impulse, over and over the Rhine.’

How could he be helped? Poor picke of a man, Francis Boulevard, broken as he was, drunk by the passionless features that launched him forth. Overly obsessed with them, he fancied creeping of men and women, trying to pin down everything they had on paper and around the bases of their skulls.

And the size of their lips, the shapes of their noses, their craniums and flat occiputs, their hair types and every racial feature that distinguished them from the others. No matter how he looked, whichever direction.

‘There, and that way, you and you, the ones I’m pointing at.’

Boulevard noticed it, couldn’t help it. Because of the box, it was the box which told him, he pointed and laughed.

‘Why yes, that prognathism does make you less human.’

His laughter almost drowned the room they were in. It couldn’t be helped. First man to be stalked and killed in his house, broken lock, stepped inside and he pulled his jaw out as he was sleeping. From his depths shot the green fat organ, the fat robust tendril grasper. Shortly after It started creeping out and bloating an oil-like verdure of ink-like plasma.

Francis stepped away.

‘I knew it.’

He reconfirmed with the box, and as soon as that happened, he started seeing the man for what he was. His body ripped in half and from every spot his features convexed and shot back. Crawling on top of a twice-folded ceiling, he rested on a dome. From his insides he was prone to leap, from ceiling to the whip of the ground. A fasting of a charge released him into the ground, the second floor resting. He nested in the lower-bed where the infants were sleeping inside the protruding back-bone shells. Unable to bring themselves back to life, in an intimate sight that happened all too fast for him to ignore, he noticed their transparent cells fill with their life-liquor, which drowned them inside of allowed them a second rest.

‘What have I done?’

‘You prevented his infants from spreading, unknowingly, you saved them. Saviour, saviour, saviour, saviour, saviour, you’ve done it, have you not?’

You listened to us, the god-box and you have been rewarded more than you could think about it in the age of the lot.’

And the lot was there, they watched, breaking the ceiling as they peered down on him. High-crowned armors that looked like ivory husks, pushed around them, mightily elongated to the peculiar white-hued sun that floated above of them. Constantly they burned, out of the heat, being sucked in by the white-sun and their blood-powder floated in between them.

‘Woe to the take in the Rhine for he know that this fate of theirs is benign. Heathen of weird paces, aviatory of mistakes, can you not see how its writhes in pain now?’

Mourning in their small dome, mightily forlorn for something they cannot help nor look back into. I see the light now, peering down on them. It wants you to waste no second and expand. Fill it with dread, drowning it in our sand.’

Thence the sadness ended, and the God-boxed confirmed.

Noses that were too big, mightily flat on the sides, eyes that were too small and slit and skulls that were too small in the front. It was a mighty change a pace, the change, that he could see it be reconstructed several times in the green puck that had emerged out of it. Now came the only thing that he could point at. A lavender scent, morse as it could be felt. Around the trims and never-wonder, they grew much weaker as they were exposed to air.

‘Pull its guts out first.’

God-box said and Francis stepped into the room below. An initial leap had been destined for him to carry on and get through. It could only be felt then, how this advent of pain would last him, never-knowing and also wondering why he was to be called, to be the executioner. Hard felt it came to him then. As much as those green vides tried encombering around the small shells, they failed time after time again, founder might, or should’ve known.

‘Burn them now, with sand.’

The Box said it as well and soon enough it erupted from inside. With a liquor of blue pushing out, a small chicken-like small man, transparent with everything in him from the ribcage to the other soft bones that suddenly became a strange apartment-like room, it spread around and took everything in.

‘Is this normal?’

‘We shall see now. The fiend is now dead and with that in mind you shall be allowed to continue forth and leave the building. Reap your reward outside, if you may so will it now.’

For tar was being set to follow, in the marches, the swamp between the elongated buildings that floated backwardly in a strange buffon-point, pyramid but reflected eighteen times and overlapped. It looked like the unit in control, an almost tower-like sharp fanged shaking construction that moved on.

‘You have twenty errands you have to move within a small frame time of twenty seconds.’

‘Where?’

Pointed out there, he was to killed someone who had his face elongated, someone who had been cradleboarded, horded by the many races, mixed with the filth of dumb paces. Most of them were filled with the conspiracy of trying to get him, since he feared he would be seen. He’d be noted of it and of everything he’s been trying to do as well as he could see it fit.

There was the healthier dose and the meaning of nothing brought by cold fields. All that emptiness needed to be filled sooner or later in the durghan.

‘And another breed pales to him.’

It was the insomniac speaking out of the breeding look of colabaster. He was after yet another fallen globe. As I were saying before, I haven’t actually thought about it in the present. There were other things going. There was also the other thing which never even crossed my mind so far. I had been so absorbed for year that I had forgotten what everything looked like.

‘It’s the strangenes of this place and its weird sea which make it stand out, wouldn’t you agree, Ivanoe?’

‘What was that?’

‘I think we just stopped now. Would you like to turn around?’

‘I want you to listen and look out of the grates.’

Lost planets

Despite being indisposed for the longest time, there wasn't any sign of it happening. That was the one thing that seemed to bother him. Seeing the universe in this state while realising that this was all because of him. It was a total state of disquiet which made him think of the past. There other lanes he should've been threading upon and other servants he might've shown pity towards. Pity, at least for him wasn't a blade, it wasn't an anchor but the tool of survival he would endow his children with. They had been reckless in his absence and appeared only to be called when needed for a shock. Their saviour was indisposed, yet he watched, as he would always do it without trying to interpose himself in their business. It was unexplainable, again, everything came so natural here. It was ominous for either of them. Growing like bacteria in the midst of space was no guarantee for either of them. Hence, entry into one of the abandoned planets, Post-Agammemnon, where the thunders of skin had refused to show it. For starters, it was much quieter than before. The Colossus-tongue Agammemnon would've loved it. Everything was so clean, that it couldn't be touched any longer, nor would it stray by any evil hand, and nothing could remain unturned, no stone of dirt-liver or the peculiar creations he had called his sons.

Not to worry about them for long now, that would only show a type of mercy that no one should ever be forced to see. But, there were proper days, when he enacted the rise of a dynasty he never cared about it. It prodded a lot. As the first sons had realised there was no supreme master to show them what life meant, how it should've been lived with the infinite examples, attention and given mind, they slowed down and started wandering about. Billions of flying beings had given in their attempted flight, instead they chose to stay on ground. It was a simple yet meaningless way of living for them. For the same reason they thought there would be no future for creatures like them, most had resolved to spend their time waiting in their pins and the marching within the strangest places ever to erect themselves from the ground, as pillars of snow, they rose from the glouts underneath the walkers. Some fell from beneath it, others got impaled by the many arms that came after, with each finger becoming spears that never stopped protruding forth. Agony was a dance and they could bring nothing forth, but this question. Where is our father and why had he forsaken us? No intonation would do for now, only the wonder and the question, what came after?

They didn't know how to react to it. The breaking, the eight-folded Etriarchs of skin who started floating towards the obscure dark-pink ball which pulled them closer to it. As far as they knew, rest they be assured of it, they could not be harmed. As soon as they reached its center of gravity, it opened like the shell of an egg and from it came the other Etriarchs of skin who hadn't been attached to the lower parts of their bodies any longer, giving themselves the opportunity to gather in as much of the pucker mass coming out of the shell.

What could be guess was the fact that they were hoistering their own filth as soon as they remained untouched. It was a disturbing look the citizens could not avert their eyes from. As soon as they joined one another in the dance of shades, none remained mentally prepared to see them connect. A unity was suddenly forced onto them. As soon as they began attaching their long arms to the curling masses inside their growing fake-lungs, thence started the terror they produced instead of trying to allow them a chance for respite, that the citizens might use to get away. It was filth for the sole reason that the lands had been theirs now. The Etriarchs appeared out of nowhere, claiming over the land before the faces could appear instead.

They were mocked by inaudible specks that could not be filled again. It went over their heads, lost for a reality they couldn't be bothered about.

For, when Agamemnon finally arrived, he foamed with madness at that sight. So many humans were encombed, mummified in foam, breathing through organs that didn't belong to them, as it could be put bluntly. While they were missing, someone took their role. Someone attempted extending their dominion over what was rightfully theirs instead of allowing the respite to come. It was decided, they'd return. Since there was no chance for such a vile rabid creature bent on sending them back, to their likings they chose to push the Etriarchs back before they'd go again. They would only be met by brute strength and no mind for the taking. 'I see there's a reason you're here for. You've come and brought your forced yet you have not spoken with us before.'

But what was there to be said? They'd only look instead of trying to spare them of feeling dust. It would be lost on them, and only that mattered, at last. 'I'm only trying to help your kind, don't look at us as if we're something to be minded about.' But the Etriarchs would not be heard, they would not be allowed to talk to them out of senses. This was no court, but it could be done. Instead of trying to instill a battle, they decided that this conflict wasn't worth it. Soon after they went, instead for a chance, a shot at them. 'Claim only one of them, we shall bring him to the court of dead.' Where the Duke had been and where he'll walk again once he'll be found. Wherever he might be, the place was theirs now.

When the faces of Agamemnon appeared there, in their own made packs, as outlandish as they were at that, it was decided that they'd look out for one another, not to be tricked into doing the bidding of a mad being such as the Etriarch. And when he was brought here, it was more than clear that he wasn't going to be easily allowed to make do with the materials he could come into contact with. This sudden dissapereance was nothing that was planned. As a matter of fact, he was bleeding on the floor, unable to control the leeching of the many tubes he had left behind him. Of course this would do, in more than a way, he had already been easily defeated without having to put a single shimmer of effort to get through them. He rested for a second, looking for a chance to do something, so he may get out before he was asked for. Certainly, it could be done. All of the bodies that surrounded them began the admission of frowns in the court. It wasn't likely that they'd show any kind of emotion that wasn't theirs, alone. As it happened, for now, there was no way for them to be mocked. All the bodies opened their mouth as they began questioning where he was. 'Will he speak and will he be listened to?' Nay they weren't going to. It was more than feasible to believe that they had, enough of it.

Where's the Duke? Where's the Duke, where's the Duke? The voices asked but never got a response to begin with. He was here before, he was there, he should've said something. There was something to the Duke they had never ever come to realise. For he was, he was lost. To them, the Duke was lost. He was beyond royalty, the plane and the strange kingdom he desired was just as lost. And they had never managed to realise what the Duke's worth was until then, when the dead spoke of him in kind word, whilst never showing a sign that they would betray this sublime version of him that remained. He would be trapped in there, if it were for them, but as these beasts realised, the Etriatrch was not there. He wasn't there any longer, he disappeared back into the world at last and it had only happened because they got suddenly distracted while refusing to pay any attention to what was going on around this chaos and the piling up caused by the flood.

'We ought to do something about it, shouldn't we?'

'What do you propose then? I see no reason I could even come to mind. I see only a window through which we may act but only for a short period of time, I say. Let us not waste our time complaining and search for him.'

'Stop it. If we couldn't find one of our own, what hope is there that we may find him wherever he went on?'

It gnawed at them. Even then, even now, despite being fractioned into so many and so many more, they resounded to get lost and not convey a thing. They couldn't fathom staying in for long. They could not debate it, for the boils startled even the dead. Agamemnons couldn't fathom the fact that another one of their servants was lost. This would have to do. Farther, out there, in the worlds that couldn't even be touched by their unaware mental condition started being afflicted by their madness, unknown to them, in the like. The filth essence crossed the path of ships and entered through the minds of the decantors as they erected the first Roman-glyph altars in the names. Osidar, as it had been. The name of the planet on which the Obsidian race was given birth in, the Obsidars remained in awe, growing and mastering the craft of popping out of their own tars, as that was the only way they would deal with the invasion that was taking place. An engulfing platter of struck leds began accessing their electric beds.

How could he talk now that his lips were tightly sewn together? How could he walk when his legs had fingers growing out of their form like cacti needles pushing out for more? And what of the deformed arms that never came about his mouth, which never ever started growing, as they remained as small as he was unknowing? This bind erected fool tall-breed. A victim of the eugenic program which forced him on the streets to feed the hyena-children and those who were made out of skin-barrels and nanoscopic tall-walking blood-taking led-heads. They walked together hand in hand, attacking whoever they might see right, instead of praying for the after. It would only be then that they could discover the light inside the arc which followed after.

'Get down before it collapses.'

A citizen was too slow, almost moronically cowed so far that he failed to get out of the way. As in part, a piece of the building was made out of the entire batter-like sandwich build, with the insides of it being made out of normal men and hard working people who covered up the losses. In their fall, they started cowering around in the pus-inflicting masses that gathered around them. Some escaped but only walked like crabs, eight of them tied together, carrying the same burden underneath their plain robes.

'Outta the way, they're trying to pass.'

It was less than clear what they were after. Nor could they see the reaction any longer as their weak limbs gave in. They dirtied the streets as they crawled as un-well as amoebas would, towards the darkest spots, a receding piece of multiple cars which went into one place. There they rested and converted the bodies into their hideous. And there most of them gathered and hid, bidding on their loves ones on the dark market they created inside of it.'

'Twenty marks of silver-tint for my wife and my daughter. I made sure they're not alive any longer, so you don't have to bother about the consequences any longer. I'm more than sure we can work something around it.'

'Eight marks and I'll give you the head of an ape, any ape, just name it.'

The man before the counter, the one after him and whoever followed him in the back, the staff and those surrounding him all looked like ape-heads in robes of humans. They were doing a poor job attempting to hide it from him, as he knew better than to throw himself at the first small-suited, doctor-like aproned trader, who would try to shimmer in.

'I'll have his.'

'All right then, you can have his head.'

He simply gave it away as if it were nothing. But from that pot-hole came the first clue I needed to know they would not play fair. We were at even terms and without a doubt, I couldn't fathom looking around for too much. This place was sick.

There were at least eight upper levels and despite car-metal being used to construct it, the insides looked more abstract. Moving shapes and colors gave it a futuristic look the common mans' eyes couldn't get accustomed to. If it were to be anything else, this would be it, she strange walking people, the giants that were trying to get out of it but spoke in tiny roses that came out of the wall. They imbued the insides with a smell that was gone as soon as they dessintegrated. And after that their voices faded.

'Do not trade it now, he's trying to have your hand.'

'A scammer, a con-artist, are you now?'

'I would say that I'm rather a mere connoisseur than a man of class. Now listen here you lousy lout, you agreed to give me your wife and daughter, even in death. Least of all, you should at least consider giving them to me now before things get more heated.

Or, we could take it outside, in broad day-light.'

Where the air was scummier by the second, as each trade made inside the market forced the cars to produce an unfathomable amount of scum-smough, too much carbon monoxide from their own guts. And every time that happened, again, outside, you'd hear the sounds and the commotion of life going its way. Lauding one another as they spat the scum made out of the giants' brains. If they had not found an escape in time, they would end up that way, abandoned on the mere ground. Pouting even on the ground as they desperately tried getting away.

‘I’ll take it then.’

Despite the advice given by the turned-giant, he realised they weren’t giants at all. Termite-heads that were on opium, but he considered asking.

‘May I trade with them?’

‘Do what you like now, we got what we wanted. It’s illegal by the way, but I think we could trade if for a hue. A word and everyone inside the market will shut their mouths as if they had never seen you before at that.’

‘Will that do?’

Most of the ape-heads nodded. That included the one in his lap. And now came the fun and barter as he approached them with his ape-head, sounder. Louder than before, he drew in closer and asked for something more than he had on him. He couldn’t afford it, for that he could attest that this would be a scam from his side, as something he detested no more and no less. Various hues on the walls started fading as well, he traded too much ink with them, and now he couldn’t do it again. Perhaps I’ll have to play it safe and be cleverer than I’ve been before. Act natural, thought Gentle Bob.

He was smarter than that, and he hated the ape-heads. They were stuck at such a contrast with those fair-skin bodies they stole from the trade. Gentle Bob thought about it for a moment. Looking back at it, he found himself sickened by the fact that one of them would have his wife, let alone his daughter. He’d meet them with both disgust and some satisfaction that they were still walking, not alive but used in some way. He’d pay it. Being as disgusting as it sounded, it crossed his mind before.

But enough of that, it was delightful, listening to them speak tongues. One of them came out of the wall and just as expected, he was half-footed, like a dwarf-boyish figure. He was out of place and seemed to get arrogant by the minute. He was fuming as the carbon started being eliminated from the top of his grate-holed forehead. Of course he was a termite eater but that was beside the point. Without regard for human life, he leaped about the place and carried on back in place. Disfigured from the get-go, he started grabbing his only tool of malignant destruction.

‘He’s got a bomb, he’s brought in a bomb.’

They basked at him and got down, having no other chance to make it to the door as he was shocked by the color of blue and a petty-coting of ultramarine-green that left him glowing. Dangerously snowing with blood inside the market, they knew they could pass out.

‘I need you all to get down, now!’

He shouted as he pulled the black sphere and cubes, the strange device that started pumping in and out of bigger and darker cubes and sphere. All of which only brought the indignation of the color, the untrustworthy nature it bore, alas. The dwarf-boy giant took the ape-head out of my hand and started running around at an unfathomable speed, even by their standards. It was all so cruel to be there.

‘What have you done?’

I was asked but I could not even convey as much as a figure, my mind was plastic. I was mindless in such weird acts of commotions. Curled and bowed, I grabbed my head and shouted about the place.

‘Silence now or I’ll spare no one from inside the market. I need total silence to function.’

They couldn’t spare it, nor would they do with what they had. They had spared no one the sight of dread as they started walking out one by one. Many of them had their beards grown in the wrong places, their strange spines reverted while others walked on walls. Not a surface was even calm and the clamor only appeared then, at the worst of times.

Explosive pearls were hidden in and all of the sudden, they were no longer looking at the sky, nor barging in. What should be known was the fact that what took its place in sight was only a flat color of beige. A squarish anchor only started moving out of the way, as disease would result in distress. No more crossings, yet the dead started intoning there. They turned from their spots as the explosion wasn’t the outcome but a strange vile transparent sea-jelly like ever expanding veal that covered all. Everyone rose from their spots. Even Gentle Bob, who had nothing to do with anything he’s ever seen happening in front of him, yet he became, all of the sudden the main attraction. To him life was uncanny and unlikely to be gotten there. He would’ve done for a living if they paid him something to be dealt with anyway.

‘You are the only sane man here, you got to listen to this message of dread.’

The signal had remained strong. About the place, they were all induced in a walking catatonic state they could not move on from. Thence he was given a choice in the matter, with an alternative being an unseen disease, a distress of the mind and an eternity spent while not being alive, shoved inside the blocks of scum that were inherently evil inside him.

‘Listen to us, for we have been forced to deliver this vile thing to you at last.’

A message had been carried through dimensions and though he would be promised to it now. He’d keep it without a single speckle of doubt. He knew much better than to ruin everything in the trashing of the moon. A Mars-handled, swimming in the crater of the small represented planet came to him now. For a man looming inside it for so long, he was not red but missed both sides of his jaw through which the Mars-sand poured out in the pool instead. Though it was dirty, he missed his hips.

He was the second one who carried the message as if in part, from an envelope that had travelled way too far. And it had gotten through way too many shapes only to stop and come at it again.

‘Open it now and wait for the blood to spill entirely until it will be there no more.’

Gentle Bob did as he was asked to, never doubting at any point in time that if he had done something wrong, they would’ve taken no second off but killed him. It was something he dealt with closely. Never to mind a second more, for what was happening around the place was no symbol of gore, but a satisfaction and an addition to the family, all of them rising from the clots.

‘Focus now Bob, I need you to open it now and draw forth.’

He had spoken of the occult in there, for the letters appeared after the red sea. Around him they chanted as dead-people ought to be when surrounded by a night-divine figure in all its prime. He answered nought but read out louds. As soon as he began they all covered their ears, their eyes, their years and their mouths with hands that appeared out of nowhere and hands that were not of this age.

It was a gluttonous remark which only now tried getting away.

‘I need you to travel to the cavern in the north, descent downward to the place where you may enter his world and carry on this device to a man by the name of Ivanoe.’

So was it known so far.

Canker-world and eight Octaves

It was a crab-tumor leash that started spreading through their minds. Though they were weak-bodied and silent about it, they had only looked aside. Most of them were filthy and disgusting looking, weak, weak, all so weak. Filled to their armless dirty clothes, unable to listen or get down on their feet without the help, in which case it was why they were there. Not one of them answered about any of the inquiry that happened and drove the creator of all things mad, because they were aware of his retaliation.

‘Wrong in them shall you find them sitting and being hanged, for all they have done, in the forest-blocks of strong fired-icles, solidly covered in the stone-iron pay.’

We lay abandoned, we were forsaken. They, the be, all turned their backs on us, on the one that pierced the Thorn and killed its insides, slowly making it suffer because it could not be met. And they had not listened to the demands for all the hatred was not met.

Meeting it would be uneven, they couldn’t fill their healthy livers. But ho’, there to them, the pity looked for a way in, for his frustration wasn’t emptiness but something he had recognise.

‘Agamemnon shall come there and he shall rise again from the bed of filth, where he had sunken in the court.’

The gibberish was known, the leviathan emerged, and in it he appeared now, contorted and directed into the pit of scum. He had so much angst for them. His harted turned away remorse.

A spit of the cancer, the betrayal, it was what they did, spoketh of the truth in hidden sight, good riddance, they could not even fathom being alike. The force that drove everyone to girth and death, they feared. Most of their own, all looked at it and found only the self-pity and the worth.

‘That is how you recognise them, their traits of evil, all inherited.’

Every creature, and every jester in the room, all of them one Agamemnon, who hid himself in the Moon, and for every moon there was a leviathan and they were in the hundreds. Likely the radiation found them and it could not be believed either. For their sakes, this couldn't happen. No redemption for the misshapen clutches-men. Those between them nor the one hiding in the den.

'A filth of gibberish, the cross in paths, we shall hold agony and talk of it.'

For every Leviathan-jester, in sight, had been replaced, with the face of Agamemnon, in his might, lo to him and to and fro, for he cannot help it but spread himself through their veins and tenders wells. Like leppers in the sky, they told of the worst decantor.

Sinking in the skinless deck, when they exposed themselves to the upturned stink-remorseless flakes that fell of their faces, then they sang the cantor.

'Can we go now?'

They were there, but they were in the wall-suture. It bled. They bled. And they slipped on the blood and fell. But the blood was purple. It burned, touching it, seeing the weird abstract shapes coming out of the ship float away until they started making sense. Most of them looked like sad faces. It was terrible.

Not a single one of them was happy now. Since they weren't in a ship, but outside, surrounded by buildings. Some, if not all of the buildings were complete blocks of shades that could not be entered, which resembled the inner chambers of the bunker.

The entire sky was starless despite being night and instead of blue or dark, it was all dark-red, closely resembling an amber pearl that spend its time breeding the scent out. And most Agamemnon stood on tall humanoid bodies with dark coats. Long leather-like plane-long veils pushed on and dangled around the wind. They would be missed.

No one sad a thing for now, everyone wanted to wait and listen to the weird tunes they were listening to. Some strings were played, nothing out of it came. It was plainly put and no emotion. From one chord to another they stopped in order to recall this travesty.

Blind eyes moved but mouths stopped, anchored to a solid-kind of air, plentiful in the small diseased globes that swam inside the fair.

'We should go and check it.'

Though the fair was blasted into quiet, for it was not the human-kind, instead. Depths uncouted and unnatural structures travelled through realities after that. Lo and wait, an empty spot out there. Twas the second one, akin to a wheel that dissapeared, as one of the most fanatic embraces came, he who touched the sight of the Formeman in a reality that could not be touched again stopped.

Quietly but morose they sang along and waited. Something had to come after a while, the ships would fathom another try. It was this lack of interest that drove them from the pack.

It could not be dealt with after that. A peace of soul corrupted.

There was a severe issue in the severing of his gut.

‘Sir, the child was born as an infant with the head of a shark-like spear and it’s going to keep growing as long as the evil prune-fat bees continue stalking him. Whatever must we do?’

‘We could simply make another incision and draw everything away from him. He’ll bleed like the hell of ice in during an aurora as it crossed the heat death.’

So long, as it was fine, it could not be denied.

Set the satin, the sate was up. It boiled through space and got carried aback. Part of the leviathan wasted as its broiled side opened. Enter the stage, where the actors survived, for the plaster in their heads could only make it so they would see right. Eye watched like beads athunder, in the sick embodiment of crystal traps, twenty skull-anglers inside of them danced. And when they were perturbed while knowing, of the rowing in the sea of space, candles lit in his face.

‘Silence, silence, I need total silence to work now.’

Beliee spoke in a thunder-cord which frozen solid, from the bloody pocket that survived. A few big bodies, almost vase-erected white-embded creatures came out of their hidings, beyond their graves. Now came the laughter which soon stopped after. It was what dreadfully, yet morbid lanterns tried to say. In a laughter and the messenger, who had his eyes glued, conveyed only this play.

It had been waited for far too long, to be believed after so long, which would be the uncanny, the wonderment and the disease. A spear-malfomation which shot from his forehead erected the song as its mosquito-like tongue started floating out of the seeting atmosphere produced by the stage devices.

‘What are we in for?’

Agamemnon wondered, never to come on. He had been malnourished and looked into the ground. A small gourd upon his crest, he watched the rest appear. From his large coat, underneath the thrones that came forth, the buttons did came near. All of them were faced like him, grinning up from the unscolded chin. He floated inwardly, lacking in sight. A dreadful delight only scoweled him as he paid no heed to the days beyond time.

‘Play the songs and let the show continue now, in ether-black. Trap what you can on the stage, unlike any that may remain.’

Open-hearted, discontinued in the nearest cove, first they brought it in the cephalic hanged man. Long handled, from the back of his reins, he travelled with the mover that was implanted into his beack instead. Slowly crawling, he observed the land. Wherever they had been brought was anything but the proximity of the dead-lamb.

It was less than crazy. They wanted to make sure everyone was pursing. Stopped by it, they sang.

Flute in trance, it goes ahead and joins the whistling of the high octave. The rise, it turns and hearing itself churning around. An orchestra singing in the field of twisted notes, mostly enabled by the bodies of light, singing after the tumorii people rise from empty graves underneath the stage. In the mortis, they bring the extrem, the piano keys are bent as their spines join together the enacment. A violition of violins appear undistracted.

Morose comes the man churning, yet Agamemnon mourns no longer. He watches from all the heads, the beds unturned, disaster yearns before it clouds his gaze, sonnet's planning, yet another disastrous song. It plays in their minds, they cannot stop churning as they stopped at midnight, coming. Flanks of terminal points.

Far beneath the tender roads, where the cities stood, where people churned and pursed their lips in tune they feared it.

The plague generator ambience that called their ear-drums and poisoned their hearing-cunts, in the land of bland diseased. Whereas walking was painful, they could only nurture their own.

'It's never going to come by itself, is it?'

A morgue became the next piano, yet they sang atop its bloody curved sprinkle teeth. It was abhorrent how they sank beneath. The journey of Tim Borobby starts somewhere in the tracks of west, in the region of the wave-crest, whereas he had become of the wreckages of men. His heart was made out of decay-cubes, which made him understand the instability of life.

'Because I can, that's why I'm always going to do it, from now on and ever until my legs will start dropping and my scar shall be enboweled.'

Pierced by the knees and shallow, he disregarded them after the cotton towels had been passed around. Most of them were illuminating the sound.

More octaves started rowing, through the notes and ever knowing.

'Singers of duty, bring in your best. Beastly motion, no survivor may know what's it like, unrest.'

'We shall keep it civil then, shall we not?'

A rude awakening had become of the plague. Uncanny noise-chompers appeared, as they danced and neared their own peculiar dendroids they started dancing madly in the connotation of tuberculii. Span around the growing chaf, they started drowning each other out.

'Next in line.'

A call back is what they called it, the song of the coming and the disturbed. Rocked at the bottom gut, taken from his worth, hear him, next in line. The son Argus who stepped towards the feriboat with the giant balloon-rodents in order to reach the plight of Sicily, where the song had long directed him, plain and simple and never ended.

'End the coming of the bitter songs.'

'Whot said that? Why did you wake me from my sleep?'

At last he was met by someone in the poor-forests, the waltz being stricken under the reef. And down here, under a door, he stepped awkwardly next to the Willow Parlor Beast. It dragged its knuckles under the rims of woe.

‘It will ruin us all, that will be the end of us all I sayeth!’

Before he could appeal, it was late, as the boat was resting at the bottom of the ship, sunken before he knew what was going on.

From that point on he swam in whichever direction. It drove him dry, he pointed thoroughly but couldn’t pint his way out of a strongly center latched delivery which had either been entranged or completely removed form his head, anchored to the pointed reef-like walking, planar-bodied mongrels that came from the upper north, he rested against them with the lack of worth being tainted in his head. Emerging from the uncounted reeds, he tried wasting away his surprise after being met by him.

A creature that was completely embolded in brass, a strange aparition which had been embded in this reality when others could not even fathom living more than a single generation, were they damned yet? It couldn’t be so. Either it was plain, but nothing would remain on him. It was pointless checking for any feature, as this perfect apparition had been too plain. Nothing but a wild disdain could be taken from it there, a satisfaction from the ether-cancer, drawing like the sun as they came with their ivory dancers.

‘Begone heathen, you’re not welcome here either. You’ve swollen the stars and now you came here to disturb us even more with the filth of Mars.’

He couldn’t tell it an antler-sharpener iron spear, as it happened to it, they boiled him. Creepingly they followed thorough. A pint was taken from them.

‘Shall we sail north then, I think we need to go to somewhere we could harass more people.’

Spoke the God-box and Boulevard followed. It was one of the strangest panes, the anchor remains, but not nearly as it were before.

‘The sheer amount of distrust is being carried out.’

Now there came the plunder.

Twenty men came out of a booth, all of them were broken in the head and couldn’t take the sounder; thence the fall.

‘And then he shall come back again and destroy all in its path.’

The wreckage had started as soon as Agamemnus began launchis the spears, all of the faces appearing like canker-nodes, growing on their metallic edges. There was this satisfaction, seeing it erupt. As soon as it happened, they couldn’t get away from that dreadful being. The thron had succumbed to the dreadful strikes that started drawing in.

‘Through and through, we shall near it.’

The dead lamb

Before the liver-kettle came the dead lamb. As the kettles lived inside of it before the dawn of mankind. Glory to it and the listener who smirks at the sound of metal being bounced against the inside of the lamb. For it knows better than to shriek in pain and leave them wondering about the pace of time, events going in the dime of a moment before they would be lost again. There in a realm, a kingdom or a spot that wouldn't even come close to resembling space, it stands. And not even the likes of Agamemnon, the Suppressors, the Kings and the Red Gods have reached it for the lamb was safe, and about to be protected under every possible circumstance that may be carried about by the pilgrims of the Lamb. They had to protect it, for the dead lamb was supreme. It was the only thing that kept the liver-kettles within its grasp. What of us and what may be there? For those who heard the signals being sped, from the depths of the halls of Malakerth, the signals travelled, for he had become aware of the awe the kettle carried with it, as much as it would shatter. No man, no blind, no fool, no matter, they could not fathom going after. For that alone, they sang no word, no pity and no wonder, for what came forth.

The lamb pulsed within the strangeness of the journey. They couldn't go on blast the pity, up and turn around the maddened holds. See them for what they were in the land of bloated pigs that turned to scorn, in the days of the Centurions who turned from slumber and looked for a way back home. Their creators turning in day and night for the desire to carry on, in search for the lamb. For the lamb was the only thing that kept the kettles away from sight. A lantern turned to the road, its light was pale, from it a cone emerged at last, the center. From in, weeped a single stone from a manor, from a which a face stared back home. It could be said, not to forget, that in its wake, you'll see it well. As much as into space they chanted, as much as their desire wanted, they could not fathom carrying on, without the lamb, all was gone.

'A voice heard that and if one did, they will not stop until they'll have gone through with it and found the kettle, wherever it might be.'

'But many of them are still well hidden inside of her, can it not be forgotten? Will we not turn to the land that found us home?'

The gibber from the moon-leviathan continued. Without a pause, they were misgiven to someone better than them. A jest could not be turned back on their backs again. Pain was dizzily pushing them away, it could not be decided just what went through their heads. For none of the fools and none of the poppy knew where the lamb was or where they could find it in the midst of the carabin's deluge.

'Far thee well.'

A man said while he bore his strange house in the back. He had to carry in along his family before another flood came at last. He would not settle with something less. Despite what was needed, none may cross the distress of pages, written in the book of time. They couldn't fashion it out of past, for there was no mad leading to the lamb.

There were no clues, there no space, there was no nuclear tunnel that would lead to it instead. Only one chance could make it happen. Only after ages passed, only through the passing of the glimpses, could they see that there was some land out there where it may rest. Lest of all, it could be confessed by the man in cloth who lost the last piece of his mind punishing the dreadful men. For in his mind, he saw the tainted future that misslead him, instead of carrying for his own, he took no moment and went back to his rightful home. Where he belonged, they would not spend another ilk, the silk which had been embroidered around him made him feel forlorn. For one last time, before he died, he was not alone. Worshippers surrounded the man of faith, for he knew there was something waiting for him, past the land of hate. Where his heart rested and he did not cherrish going on. His holy mission had been done for and now he came on, turning around. Woe to him, oh blessed man, for in his death and in his wake, all had been done and worked for instead. He had lived a life and he perrished. But in the death, the bells were flemmished. Whatever was happening out there, these slight events that didn't seem to matter resonated with the lamb. For it was the sole thing that dictated everything that happened around the world, in the wake and in the coming, the symbol of disturbing filth but false delight. One supreme handle which kept everything from falling apart.

Gwen Orrows, her name was called back in. She appeared as she was called on the plastic-silk of bitter alloy that adorned the chamber she appeared in. Though she was much unknown, the cosmic nature was nurture to her wake, in her heart only this remained, the question she had asked for. 'Why am I here?' And why would she not remain? See the likes and none too many would push forth, they knew the better side of those who swore themselves for strike after strike, no delight would do for her and she went out of sight and appeared again. This time around she embraced the suit she was on, from which she would never be separated from again. It could be thought as nothing else but the need to watch and make do. They drowned her into lavish appparel and the heaviest armor she walked into.

'You have been called to aske.' They said. But the council of the lamb could not decide ye'. For yet they were unaware, what made her what she was and how had she come again. Walk through the town, they spoke of it now. After so many false recreations she had lived through this time it would happen for one last time.

The admniration was near, and nothing even close to it would appear as it were before. This was the universe in the reality they showed it to be born. And they could do no thing and they could do without many. Citizens were around but they couldn't flail out of the way unless they encountered themselves as many as eighteen times. All of them loitering in sight. It could not be forseen that she would know what to say.

'Hello, I have been missing for some time.'

Hopefully, this time around, she'd knew what to say, instead of looking down. For back then, she couldn't helpt it. Her strength was pushed through, but never found on any strength, without direction, at any point, instead of watching.

'Gwen, here, can you see me?'

A voice came from the back, it was somehow different from everything she was listening to, more so, she couldn't ignore it. Despite her not seeing it, the council would know. They would watch her closely, it'd be settled before she knew it and before the time for her to fight against their will even came to show up. The radar started going off its track. Various pins and tongues went as madly as they might in each and every direction that got the chance to tire way. There was something being watched on him, closely. As it happened for his heart to be dawned upon, lest of all, it could be counted twice and thrice for day instead of lights that showed. He was a modified man, a stranger from a distant time, a distant unspoken nature only counting here.

'I am Eruphaer.'

Presented as a scholar that could not be bothered to fully acknowledge her in part. Fewer kinds like her would stay, after hearing what went through her veins. It came to her that she need not speak too fast. Considering the fact that she had fasted until this very time when she wasn't even close to being alive.

'I shall starve to death in this place. You've taken everything I had, including my very own face. What am I left with then?'

Gwendolyn spoke to none, though she suspected someone other than herself had to have been responsible for her plight. It could not be considered any other way and this she admitted as she said.

'I'll make sure you're properly dealt with, do you hear? As soon as I get my hands on you, I'll make it so my time here will be paid for and never forgotten.'

That and whatever counted on her mind went away. It passed like a thought, at if it wouldn't stay. As much as she would like this town, she had an opportunity not to loom around. Instead the nearest trajectory that came to her was there, into the distance where she pointed, as the spoiled brat she acted as.

Eruphaer appeared yonder, and he brought, with the help of his radar, him, closely under. Korvk was the one who mustered the controls. He was only kept moving by the mechanism that were pushed and loom about him, saying.

'I must work on him constantly, if you don't mind, but what has happened and why are we here?'

Asound for the likes, there were no boundaries taken about. Looming over them as it came, there was no shattering sight more than there could be instead. It appeared like nothing it had looked like before. No hotel but more of a fortress in its full glory, which would appear in the likes of the fully blunted agony and glory. Out of nowhere as it came, from it a single man returned as he came out of sight. Gourney hadn't known the time.

He stumbled for a while. His suit was dity, more so than any coal-worker than himself.

'What's happening here?'

'We could ask you the same, stranger. That thing behind your back, do you live in there?'

'No, I have just escaped from it.'

Both Eruphaer and Korvk took to themselves to stand as if they were in need to guard themselves from him. He was threatening at least from this angle, since he came from the spot of danger, the malignant fortress that was bidding to be touched by the strangers and admired. For it malignant architecture bore more than a few dormant civilisations that had far surpassed man-kind. Hand made by the dormant races and the mad Obsidars, much worse than them in ancient times, those who dwelled beneath the ground.

Whence the advent of steam pushed them father than their malign uncivilised bodies remained, thence it came to that it should be tamed.

Yet none would know what they were avoiding or drawing away from. They couldn't have known of the lamb or of the premonition that rested before, as it came.

'Need I remind you that we have to get away? We have to get rid of the time and lose ourselves out of sight before it draws us in and disappears with us in here.'

'And why should we choose to enter it?'

Gwendolyn had asked the same, she hadn't even a sight for him, but Korvk and his minion would remain. They could penetrate the outer hulks, and somehow they could get through it and stay inside. It looked like it had grown to belly, and never sighted in the light of the uncanny.

'Follow through with it and see where you'll end up.'

I for one shall get out there, I shall make it.'

Even though he knew he had died before, he hadn't the slightest question or the desire to know where he might end. To say it again, he would have to cut the blur of reality and fence the air. But he went away as soon as he had come in terms with what he had done with them. It was past the first abduction when they found themselves standing in the room. The neighbor-lady wasn't there, she was missing. She's never missed a shot, especially when they were scorched people walking around, trying to get in. It was less than expected for them to actually bring something with them. Let alone had the spring man caught his arm into a trap, that he found himself fooling around his gut-trup again. Various scorched marks actually started spilling in. They had poured through his head, after crawling through his throat, instead of making a turn, now they came to him, again. He spoke in a tongue that was missing the four needed pieces of shrapnel that started appearing in his head.

'Where are we heading now? She's clearly not here.'

The fire stopped. Now they looked around, searching for something to take. It felt so awful so far. It was as if they had staked the place in hopes of getting away with something long before the idea even crossed them. Day, for once appeared to beat brightly in. One of the lost windows came off at a cost. They were both mentally impaired by the degenerate light that came in from the neon bed.

'What's your name by the way?'

'I'm Oskar.'

'Oskar, I need you to break that bed before I lose my mind and I start another fire.'

The possibility for that to happen was way too close to home. He should've known it. As a matter of fact, he knew that he wasn't lying about it. That's when it happened. From the opening, there he showed the gast of fumes. A torch-like pair of stacked eye-bladders were being shaped by him.

For the first time it was much clear than it had even been before. Everything simply floated to him when it was needed and nothing more was being said of it. But he couldn't let that distract him, not then.

'I will do it if I have to, as long as you don't burn anything in my absence, all right?'

'It's a deal.'

As he smiled, he not only revealed his crooked teeth but their tar apperance. It was a nasty hole which only pushed and pruned through them. It was inconsiderate but he couldn't look away. Mold and mice never even came as far as to resemble what was going on inside his throat. That pit of tar kept leaping out and spilling on the floor. Worst of all, I was to join him, I was burnt and soon our minds would be joined. What a terrible sight, and what a terrible thought. I had to do what he wanted of me, unless I stood the chance for this to happen and it would happen unless I did as he wanted.

'Just for this once, I'll do something unforgivable.'

It was much more inconsiderate. But as a way, this was only the first sign that the madness would stop. No more hiding in the dark, whatever that meant.

That's what the sign said. It carried on for too long in any case. Oskar's sight had been severely affected after spending too much time in. He ran towards it and started battering it as hard as he could. That failed to make as much as a dent. It dawned on him that he would actually have to try harder in order to get to somewhere. Somehow, that missed the spot as well, kicking, thrown and jerking the plugs had all resulted into nothing. This strange durability was nothing to be joked about and he didn't even care if he knew it any longer.

Tresspasser, you'll only start going at it again, won't you? You'll make them come and spoil the house. It was only a hint, but he took it. Much worse than before, he chose to treat this opportunity as a sign of an eternal day, a paradise which would entertain him to no end.

'Start the fire then, engulf the furniture then. Do it, I know you want to!'

'Well, well Oskar, I hadn't even suspected you had it in you in the first place. Come to think of it, I think I shall.

I'll do you one as go on with the ceiling.'

Various paintings she kept around were anything but beyond the reach of the fire. It was deplorable, detestable and without light they would see no way out. It felt nearing the point of fire, where it ended into respite.

'There, I think there's something happening on the floor beneath us.'

But neither of them could see it happening, in the right ascension and the light of day, it went missing. They were missing not only their legs, but the crawling features that helped them go about their business without causing any problems. Most of the androids hadn't any clue what was happening beyond the door, yet they came to trade.

'You have to open the door and pretend you live here.'

Oskar couldn't actually come to do that. They knew him by face, at least the androids who frequented this spot knew every tenant who submerged and kept to himself. Even those that moved and those who made noise, and if anything, if something were to happen, those numbers would be thicked off. They would remember, then the uniforms would leap on their backs and come out of their way here. What would they think of me then? It was something not even he could answer. At best, he could only vaguely fantasize about himself being locked in and brought to their assembly. What happened there? If he could even be fair about it, he'd admit it. He suspected it. Everyone knew they wouldn't return right.

'That's it.' Rightly so, Oskar realised what happened to him and why he was berated by these strange happenings now. It was only because he had been taken there.

'I was worked on, that's why this is happening to me. I think you know it as well, don't you?'

'I can not confirm, nor deny it, but Oskar, the fire is very much real. As real as you may be able to hold onto do it and feel the ashes and the burns. Unfortunately, it is far too late to stop now. We have to take the entire building down with us.'

It was a sullen chance, though it was well received.

Seyoko was there in the bar. Her face was a giant Japanese sign made out of clot-kanji. Her legs were backward and were as fat as they were shaped like bulls. From each of them two giant eyes opened. She spoke backwards. The house she lived in was half of the bar.

On one side the half-man looked half Japanese and half the stranger.

'I come in peace.'

I thought about the north, somehow. But I can only look back at the past without knowing it. After he spent one thought alone, he realised that only he and Seyoko were there, until Paul came into her house. He made sure to check the bar and the seats. Each song was a replay of something that had been played before.

Paul only took out a single face. He carried in around his face cabinet. The cabinet was heavy. Inside of it he stored the other parts he stole from the orphanage. It came to him that he was eating too much now. This bar was just the other side of the other, whereas a fight was about to ensue. His vertebrates soon followed, crested as they splashed the grits. All of them were nakedly dancing upon the wait, the lamented pins only made it so he knew.

We were taking the distance, once the Dutchman came inside her house as well. He was dressed in giant scallops which only pierced the giant walking cranes inside his bellies, all of which remained ahead, pushed out of the curling eyes and the strange feet he bore on the floor. Funske came near and opened his mouth and from it he puked the strange dark-blond cross-like curling people, small as they were, his servants were they. And they called themselves Dumnesunke. Now they joined the bar seeing how the doors closed at last.

‘Set this place to flight unless you want to leave the sight.’

It was a fair warning which was not pleasing to the eye. They placed each other as close as possible because the entirety of atoms that surrounded them began deforming. Despite being normal before the change, the entire house suddenly turned into a conic-wheel which made the others appear.

Eighty-five Seyokos, eighty-four Pauls, eighty-three Funkses and a few billion Dumnesunkes now inhabited the spiral. All of them were only growing wider and with each of them, it all came back. It was hard to wonder how they were listened at that, because as soon as the rotation stopped, they were released on the giant peaceful terrain. It was far too plain for either of them to know what would happen if they stood too much. From the ground upon they were greeted by an appearing factor, a shot in the neck that started spreading after with the giant-mold legs that were too high, it could be said that the circus tent they carried could fall and burn.

Underneath it, follow at all times, cutting through the linen-ground, a hole of hell-fire started pushing them inside. Giants grabbed the linen-wars, it was because of them that a few million Dumnesunkes fell inside and burned. They wouldn't be spared of the pain any time sooner because they liked it. And they swam in the fire and chose to spray no knees. It was a bestial thing than no sane man would understand, let alone care for what was going on down there.

The deeper they started going through, the nastier the scissors and the barber-blades would become. As their skin turned into burning hair, they had to be peeled off in order for their skeletons to push out and fly again. It was only the natural way in which the skeletons set to flight. It was only then that they realised that they were alive. And on the various piles they started constructing so many turned and outed sprayed stairs that none of them remained still, since all of them were made out of an almost never-ending supply of half scissors and iron combs which stuck together as they melted through the fire into the plain looking deeper level where they could finally become stars.

And some of them were already bearing the children of the man who looked from a giant place among the land. On his earth he knew that there was nothing more he wanted but to be there, talking to the trees and wondering what his children would do instead. He would have no ideas that they ended up setting out in a space-travel only to end up residing inside of one of the many Dumnesunkes as they came to be known. It was way too awkward for the legs and the circus for inside of it, as soon as it bowed for the Pauls, Seyokos and Funkses to enter.

Inside of it they bore the giant elephants together, molded into the balls that rotated inside the system before they had become stored and miss-turned. And they danced for only a second as they started chaining one another until the elephant-chains made a hole through the top of the tent. Out there they only managed to lodge themselves in one of the distant falling dens of the space-eater, the parasites that were in need of constant attention. And it was clear that for once, before considering going forth, they'd sing of pity and wonder, weep aloud.

Just what was happening to his poor Dumnesunkes now? Funkses cried because of it, since he couldn't swallow it, nor get too far. Way too many of them managed to shake themselves off the pit only to bring more of them on top of the many touchable inches they spread on. And after getting in touch with the crowd, they realised that they were all touched by the hammer as they grew their heads like that. Beating on the ground in endless times, the deaths had been called for and as it happened for them to finally suffer of some brain-bleeding, they realised this.

It was insufferable, it couldn't bring much to the peace. And quieter was not to be expected because they were all defect since their brains had occupied their entire bodies. Even their lungs and livers and sphincters had been drowned and absorbed by their brains. That's why they had no legs nor arms, shouting about the strangeness of the west as it came out them, looking to the east. They realised that the beast was withing them and it only appeared then, when they took a break from beating down. And masses of brains-pucks started floating and uniting until they made a sort of ruby that changed in color. First it pushed to some kind of desaturaion which started opening many mouths, but they did not even come close to be like those of humans. Instead they were the mouths of cinder-blocks, the ones of bolted stone-fish that swam in oceans of cement.

And the way in which they opened was too mechanical to be approached. Instead of looking in any other direction, the crowds turned and saw the single light and the many release that came out of them, as each cube that came out of that place brought something that shouldn't be looked upon. Instead they would be worshipped, as they were armed with many teeth from various species that had went through predatory ways of evolution. Some were long and sharp, others went through weak processes while most seemed to have mixed so many times that they started resembling oil-makers. Instead of praying for the strangeness of the weird trajectory they were going in, they were there.

And nowhere else, would they have forced the Japanese women to accept it as the faith, at last. As the Dumnesunkes, Pauls and Funkses forced them to convert to the faith of the Dead lamb. Would they listened if they had no other choice? That was the only thing they wanted to know without making much of noise now. Since they were the ones who barred the way out, on top of the elephant-bodied chained, it was clear that they would not be allowed to get out of there without accepting the Dead Lamb to pass. Without choice, they were being done one by one as they carried on their way to get as far away from the threat that was the burning.

What they knew, after entering the single fish-palace which was only a Ruse-museum made out of the elephant-canines that were rotating in a single point, thence came the first stop. In front of them, the gatekeeper watched and asked of them if they were worthy of a duel that could be done. And he would only let them all pass in spirit even if they died if there was at least one who defeated him. It could only be counted on him to set it right as it followed.

He wanted to waste no time and call for the distant Lapplander heads that appeared out of nowhere and started mocking the strange encompassing wonder space was.

And they also brought the highy-encompassed saw-like flat faces that came out of thorn, the islanders that were the Moors. And they were the ugliest and most distant of the lots as they walked only in strange train made out of their own kinds, eight in a line and caught by each other's bodies that were flat and weak, forced into flight like kites that were held by strings. In their strings they held a long connection that stretched all the way down to their planet, which was only a giant spherical body that held all of their circulation inside of it. If it were to blow, they'd die. If they went too far, they'd suffer a stroke and die. If they died here and they were brought back without their string, they would die inside of there as well.

From the looks of it, as soon as it could be collected, the information was detested out of the mere fact that it only traveled so far. They hadn't known it yet, but everyone started spreading rumors and doing the pottery of shell-like bins. Pinned in stranger places, they only admired one another's faces.

'I shall decide which stat-plum, those rocks that we should carry on before the penuma-noon will be brought here.'

'Bring in the first fight and we'll decide it in a match in which I'll bring no lighter.'

With each fist from behind, they carried from beneath the skin like giant rats underneath a carpet. Lo and farther they started pushing out and bursting out of the leathery layer until they had been launched at the first man. The hero Funkses could not do it any longer, they were too strong for him to take on. It was hard, pushing in for longer than he should. He conjured up more strength but fell under the many fists, the many forearms and even the giant mouthly heads that came out of him as soon as they were allowed to.

And every gatherkeeper head could feel nothing but the numbness they abandoned as soon as they were left out there to float in space. Later but sooner than now, they began being eaten as soon as they would allow it, by the Lapps and by the Moors, even by the strangest apparitions that did not belong there, but they shook themselves off guard, wanting to be a part of this. Rounded up, they even let the women fight. To no disgrace either, after all this time, they showed something.

But in reality, they died much faster than their counterparts despite their giant heads being protected. Viler than it was before, they wanted to munch but stopped. They had to come up with a plan today. This night in space would not even come as close as to convey what was going on. It was a meaningless fight, though their numbers were never ending. Even those skeletons in flight, which were still burning appeared to have joined their ranks. Though no longer smoldering, for that would've been way too dangerous for the taking and for the strange waking of the circus, watcher, it was still an interesting watch to say.

A Paul only turned towards two Funkses and another Seyoko instead.

Paul: 'I need to ask something of you if you don't mind. Please, in case you haven't noticed, we're losing the fight.'

Funkses: 'I will suggest you this then, we should find a way in and a way out. We have to make sure at least the three of us survive so we may not be lost today.'

Seyoko: 'And what of the servants.'

But the servants were too silent and did not enjoyed being touched. If it alligned well enough, they'd know it and why, why were they in a line? As it happened, the passing space stones, whatever celestial embodiment came home only turned flat because the exposure to the bad air, here it appeared to be only plentiful, as much as they knew.

‘We could break through it, couldn’t it? We need to break it through the space and reach the actual dead lamb before it turns on us.’

‘Whom?’

Paul asked Fuskas, but he thought he knew, beyond the oblong arachnid sacked man that appeared to have no face and arms and only multiple legs at that. His founder’s eyes were red and only came on top of his chest. What stood out were some tattoos on top of his chest. A nihilistic-companion that bore three numbers of six that meant nothing, let alone the numbers of a distant meaningless beast. He came from inside the elephant chain, where he had looked for nothing else but what he had. It was warmth and he had liked it for far too long, despite being as unexplainable as his presence here. Out of here, he thought long, farther away, then gone.

Words could not describe their strange appearance, they were a people after all. Inside the depths they hid and waited, without direction, it was something they detested much more than what they felt before. An advent would not be cherished as much as the nature of this act made it more than it was.

‘Will you join us in the fight? We could make it with a few other fighters. And it’s only getting more crowded.’

‘It is, isn’t it but I don’t think I mind it that much. I think I want to experience more of this if you don’t mind. I like what’s going on around me in this strange ring and the people I get to meet.

And myself and my endless servants.’

‘Our servants shall rule us forever, won’t they, I think they will, I’m so glad they will, I can only feel like a bird of quiet and of peace.’

And all of those who spoke were Fuskas. They admired themselves so much, especially since compared to the others around them, who weren’t even near as delightful as they were, they took the breaks and seemed to bear no contempt. As it were known, gathering around the place and planting themselves in days that were being met in the strangest ways brought nothing even close to being breath-taking.

‘I shall come and give you council, as that is the only way I think I could ever help you in the coming days. Know that you may walk for months and see the stars grow spikes out of them, for the reason that they’re struck in a prison of mad ages.

And they need to make the sea-space, where atoms lay and in which they swim drown. Otherwise, nothing could ever handle walking on.’

Listening to no ill-advancement was enough for them to know they should take on the council, going as they would. No longer counting on themselves, as if to know, falter not as carry on.

‘The plan, then, give us something we could use against him. I want to see the other side. I wish to know there’s something for me to fight on. My life will be a tenth-of the world in that case. And I will remain whole again.’

That much was known, he couldn't show any king that floated or any other watcher that wanted to place their bets. Gamblers that didn't belong there showed their faces once in a while. It was this mad indiscretion that veered in.

The flight of the Laplanders

Twice in north, where grass is white, in the crown of the Scandinavian lands. Whereas they claimed a small patch of land of their own, where the cold foliage pokes out of North and went into the Norwegian sea, there lived the lapps. And they were simple folk and did not say much, not like us, as they were uncivilized for the longest part.

Whereas they tented, there they mated. Where they schooled their herds, there was no wool, but reindeers claimed as tools. Their history is one of stillness and of cold, they touched their stones in search for heat and walked on patches of brown earth. Where their wolves followed, the pups would stray. Farther than they hoped to get, they chose instead to stay. The lapps lived over their small lands, making a living with their small hands, doing their small beds in shapes of snow.

They had many names for many types of snow they began looking at and observing. As their way was mostly that of nature and they have spent a lot of time there making sure they knew. Plain snow was all around them and it was nothing to be looked down upon.

And their words did not compare today, with anything they had fought for in the days they tired on the days of the snow-hay, cotton-snow on large plains, and small sparkles of snow-stars that came out of the night during storms where snow lay. Theirs was always a simpler way, never bothered and never asked. Whom shall come onto them at last? In days where they were only standing, less so than their hands allowed, nurturing the impaled fish back to life.

Feeding them cold-pearls as they waited for them to be warmed by the cottage fire, that's when the sound of spades was heard.

'I killed another one of them. What now?'

'Bring in the wood masses back to the spot, we'll start putting on the fire.'

Glielemule said, he wasn't to be trusted yet. He was one of the primordial ones. He looked like a Mongol, a frost Mongol of the worst kind. Even by his features he showed one of the most squinted of looks, like an inverted Negro that was shaken by the strange appearance as he adapted to the heights. And lo', he could carry nor could he deal against them out there, in plains.

Only the civilized people carried their flintlocks out and up and away. They went in parties of reindeer-quadrants, folded and pushed on, as if they were standing on giant carpets made out of brash hair, after which eend they pushed and started going, carried by the half-bodies of the animals they had domesticated before the times of the prodding. Into the other lands they went and wandered, even though they hadn't been welcomed after.

And even though some looked akin, they still kept to themselves and never lost the whim which the land had given then.

Pkotvar stood adjacent, as if guarding one of the many ice-walls that prevented their advent into the warmer lands, even though cold was known of both sides, he projected. Only a slight alvulve, to his memory served as a reminded, as they appeared from up'north and yon.

He knew this was only to call upon a supreme act of action. Otherwise, the fate of the village beyond the walls would be jeopardised. Pkotvar was a great fight, man of North, golden and blue and the likes that have been known to belong to the land ever since life was born there. Others like him stormed in as soon as he began drinking the goat-milk he carried while sounding its empty horn soon after.

'They're come, they're coming, bring on the battering rams and empty their insides.'

In the days of laughter and celebration, they filled the insides of the rams with the most atrocious ales, the sausages and stakes. Bigger boards had pushed their innards, yet their likings only brought it the filler. Stronger men had come from those lands. They could be unmatched on living land. Lushful as it was, the cold was barbarous and it couldn't be met by anything but the slightest homes. In the time they took to gather, some had smoked from their pipes and looked soon after at them from above.

'A few lapps, no less, no more. What have we to fear from them, men?

If this is what we ought to face, if this is what the stronger scents result in, I say we rummage their likes and floor their basins with blood. Today, we ought to do it today and make sure they'll die off and perish in the ground.

North is ours, the regions should be taken still, they're unwelcome here and know that I shall do everything in my power to no whim of the land and I shall claim for myself.'

To that they sang and cheered fro and to the man who leered with the true spirit of the north. For he was mighty in strength and mucle, yet humble when needed and soon after, called as he was by his men, he would them on.

'Ekulkamesh, of northern mountains in the snow, I see that you have been pittied by your ancestors in the times when you have gotten out of control.

We should strike peace and humble ourselves today. Can you not see that the people can't even surpass us or cause any harm in their simple way?'

'Foolish Kelsh, you're the descendant of a Welsh. Don't speak of our kin as if they were of their own, know that you're but a guest to our lands, even if your kin is distantly forlorn. Our lines may be entangled but do not preach to us today.

Know that it has happened, even to this moment, and other might say, that they had burned our houses when we were gone. Stolen our women and claimed for their own in order to pass as us. And they had done so much harm as if to spread no conviction but that of snow.

Cold may claim them in this pity land of sorrow.'

For he felt as if there was no need, not to listen to him nor to heed and admiration for the man. He was not excited nor had he wanted to do a thing as they. Might they listen to more, might they stop here and turn around, he couldn't handle waiting, thence he went and lead this war.

'We shall drive the invaders out of our lands and in the longest of whiles, we shall reclaim what's rightfully ours.'

For the rock-mountain, dark gods, forged in the likes of the blacksmith-hammer and the dark red that perched the fiery depths of the depths of the vale smiled on them for this very reason. Treachery was not found and they could not fathom fight on or trying to meet the opposition with anything but the most solid of strikes. It could not be belived. It couldn't be felt, but the strength they projected scared the lapps away.

As they ran, off they went off their reindeer-carpet abomination, which leered its ugly heads as they grew on and started pulling all the rib-cages they collected instead. Soon enough they spat out the dead men who came back fighting. And lo', he called on to Kelsh.

Ekulkamesh proded out of his fiery heart and said.

'There is your proof, mighty calling. Look upon it and question it no longer as I said, so shall be. Our kin was killed, they had been taken and in the end they ended up being fed, don't be mistaken.'

He had been right, the cold has not taken his mind after all, Kelsh surmised. And it could be nothing even closer to what he had been agonising about, yet the throng of ice, the cold volition, might not be said or spoken aloud.

They charged and went through the masses of the northmen that got up, before they could get on their feet, caught by the pains of axes, the weakness the reindeer masses was this. No force lay in their legs, nothing that may hinder themselves instead. What was worth of it, naught might call, it was the fact that they couldn't fight back. Other than regurgitate their madly things, they had been dealt with single shots after the play was done. No axe or handle dropped. But the flintlocks had been completely emptied in their antlers, where all of their lives and minds had been stored for countless generations. Lest it should be, that's when they stopped the piety and looked how simply it fellt down.

'Our gods smile upon us today, this was no fight but a butchers' job that had to be done. Let it remain here and freeze to its death. Its heat will belong to the snow and for us, this shall be the end no more.'

A ceremony had to take place nonetheless, for the victor took the spoil and he was granted the biggest of the heads. But what ought that to be in the distance if not a Lapp that attempted to crawl away? As opposed to the others, as it could be seen, he had been shot right beneath the rim of his ankle, unable to flee.

‘I wish I could dream of worms.’

Dangling about their infested tulips as they ran in circles, weaving, for them life was simply there, in colors standing unaware. Nothing formed their wild surroundings, yet the phantom-like scepters standing. And no joy could be extracted, most ancient of ways, enacted on where they lay.

He who searched after fell. Through stairways in broken floors, he steps into it a worm in a shoulder. And the dance of phantomine awaits.

It was there that they realised that there was no way to win. It was infantile believing, trying. Stopped in the midst of it, in a sea-leaward, where they waited, thence they were not directed in any other place. Tall and wide-faced, torn into a muck of frown, disgraced, there was nothing.

‘You can’t win, it’s what it is.’

Pssht, there was no noise, only the machine voice and no strength left to burn. As if the enigmatic voice stopped, they joined it.

Robert White

That was too close to comfort. They almost drone in, came onto him. Like blade of steel crossed during a pass towards the cathedral. Call it a divine intervention, call it whatever you may, for each step was almost guided by the God himself if you may. With all the filth going down the streets, with all of them begging for the spare of a gun, he stopped there, unable to breathe.

For once he wondered why and how he got there, during the moths, as flames erupted from the tv station and their small van. It will not be recorded any longer. As impartial as it were, the land fell apart, the bridge craned in. It pushed out and there he was on the other side of June. Not like a moon-walking tiny blot, but a man lost to the clear sunset in the lost horizon.

He could drop it now. All of the listeners were out of it by now. But he survived the shots and walked alone. Carrying a single spray, incest-ants being there, only floating when they were needed or pushed about the place, it didn’t matter. Rivers actually pushed out of the way. They were solid, like incest-polls but no ants could be seen. And most of the blood disipated, hence the moon halvened and from it they fell. Angels floating in twilight hooks, shaken by the devilery the fish danced in ponds. Nothing could be taken from the eye-devices, as they were too crude for anything to be drawn from it.

A clear nuclear strike could somehow lose itself between the walls. The smell of it would only lead you to the wrong path as he remembered, the cermon was done. He had not waited for the priest in order to start his confession.

‘We’re going to have to take a dive in now. Are you with me?’

Going down on the bolts, they held onto the tress and onto the Viet Congs, not to suffer it after. It went away, it felt psychedelic, how they were surrounded by them. During their own strange, inviolable peculiar institution, they were surrounded by the negroes, but they were on their side this time around. Bad memories could only work so far for the harted.

‘Lt. Jonathan H. Hellbert wants to see you soldier, we need to get to him before the hellfire drops on us, do you hear?’

A morning scuffle didn’t last as long after the first shots. No surrounding because of the small pettards, small pumps of plump gun-power dissipating in the surroundings and they were lost for some time. Around noon, they were off. Off to the next regiment, before they could be heard off. And Robert H. White couldn’t believe it. Some of the scum-chinks, square-eyed were there. Amongst them, it should be seen, they were trying to fit in with the farmers. They were fermenting iron clouds inside their weird-bottles, but the snuff was being hidden away from them.

‘Smell it, I want you to smell it and tell me what this feels like.’

‘What do you think it smells like?’

‘Gasoline, that’s why I asked you.’

‘Permission to go away, sir, please, yes, sir, please, yes sir.’

That’s when he was lost, he couldn’t keep it for too long. We lepped in lap-lepper beds until the night was done for. It was shallow, admitting that I had a feel for them. But we had to sleep together in benk-buds beds that were slightly pushed below the earth. Otherwise, I knew what would happen. We couldn’t get too close to the insects. I couldn’t fall asleep for long near the negroes. It was the times and I couldn’t trust them. Henceforth, morning started, sleep couldn’t be counted forth.

That feeling was somewhat convoluted. We were on the field. A mask for every yellow face, a dark one panted in white, Robert White couldn’t handle it. Being around, either way, he saw it only as a way to get through to them. He would be shot eventually.

Stolen from one of the filthy rustic camps they slept in.

Diary of a negro, that’s what he called it. Perhaps he should’ve known better than to look where he didn’t belong. Especially since they really didn’t like white men handling their stuff; first expectations came. Of course there had to be some illegal plants in there. White saw him flirt with one of the Gook-eyes, Darkie on the run, he was brown lipped but still with white-faced. It couldn’t hide his ugly mutt, but he knew he was mixed at that. Moreover, he wanted to go ahead with it.

I will read it, he said. He had to, he was destined to do it. Perhaps, call it a hunch, but the negro was an arab. But enough of that, thence he started going through it.

‘Morn’.

Going around the calf, seen them knuckle-boozos in the white surrounding. Marching green, they want to mess around. I know is better this way.

Gonna make some dook with one of the ladies. I see her look at me today, under the show. She's not seen a man like me today.'

A stop and a scribble, he hid something in between the pages, they were stuck together by a peel of some Columbus avocado that had melted there.

'Aye, I think I found something in here that might make some sense.'

Then he appeared, before White could finish reading. The negro looked perplexed. The negro had a name.

'Who would you happen to be?'

'Nicholas, is' what they call me. Got a problem with that sir?'

He looked at my hards, bare knuckled but grasping his journal. It was dangerous, trying to pin myself against him. Africans were dangerous, and he was from the Bronx they said. He was in the army now so I expected this at least of him.

'Will you behave?'

If I give this back to you, can I expect you to behave?'

It was quite enough he was being put through. His cheek-muscles appeared to convulse in and out, in and out until he couldn't take it any longer. He wanted to slag me, but he repented. Nothing would happen, not out here, we were watched. Some other soldiers stopped themselves from carrying the water buckets and looked at us closely. Of course I would not be seen today. It didn't matter. But I had their backs in case something happened, even if.

'Listen to me, boy. I want you to know this.

I'm only doing this because I think there's something to you.

I'm a Jesuit.'

He's a methodist.

'As a good Christian, I think there's something here, between us. I'll make you a deal. Listen to me, we forget about this, I rip off a few pages of your dumb-book and we'll be off our ways. Does that sound bright enough for you?'

Right enough for you. That was a slip. He knew better than that, but he didn't expect any better from the man. Of course he'll play on fingers like a fiddle. He didn't have much of a chance.

'So, do we have an understanding then?'

Still mad, the black only kept pouting his cheeks. He didn't even care about what he ought to happen after. He was lazy enough to let his guard down. An officer came between the two of us.

'Now, now, boys, I hope there's no problem here. I seriously hope I don't have to come between the two of you and do something I might come to regret, will I?'

There was nothing I could do about it. There wasn't any saying I could put through them. He was a neck in and wasting my time. I already knew what I wanted.

'Very well, have your money-book back. It's not like I got any use out of it anyway.'

He stopped pouting, we each went our ways. It was a call-back to the Colonial era. Our camp was yet to be segregated, but I knew I could somehow do it. If I tried hard enough, I would be listened to. First the commanding officer, then the paratroopers, the rest would fall easier after. Going around more than I could hope for, I knew I couldn't look outta the way. They were listening, prone for this night. Still no attack in sight, but were waking up every few hours, not to wake up with any of our throats slit.

I had a knife, he had a gun on me. Feeling it closer, it was more like a one-shot chick he carried on with it. Slang of Negras, I saw it fit that I would be gotten then. He must've slipped through the night. A whisper came to my ear.

'Don't make any noise, White, I know what's going through your mind now. I know better than do it in the middle of the night with everyone shaking.'

The beds were already rolled. He wasn't even the only one there. At least a quarter of our regiments was filled with them. But I somehow knew he was different from the rest. There was something mean about his face I couldn't take my mind off. A Baltimore thing that's what it was. It went over their heads.

'I want you to stop following me around. If and only if I lend you a few pages of my personal jiff, will you leave me alone?

Lend it, I want it back after. No shoot, no kill. Just plain this, I want to be left alone. I know you white folk are doing good keeping your word. I just want to get back home after the war is done.'

'There's no end to the war, you hear?

You might as well end it here for both of us, boy, because I don't think either of us will make it by the sundown.'

He was tawny now, surrounded by the grass. He could see his death, despite being stung in the back by a tiny python. Of course he would retreat now. I struck a deal with him even though I didn't trust him. He only made it so I'd 'lissen.' to advice.

'I'll take your notes in the morning, near one of the bamboo-tents, all right?'

It caught on him by now, he'll listen. He knew better, I knew better, this was what brought us close together. Face to face, I might say, next morning when we were both looked with a mightily suspicious cry.

'Get down, to the barracks, the oil fields are starting over, there's hellfire raining off the skye.'

It should be provided here and there were eighteen camps at least that were widespread and moving from spot to spot. If there was a simple map, I think this would be it. North, south, west, south, it had to be ridden twice. Each time the map got turned, the North would change, the West would change, but South remained the same. It was for that reason that it got changed twice. We were onto something now.

Each plan and every strategy led there. For some reason we had to reenact the Civil war. We were the Confederates but this was not a lost war yet. Call it a hunch, but I think the South would rise again.

Caporal, Sargent and Soliders, that's where the troops looked back to. It was only by them that we knew where to look and where to prod. We didn't outright point out where and what to do, as that would be too vulgar. It went out like this, someday. I knew there was nothing I could point towards, not now.

No, the Soliders pointed at the Sargents who parted the Caporals who went their ways. They were like the Generals in some way, never on the field, never shooting. Days were long but they slept away and they slept right. Twenty men surrounding their separate camp, making sure they would get a few other hours compared to us.

And there where the fields in the jungles, all of whom were lost to us. It was no coincidence that they would do it so. The battle looked like a painting, but one that no man managed to get it out and export it. Money had no meaning here, despite oil being the business. It was a different kind of oil after all. This type of oil only burned and burned until the last man burned with it and then we left.

We were not going to pay much respect to the other lanes and to the women. We snuck in the middle of the night, disparaged by the cowardice they showed, yellow-men running with grenades and explosive into small tents where they had their young, ugly sight, ugly sight. Some guns were turned on them. Sometimes they used meat dens to stray the bombardment. Civillians were involved right where they belonged. We did not run.

As I were saying, White, Scuffold, R. Rogers, Barthram, Tyvone, George, Apscoot, Scooter, Jonathan, Uphill, Ken, Francis, Jerome, Aland, Brock, Lemming, Fourn, Fort and Lock were there. Their real names shall not be disclosed, other than White. He was there.

They snuck in like a party of animals. They did not enjoy the surroundings. It felt as if they were attempting to enter a village of women, since the men were absent. That thicked them off, of course they weren't there. It was obvious that they weren't there, where else would they be? But animals didn't think, they didn't use their minds, instead they acted, acted bluntly and as fast as they could do, without mercy, pitty or intelligence. It was disgusting, uncondemnable by everyone in a court.

Side note, there was no court involved. Testimonies were taken post-war, so far no taking. No one got prosecuted for it, everyone got scott-free. It was only a matter of post-script editing before its times. It could be said about everything, whoever even cared about.

Morning didn't come for those women. As many differences as there were between them, it got forced back. No one wanted to forget. How could they remember? Chicken lost their heads, they bled and ran away. Even the butcher allowed them to retain their legs, it would not be allowed the other way. Cutting their legs first was inhumane.

By the end of the night, most women would've had their legs be cut off than go through it again. Serveral nights.

'I want to read the rest of your journal now. Just to be sure of it.

What did you say your name was again?'

A negro called Francis. Now he knew that this was a filthy lie. His claim was one of the highly respectable kind, mixed along the Iroquis from the Alabama nation on one side and the slavers from a nordic line. It was just what he needed one, a negro with a pedigree. It was raining in Nagasaki. There weren't a lot of people out there. Either they or we would know what the dot means. It's red, like an injun, one of the dotted ones but smarter. They are smarter than that now. They learn fast, I think they learn fast enough. No one seemed to learn it around here, no one's good with the numbers.

And they can't even read no english, they can't speak no english. I think it's lost on them. At least, I'd like to know how far can a flat-footed hook can get, you know. Before you chuck a golden dynamite stick in his face, by the time he gets it, you know who.

We call him Joseph like the saint, the one with a circle behind the head. I think he's the one who crossed the sea with Mosses, at least that's how the story goes. I hear the sermon at the back of the car, back in the valley. It's the horns that distract me from the track, but I think I heard Becky then. It was a different time before the war started. Left her before I enrolled. That's something my pa' always wanted me to know, the wisdom imparted to his son in case he goes to war.

It had something to do with leaving something unfinished, or making sure there's no one pointing it at your back. They were in any case and I already seen it happen, after we were done messing around.

'The missus won't like this you know?'

'Then why'd do you do it?'

'You know I can't help it, do you?'

Going on for too long made your python drop. I couldn't help it any longer now. It wasn't my intention to spy on them while they were out peeing on bamboo sticks and green moss. I was bear-stable, at least I passed the mental test. An aptitude for me was this, don't look out of the way, mind your business and do whatever your captain says. I failed the first two I think. I failed the last one a few days ago, and I think every since it happened, the captain has a queer eye for me, wherever I go. No one likes this happening when they go around the fences.

It's the after the deed piss they don't like you smelling. It's the blood that's on top the python's teeth that need to be cleaned after and I don't think I've ever seen it happen before. For them it's different, my pa' said. I've learned a lot about pa, I think, how to fish, how to tie a knot, how to go a whaling and look out for my own folk. I know he meant a lot to me now. I couldn't think of any better thing if I wanted to.

But he did not went on lyin' when he told me about the way they spent the day in the Congos. The old man has seen some things in his journeys. And outta what he told me, I don't think I'd ever see them in action that way. They were bathing their pythons after a while, to have a clean kill. It was something I shouldn't be looking at, but there were no men on the fields. Only their women remained, and the negroes didn't care, the women didn't either. It was why we saw them just as low as those of ours back home. It was the same day I think I realised so much about women, back in the day when they behaved when my old man said a thing, they done it. But that wasn't what I were here for.

I pitied myself against the broad side of the road, in a bamboo-cut bed, where I stood and was prepared to go about my day and eat some dirt-sandwiches while I was on the watch. Every few hundreds of meters of so we dug tyunnels in which we hid away from sight. And we had rifled hidden over there and we had them pitied over here as well. They were unloaded like the injuins would've wanted to.

Most of the scalps didn't pay much for them. In any case, we had one of them. Standing right next to me, at least twenty feet, he was called Segat Yeah Quiet Tawn after a great injuin mohawk chief. It was the first time they allowed a in injuin to serve in the army.

They did not teach you this in the training. You went around and asked the captain in turn. You went around and asked for more.

You could never ask an Indian to look for another chief. You could never hope to strike a pact with him if he heard you sink your teeth into dirt. They were always one foot ahead of you unless you knew it then. And I saw it in his eyes then. There was the spiriti of an army man lost inside a buffalo. With everything I thought of black could not even surmount to what I thought of him now.

Yell what you want now, there were smoke signals in the sky. I think there was a fire going on the pot. I seem to recall only some way it could go on his way, he never listened but that that's how injuins were then. He was way too Quiet after a while. He was there, during the drill when they started spending all their smokes on us.

We went in rows of two but never recalled being called for action. It was something of a mental tast, the physical, they say. After you got placed in a pit with the injuns you found yourself surrounded by the herds. It never passed you then, the envoy was never there for you when you needed.

And the drill instructors always says:

'If there's someone worth saving around the camp, that only makes two kinds. The ones that are worth money and the ones that are worth a lot.

Now I went through all of your files, and all of your records and I saw not a single man worth saving in this fucking lot I see kneeling down when I'm supposed to pray. And I think God has not answered a single prayer in my name, that he might give me a single man worthy enough of crossing the rivers and getting on the other side of a nade.'

He knew what he was talking about. First day of conflict and eight of us died. Mostly tullip-heads, who didn't know the difference between a broom and the top of a hard vine, though we were all going in the same direction. Twenty days in and not a single desertion, at least not until the day of hardship started.

'Here, there's only white-shirts going.'

And that's how it went. They preached to us all along the way, as much as they could yap about the colors of their shirts and the hues and everything they needed us to remember. And they told us of the red, the blue, the yellow and the green. We were told how to spot the red and we were told how to look out for the blue, until the blue turned out being too cold, way too cold, in which case look out for the red instead. And after that you turned around and you saw the colors blending in as they started mixing around. Sometimes you could not tell but the yellows wore the white as well and the whites wore the red but the white wearing red were nowhere to be seen. We only heard about them for some reason until it crossed us on a whim to ask.

‘Captain, where are the reds hiding?’

‘Wouldn’t you like to know, son? I think you had enough for today, standing all day in the sun is bad for you, back into the formation. And we always knew, we always knew when to go and when to stay. Never ask questions, always mind your business. It always went the same way. I think there were mixed feelings, right after the war.

On the plain sheet of paper where they recalled who helped, who stayed and what they did, nothing remained there. It was all a pass. All the heroes, all the post-war crimes went hand in hand forgotten. Only false-heroes took the medals and stood in front. But we all knew who the real ones were, they were the ones that would never be called into action again. We only muttered their names in songs, underneath our breathe, and we never spoke of it again after, not until the next drink. One drink, they say did end up spilling all over the table where all the important documents were. It wasn’t the official story but we all know how those things went. With the only difference being that, I can’t recall it. Neither than the Navy, the Marines are ‘out of service.’ when they need to answer. The press never digs too deep, only the first pages press in and they’re never getting past the sport section. But that’s then and now’s now. It doesn’t take much of a man to know how it works about.

‘It’s summer.’

‘There’s no summer in the East, I think. We can only wait for the sun to go down and maybe we could get something out of it. Do you think it might rain today.’

‘Only if you count for more civilians to come again, hey, White, do you mind if I take a cigar? You don’t have to spoil to the upps.’

‘Don’t worry, I snuck a few of them off myself. I blame it on them all the time.’

‘Good man, you’re God’s given man for all I care about White.’

It was these types of friendships which lasted. Plain white shirts, out there in the sun, drowned in sweat while the sun was taken down. It was this, and only this, for the one time only and the ones that fell, for all the shit I went through, this what I came for. No one wanted to tell me a thing, I could’ve done with a drink on me now, but we were not the type. Not when we were watched.

Morning-night, that’s what’s it’s called. You went through it so many times that your vision started being diffuse.

‘White, I need a lantern.’

It was a code, it wasn’t like he actually called for one. Perhaps he wanted to, perhaps he did. I knew the difference between being asked for it and there being a code but I wasn’t sure this was the code. No one told me what the code was, no one tells you those stuff anymore. The black part of the regiment is supposed to follow the whites and the whites are supposed to do what’s best for them in any case, that’s what war's about. Sometimes it goes out of their way, other times, they're red. No one wanted to end up that way.

Clear in this house. Clear in this house, clear there as well.

'Make sure they're not hiding underneath the floor.'

Sometimes I thought the captain was retarded. He was a fat child in a uniform who acted accordingly. He was diddling with the buttons on his jacket in the same way everyone suspected him of doing it with.

There were a lot of Vietnamese children missing those days. Some things went out unreported, even to the official records. It was a time where everyone turned a blind eye to the war and there were other things preventing the word from spreading in any case. The blacks knew better or else they'd be seen hanging in the forest, thrown across the bridge in the river, like in the good Christian days. The one injun kept his mouth shut because he didn't have about anyone around his back. And there was also the regiment, which was thinning white.

It was a hard day then, one that I never came off thinking. Our regiment growing thin of whites, and most of them weren't even in the graves or lost in the fields.

I saw man from Arkansas being sent off packing. He didn't even get shot. I think he only got a small plow being driven in his foot by one of the yellow ladies who refused his advances. She was later shot behind her back while she was sleeping. Did we report any of it? Of course not, it was either them or us, after the date. And I could see no better exchange for service and protection other than that. I see the fields being ploughed, and there's nothing after that.

I think to myself, how come there's no one asking why there's someone running in the mid-noon. I think about things that way. When I'm not busy digging into bamboo trees or trying to piss, and they teach you that. They say don't piss inside outside, don't piss in open lines of fire. You know what happens, and you can't blame them if they shoot it off. And they know what happens when you got nothing to fight for after that's done for.

So many people went out that way. Eunuchs don't belong amongst our ranks in either or any case. At that point, they join the women, they dressed in their simple robes, they paint themselves in yellow and work on the fields with them. Do they learn the language? Of course they don't. If they're daft enough to get them shot off, why wouldn't this happen? It was how they treated foreigners during dinner. It was something they could not count on.

Did I mention what the other thing was? We pissed in jars, and those jars ended up being used as well. They stored them, but they have never been allowed to get cold, they would always be warm because you need them to be room-temperature in order to get home the right way. It was the only way they knew you were alive after a while. Send a letter? They'd spot a fake a long mile a way and no calls were allowed in the army. Where the fuck would you find a landline in this trashhole?

Try to faint and cut a flock of hair? There were at least a few thousand men who were bald by choice or not at this point. So they settled with piss-jars in the end. But it could not be any kind of piss you stored inside. You couldn't wait days for it to become stale, which left you with the only alternative of allowing it to be fresh or get off the face of the earth, you were dead for them. Both the military and your family.

Let me tell you something though, no one cried over piss-jars. In the entire history of the United States, there was not a single funeral in which the folk mourned around a single jar of piss. It never happened. Perhaps in the good old days of the South when there was enough freedom for you to do whatever you wanted, but not today.

It was what I needed, wasn't it? More of it coming down on our way. There was another thing which never crossed my mind, it was Jonathan. No, it was Francis.

The Negro named Francis. I wanted to talk to him about something. I knew he was one of the guys who went out that night.

'Lemming, I want to talk to you about something.'

'What is it?'

Lemming was nice enough to stay with me for the time being. We were going off-shot, we weren't listened or anything, he got me through some hard times. I could trust him, it's all I'm saying. As opposed to me, he hadn't anything against them. I knew better, but it was it.

We were there, they were there, it couldn't be changed. No one was listening because everyone was busy eavesdropping on the ground for the fire to come down again. We were in the back of the camp, trying to get some more dirt to eat. The medic wasn't there. I knew him well enough, he wouldn't have approved of any of our actions.

'I'd like to know something, if you don't mind it. Why is it that I can't get it up no longer? You know when I think about them or about that night.'

'Fucking hell, what you asking me for?'

'I need to hear it coming out of someone who's sane in the head. I think the days spent trying to piss my way through the night ain't working for me no longer, I think it's the russians. Their field of electrons, their soviet technology, right? I think they're working on something here. I think they're trying to turn us all into them.

That's why it ain't working right no longer. I think they're causing it. Perhaps I should look down from time to time, but It ain't no wonder. There's no white woman around the camp, that's the world.'

'Get a hold of yourself then, I think this is probably an issue with what we've done. I sees and hears the same problem from others around the camp.

It doesn't sit well with anyone, you know? What we did that night. I think we ought to tell someone about it or go away.'

'I can't. You know I can't. Captain had an eye on me all the time, he knows I'm trouble. One more and I'm out and there won't be any slow-going or miss-line of fire. I'll be marked as a deserter or learn Vietnamese.

It's what it is with some folk. Even if I'm one of their own, it only makes it worse, you know?'

It shouldn't be that way, but that's what it was. And there were other reasons to get rid of men that way. If you were a captain, if you did something that way, you could use it as a smoke-screen to make it so no one knows what's been happening behind the closed blinds. We were not to asked.

'Remember it. Don't ask no questions, minds your own bussiness.'

Lemmings joined me and we both started repeating that, almost like the gossipel; there was no singing there. Of course there wouldn't be. We were no men of action in any case, just hicks.

And there were a lot of hicks in Vietnam.

Take Shen Kock Shlong. He was a man who lived in a small crib inside a small hill he had to dig himself through in order to make it out alive. We suspected him of something, since we always passed the hill during the watch but so far no one approached. It was way too dangerous, going there in person, that's why wer never did something as reckless and that. But I swear, I knew it, he had a gun. And he hid inside a small hole he made under a giant leaf he found.

A fairytale of sort, but it was no Arabic nights, instead they were trying to cover for one another, every single damn time they were asked.

Cho Cho: 'Know no him. Know no him.'

Aph Ching: 'No know him, no know him. '

Ling Ming, Ching Yian, Papua Yin, Ree-san, same message until we got it and we got it quick enough, this was a slave labour. We were not allowed to say a thing of what we saw out there. Rice fields, they were supposed to be rice fields, but for some reasons they grew as tall as wheat. Now, I am no dumb person, call me what you like but something wasn't working well. Either in my head or on the lane. My point was, they were doing something from day one.

Daily schedule, again and again. Wake up early, look out of my way. No feud so far with Francis.

Francis went out of his way.

White took the other lane.

And they never met once after. Dumb negro that he was, he forgot to ask his journal back. And I never understood that either. It was the start of the war, we have only been deployed for this long and it was already filled. How did he manage to fill an entire journal this fast? What was he after?

He was hiding something and I knew it. He knew that I knew it and we were both acting as if he couldn't even point it out. But I knew better than that. We were not there for a play.

The schedule conveyed this much, as much as our daily wage. Wake up, showers after, not to mention that I had to wait in line if I were late. We never showered when we arrived at the same time. Always awkward, I avoided him the best I could. Sometimes it would get even more awkward since I shook the line in order to get out of the way. No one said a thing, since they knew it had to go through in either or. We would either take it or be weary of each other, as soon as we could call it first.

Dinner, dirt, we skipped breakfast for watch duty. Even days meant watching the dirt, otherwise, it was constancy walking. And so far, I have never in my life seen an enemy soldier. Not up-front, not close, barely from the distance but they couldn't look any different than what we were learned with.

I think their entry was barred from one side, but I looked from one side to the other and there was nothing goin' on.

Can't recall it properly, but I think they were using carabines, I think. No, maybe lugers, no, that's german. I think they were using something sharp, forks, pitchforks, no that's the monster. They were using bayonettes, or something cheap and made out of plastic and they all worked together. And they spoke of something, or of someone but no one with half a mind knew who he was, and it was a good reason for that because we couldn't know either what they went on about.

An old vietnamese lady always greeted us. She died the fifth day after we met her, because of us. We walked in too close, we were seen, or they spoke of it. But I came back to visit her one night. It during nighttime that bad things happened and I think they thought we'd do something to her as well. Nasty gooks thought we were the animals and look at what they did to her.

She was spread on the ground, widely, naked and they ruined her down there. As if we even considered doing something to her after, it could not be forgotten. We were remembered for better things those days.

'Fort knows what's happened here.'

'Fuck him, I think he's going to take that way out.'

'Don't you think he'll do something first?'

We all considered it. A mercy kill? No, this would be more like an execution, but this time no one would survive.

At the same time, we weren't sociopaths. I can't speak for the others, but I will do it anyway. We feel, the same way other people do. It's hard to believe when it's written down on paper, when you hear of it even on a first time account. But we do. It's this place at fault, it changes you. I've seen things happening way before we gathered around, but it's pointless saying. Can't compare apples to ripped off cunts. It's bloody, it's a mess, it happens. No one should do this to their own. I looked at her wrist, she struggled like a dog.

They eat dogs. They eat their own, that much I learned so far, never mess with them if you don't want them to do the same.

Next few days, we gathered. There was something of a funeral during the night. A single firefly was there, but I think Lemming had enough of it and the madman shot it. He startled everyone. We were out in that dangerous part of the forest, where they could flank us at any time and the madman shot the firefly as if it were a night in wild December, a cold brew on his lap, shooting beercans on his poarch. That's what life was about. I think I love this man.

It was reminded why they held no euology. We held it silently. No one wanted to say a word, it couldn't be done, since we were mainly just trying to mind our own business, praying to a word to be taken in. I feel like an idiot now, never knowing what to say.

But the thing is this. All of us were present there, even him. But no one wanted to talk about him. He's been a key part in it. We never even mentioned him any longer. As a matter of fact, I always wondered. Why was he here? Why is he here now? He's no answering to the law, he's never going to court. The same thing got repeated again. Mind it, just mind it for now, or else you know what happens to deserters, in this case, you said something, you became the deserter.

It was sad. This was no Chritian burial. I can see why they ended up being in need of liberation. Most of them were so flat-looking, no one cried. Not even us. He had a beer on him, bastard.

That was as much as I think I could remember. Other than that, the daily schedule was pretty much the same most of the days. With one thing being regular, that being a disater a day having happened. It wasn't necessarily as disastruous. I wanted to think it wasn't.

Fields of fire, I can't say much about the vegetation.

It's here where Rogers enters in.

'Cadet Rogers, hailing in!'

Rogers is a millitant, he's an old-school trained patriot. No one expected him to land in this regiment, not with the lot of us. It was hard, trying to work this way.

Coffee, a lots of it, biscuits and egg-yolk. We were fed this for too many consecutive days, it was meant to make you go search for something.

'Fort, come with me.'

Fort didn't object. Around one of the small houses, the traditional ones, we called them pygmy-tents. It was because the owners were so small. Their feets and hands were that of children. Compared to theirs, the door-knobs made them feel like giants. It was the anniversary day, they had a lot of bread. Bread was hard to obtain more days.

It wasn't sweet thinking about it, but that was not wheat, it was something else, it was, sugar, they had sugar canes, or something in the veins of rice. Who knew what them gooks were cooking under the brow. They were hiding something underneath the fields. It was far too distracting for anyone to look over or even pay heed to what was going on.

How come their faces always look so young and happy? They never age, they always seem to share the same expression in the barn. But there wasn't any barn. Just because there wasn't any barn, that didn't mean they couldn't pretend there wasn't. And it was subtle, the way they made it feel like home.

Fort and Rogers took what they could while the owners were in the house. In the middle of the room, they waited, expressionless, well-behaved. It was only at the start so of course they couldn't say or do anything. Just in case, that's the procedure.

Tit for that, Fort did it first. He started bumping a foot off the ground in the splendor of doing it. He kicked it a few times, only to be sure of it. Of course he hadn't a handle on it. But no one hid underneath the floor. Fucking gooks and procupines on both sides, but other than that, as they knew, they behaved. No sound or shake out of their eyes and they couldn't complain either. That was another thing, Rogers was easily annoyed, he was way too paranoid as well. He knew better than to sniff when he didn't meant to look into.

He knew better not to pick up a fight with someone who'd run and tell. They could not be trusted, under no condition instilled by the regiment.

I hate it, perhaps I should take out a knife.

When he stopped rummaging through the house, he left Fort do the rest while he approached them from the front. It was just like in the jungle with the only difference being that it was much cleaner in here. They hadn't captured anyone out there, but he imagined it would be just about the same.

'I should cut a slit off your gook-eyes, I think. You wouldn't happen to see what's going on around you, would you?

Hey Fort, doesn't this look like our house now?'

'Course it does, who's buying?'

They looked like rich-folk before the war.

It never goes down that way. Both sides were portrayed as they should. With everything included, he recalled it. Rogers had fourty kills under his belt by now. He'd seen one of them running with what looked like an explosive diamond in his hand. That shocked him. Near-deafness the doctor said, if the man hadn't taken a misstep there, the nade would've landed on near him. He would be dead now, this wouldn't have happened.

But there would be no attrition here.

'I found it, here, have the first bite boss, you're the one who found it.'

'God bless.'

He thought about muttering a prayer, but that would be lost on them. They were not dignified by any means. If roles were resolved, he had no doubt that they would be eaten like dogs. Mistreated even as they done it and they done it good.

'Fort, go outside, keep watch, you don't want to see it happen.'

Same rule, twenty minutes passed. He had been used by now, hearing them shouts. It was something everyone got used to after a while. It was the only thing they had to do in slow days. Everyone understood. If this didn't go on happening, they could be set off around the camp and no one wanted that.

Imagine this, first thing in the morning, it's one of those rare days where no one skipped breakfast. It was rare seeing bacon and eggs. Even rarer, actually smelling them. If there was one man who claimed he tasted them behind our backs, we'd shoot him. The same way, I've got no doubt that they'd shoot us if we tried it, tried to taking out on the camp. It's hard to explain. No one really understands what a man has to do sometimes. They have to get rid of it somehow, out of the system. They know it, we know it, everyone knows it. It's what helps us win the war, it's what keeps us going.

There's nothing they can do about it psychologically, they can't bottle the rage or what's going through us sometimes. Everyone keeping an eye open at night as much on the others as they keep on the enemy on the line. It's not safe but it's normal.

And sometimes, we all get assigned to some families and we do what we have to do in order to get things out of the system and then we end up with this. It can't be helped. It's just how it is.

Well, it just so happens that this day, on their anniversary, both of them lived. It went slow. He got what he wanted.

They didn't look like us before and let's say they did not look like us after. But they stood in their spots, like good pups.

Twenty days in, it didn't look find, this was before anything happened in the south front, was it? Some maps was this, South one and South two. And there were other things they should keep to themselves because no one wanted to take shots.

Night five, night any five, they didn't keep count of them. It was the distillery, what it was called, they smoked blunt bamboo-sticks they stole from around the place. But you'll think this a lie.

For once the captain had a heart and allowed everyone to play cards for once in a while, it never went that way. It never went that way. You won't understand it yet, but it should be clarified, it never went that way. The captain never took any exception whatsoever, even when one of our own almost lost his life because of some untreated gangrene. It was hard to quantify pain. We never felt the same after.

But we played for the night. The negroes kept to themselves that way. They worshipped the same God of ours, but they were excluded for some reason from our group. It wasn't even my intention to do it. I didn't. Wait, I think I'm wrong, there was an Arab between them. But who was the one who pointed it out? Fort, Rogers, Scuffold? No, I always get that wrong, every single time and no one points out what happens.

'As I was saying, I think I have a pair.'

'Twenty cigars, isn't it?'

'We're not playing by prison rules. How does a prisoner like you even ends up landing a spot in the regiment?'

'He doesn't, because I think he's full of shit.'

'No, I'm not. You don't get tatoos like that without going through some hard times like I have.'

No one believed Brock. Though he looked somewhat tawny, actually he did resemble the injun, if I think about it. He could've been a lost-line, other cousin. I think, I don't know now, it's all hazy. No one explains the game anyway. We're gambling away what we have on us and what we got from around the place. Watches, sticks, cigars, you call it. But then it's put down. And I don't know if this was the result of him just drinking booze, somehow the bastard got all the good stuff, but he actually put down a gook-ear, an authentic one. As if we were supposed to buy it that he somehow managed to get through the front lines and chop it off himself. Of course weren't gonna but it.

But it was marked, that was the thing. They marked their own, it was how you were supposed to check their civilians. We checked all of them. Not a single soul, if they even had those in their culture, had the marks around the ears. I think we were getting way too much into the game. We were oogling this, we were fantasizing about it. To be the ones who brought a good ear back home and hang it around the wall, that was. It was something worth more than our war-wage after being civil.

And I couldn't miss it just because of a golden tooth. I put it down, everyone raised. Soon after we were joined by the injun, I think he was Quiet but I didn't ask. Something about their culture made me feel like I was intruding if I were to ask.

The wimp, Joseph only joined us after seeing the tooth. He didn't have much either but we let him in. Some of the stable-minded men were considering letting some of them negroes join the table. But White protested, he was the first one to turn them down, always.

I'm the one who dealt the cards then. I'm the same person who was being watched for some reason, just so we were sure no one would be fucked over. Of course, I'm the same one who considered just pulling one off. But it didn't matter. We were all calm, nothing was going to happen. I considered it for a second, cheating, switching hands, but this place was worse than. Out of hand. I think that's what it's called.

We were not allowed to finish yet, we were called to action in the middle of the night. Another tour de France, we had to step in line this time. Everyone got alarmed and in the midst of it, I didn't see who took my tooth and who took the ear. Before I could say it, the Captain was there. We were forced into silence. I knew nothing of it and spoke just as much.

Twenty more hours awake. Something had to happen until it came to me to take a few shots instead. We needed a break but it doesn't stop. Things get misspelled and misspronounced way too often.

If there's something I like thinking about, it's my high-school sweetheart. I don't talk about her around the men.

It's because I got the impression that most of them would go out the minute on break and start jerking off thinking about her. And I only say that because I know I'm doing the same thing as well. I'm yelled at often but no one tells me why.

They often tease me, telling me I look like Francis, but I know it's not the truth. At least that's now what I have in mind. I shake all over just thinking of it, not of this but of her.

Everyone's much older than I am, perhaps that's where all the teasing's coming from. But I do think there's a point there, I only have a hard time looking for it. Uphill looked around, clear. Make sure it's going all over a few more times, right until that clear sounds like a beep, it's what the drill instructor tells us. Every time until it becomes a habit, unless it's become natural, then you're clearly doing something wrong and when that happens, you don't get home. Or your piss-jar doesn't, I feel like he's made half of that shit up myself. Come to think of it, I'd do it the same.

But she was there, now, she was here with me. I was in no jungle, freezing my balls off, walking around in search of someone in hiding. She liked it as well, being chased. I can't remember her name any longer, but at least I got to have my way with her. It was what kept me going now. With everything the men had been telling me so far, I think I would've done it without knowing. Even better, I could've done without doing it now. I wouldn't have enrolled, it was the rite of passage, it's what got me here. So many mistakes made.

I can't go for long.

'Hi, I'm Uphill, it's nice to meet you.'

She was beautiful, that much I remembered. I thought of something clever, I think it was clever.

'I have a cock named Bismark.'

It was the first slap I ever gotten. And it was the first time I was rubbed over by the soft hands of another girl. She had big hands, swollen and pale. I don't think many boys looked at her now. I didn't mind it. Maybe I didn't mind what it felt like when we were alone. We started from there, the two of us. And I was almost done with it, you know? Before I even had to come back to my post, we were half-way through it. Unfortunately, I was a high-school dropout by the time she decided she was missing cross-state. And her parents didn't approve of it either. Something about me being, not well.

That's why I joined this place as well. They saw it on my face as well. Briefly after we first met, no one wanted to say it. A sad expression, or some kind of depression went along the way. I couldn't deal with it for long but so far I knew this. A few whiffs and I was back there. Bury it beneath the ground. Don't think about it unless you want to end up in the same way.

Uphill was the first to go out there and meet a Gook. It was during one of the nights he was left watch. All by himself, and no one seemed to be bothered by it. I don't think it was right. No one enjoyed thinking it, but it was the word of the captain against ours.

We like to joke and look down on others. But it's never right when it's one of our own. 'Specially when it's something as dumb as leaving a kid go out there all by himself. He wasn't that smart, truth be told, or he wanted to be play a hero in a man's field. We heard a shot in the night but we never went out to check it.

Drill came first. Stationed outside our tents, everyone would get behind the small anthill trenches and we would all wait for some' to happen. Nothing happened by the morning light and we were so tired that if the entire Cambodian country decided to invade us, we would've paved their way with our tongues. There, at the spot, we only found a hand. I dread to think what happened to the kid then, as much as I'd like to know it.

Yeah, yeah, I think we all got their message, wooden spoons. I think we understood.

I don't know how I made it so far.

‘Dishwasher, in the Congos, in the jungle.

Dishwasher, in the Congos, in the jungle.

Dishwasher, oh, sweet sweet dishwasher, in the Congos.’

In the jungle.

They weren’t paying much attention then. It was what they did, that what they think. In the media and in the papers, on the small notes and in their minds, it’s all games and all play and only murders and rapes. And no one looks and everyone minds their own bussiness and that’s what happens. Government’s corrupt but they like waching and the kid, the kid. Uphill, he’s a victim, he’s the victim of it, but they kept sending his piss jar even after he died. The captain made sure of it now, that everyone drank a lot of river water, but it had to be dirty to avoid it being poisoned and then they hadve them piss for him as well. Boy’s alive then, nothing happened. As long as no one knew it, ntohing happened. The public could go on along with it, they would buy anything you threw at them.

Even an expose would mean nothing, that would be covered in a few years at best. Clouded or not, cover it with a few gallons and everyone will forget. No one would be moved if anyone survived the end of the war in any case. They were meant to be dead men walking after all.

And then there was the worst of them all. This is why they killed the old lady, this is what even the small-eyes observed, if not even the whites trusted him, what could you say about the man?

Scuffold, he was sick. It was one of the worst case scenarios out there. A man got dispatched on the fields instead of being sent to hell. It was one blunt way of putting it. Soup didn’t taste well where he walked.

But it’s over.

It’s all fucking over in a pile of fucking trash. It’s all fucking trashing, the fields, this place, the camps, the maps, everything.

They had to admit it, how everything was so puerile. In comparison with what they did, bitter-sweet. No one counted the bodies in the fields.

What struck a man the most was the files. Things they didn’t say in the government stuff. It was a scholar’s work, or someone who suffered of insomnia. Fucking hell, fucking shit, they were shit fucking mouthed like pigs. And pigs didn’t do well against dogs. And chinks ate dogs. So on and so forth, we received what was left of the boy.

It was the first time we done a proper Christian burial, no more plain talk of the men. Not even the captain said a thing about it anymore. They got there, as if they would round themselves around a funeral pyre, with no trenches and everyone mourned the boy. Uphill was their son, the kid they looked after, that until the captain came in. It didn’t matter. We had a heart. At least, everyone seemed to think about it that way. Of course it all felt like a bunch of horse-shit.

That was exhausting, getting through the night, thinning out, looking out of the road, trying to forget and this. Eye for eye, tooth for tooth and everyone did what everyone did. And we all understood the reasons behind it, but we didn't talk. We couldn't do it any longer. It was lies, and no fucking pencil pusher knew what was going on here. It was another mark hit, the condolences and that.

A next chapter, missing it around, this was an exception.

White was the first to go, he was out there alone. Bad luck followed him along the way, why wouldn't it? He had a piss-poor eye sight and seemed to be bent by the back.

Let's assume there was a court.

Post-war, POW, it's not the kind of person you'd expect on the other side. Assuming that most of the accounts are right he was there. That would have to do. The day after, the closure, no one spoke about it. You'd expect some outlash but everything got silence. And there was no White there to say a thing. And there were none of the other eighteen. He was out of the way, there was a contradiction, but no account spoke of it.

Back then, into the court.

One of them got there, but it was only one of the ones that survived and made it through. It would not be believed otherwise and the shock only continued after the first account.

The prosecutor got called in the booth for once. It was a funny thing, not like in laughter, but in an ironic kind of way. I could see him like the type of man who'd be out there in the jungle with everyone else. And a lot of changed since then. We weren't ready to take the leap and pout. The rat though, he spilled enough. Joseph Wittgenstein, it strung that pick in your throat you couldn't reach with your lip. Scott Uphill wasn't present in the court, supposedly, he was still alive somewhere. Official court documents. And there was Alan Remington Scuffold. He, was there, and he looked for a long time, he listened. None of us were there. It did not go well.

I hear the trial was big. I heard they didn't get into detail. It was fun while it lasted. None of the trial will be mentioned here.

I'd like to think it was fun being there with them. We were doing things we shouldn't that night. It was another kind of trial no one wanted to talk about. If one time done it the second time they'd know it. It shouldn't have been so.

During that night we formed a circle around them. They called it a, I don't know the word for it. The thing was a bond of solidarity or something, despite having their clothes being ripped apart, they covered one another like an ant hill. Only their hands went through them as they held hands together. It was like that I wouldn't know the feeling again. It was still the shock I didn't like talking about. Should've known it when it happened, this wasn't what I remember.

We were around them, doing it. That was supposed to be a man thing, like an initiation ritual. We slid apart but we were still close enough. It was only how the night started.

'Guard duty.'

‘Again? Can’t someone take my place this time around? I don’t actually feel like getting through it this time. I want to be left alone.’

No one caught a break, not even I. But I was tired now, too tired for anything, too busy to register what went through my head. I was being careless before and when it happened, I only came to do it this time around as well. They were falling by the heads, I never saw them. I think I never saw them close enough. I don’t know what happened to the others, what their business was and I did not mention that night to anyone.

The injun was staring, he was a mohawk in action. I didn’t know what I was doing any longer. It’s been so long, my eyes were red, but everyone was like that. Nothing much was happening unless you counted them in the planes. When they dropped, I finally took the reins and grabbed it over. I didn’t think it was supposed to be that way.

Nothing was coming over me. It went all over my head that day. It’s fucking falling apart from this point on. No court hearings, no account from the survivors other than you know who and we didn’t even get to them yet.

Swamp-negroes, funny way of saying it, the more the whites thinned, either back home or there, the more of them would come in the regiment. And then came the trouble for White. He wasn’t liked, much. He had a way of making himself unpleasant when he came in the company. It got boring way too fast and they couldn’t complain about it either. For whichever reason they expected it to be that way, they never warned you, before you joined the draft, how mundane it could become. It wasn’t a feeling of numbness, but, it felt regular.

Putting on pants felt the same. It was no sociopathic thing any longer, there was no burst of anger and there was only one incident inside the camp. You should’ve heard the stories said about the fire. Funny how people change.

It wasn’t even White either, who appeared to change his tune. He was happy for once, when it happened.

‘I could not do it, Francis, please, eat my share. After your, Francis, do whatever you please now, I would not dare keep you in line.’

He said.

May I do something for you Francis? Francis this, Francis that, Francis, whichever else. And he never said a thing to the others. Thing is, they suspected it, they did not act on it because that’s not how you acted there, but, somehow I think even he was afraid of spilling it. Francis was there and he was just about the same, as everyone else. With the other older negroes it went easier. Francis knew how to keep them in line, from an arab of faith, he took the role of a spiritual chieftain, or something.

And then there was their turn. It turned into a hierarchy afterwards. They were more violent when they were together with their own kind. There wasn’t that decency you’re used to seeing when a man like White isn’t up his own ass. No, you’d be wrong to think that way, if war turned the white man into an animal, it was safe to say that it made beasts out of them. Whereas some houses were left standing when Rogers took Fort, they were tearing them down while taking a woman in front of her husband, pinning him down.

It was nothing to be ashamed off, staring at it when it happened. Scooter was one of the men that had to accompany them.

Sometimes I think not even the captain trusted to leave them alone. It's how it is. You can't say nothing if you haven't seen anything happening. At this point the entire region is split in half. One side is theirs, one side is our. Roads are blocked, the farmers no longer share the route with us, they see us on the field, they run. For the longest run, I think they knew what was happening there.

And it wasn't easy. It was called the White attrition, but I think that in the end, by the time the conflict came to an end White was the last one to leave. But he was the first one the leave as well. No one like that anyway, not them, not us, no one.

And the sleep deprivation was the hardest thing to deal with. Turning in middle of the night with your eyes open on one side, then the other. Staring at the top of the tent, expecting so see someone familiar yelling at you in the morning, yet everyone expected you to keep going. The further you went into the jungle, the harder it got to keep an eye shut. It gets worse than this point on. We don't take turns in waking up any longer, instead we roll around the tent and wake the others.

Middle of the night comes, I think we look around and see one of them walking. He's a farmer that found himself coming in too close to the camp. Everyone gets us immediately and surrounds him. We're tired but we can't sit down, we're armed, and every single barrel is pointed at his face. The man can't make the difference between a bamboo stick and a high-caliber, not with those slits on his face. I try comforting myself thinking we won't kill him in the middle of the night.

You get reported for misshandling them like that. A government to the other, but things are slow. Do they know his name? Is he armed? We checked everyone, we do it again. He's not armed, but he's here. They never come here, why is he here? At this point we all ask this. If this was a closed area, by now the man would've been twenty feet in a hole. I still don't know if he escaped with his life.

He says nothing, he gets nothing so far. Of course no one wants to take the first shot and wake the captain, but we're all thinking how to make it clean, how to take it out without making much noise.

I think Apscoot is the first one to suggest it.

'Take him in the back and shot him at the back of his head.'

'No gona.'

He mutters something, we ignore it. Unless he speaks clearly, he's out. And usually they're all out of it at this point. Took a moment there, checked his ear, even in the dark you could see that there's nothing on his ear. Our camp isn't in the open, but I doubt we were approached by one of them. Somehow I think they're even more cowardly than we thing they are. For starters, so far, none onf them took us in the night. No grenade, no shooting and this was the closest we got to it.

Tomorrow the camp is relocated, no question asked and the captain can eat it if he wants to. Twenty more minutes pass, it's not like any of us want to go to sleep anyway. We wait on him to say something else in his defense. He's calmer than us but the gook got a night's sleep. The good got a week's sleep, I could see it. We all could see it. At this point we could simply kill him out of principle and batter him to death.

Geroge takes the first action, after he becomes reluctant to wait. He's forcing the man on the ground at this point and begin. Since we're all too tired to think and since he could be a scout from the other side, we join him as we start stomping him. In twenty minutes we're done, the man is dead. All the while, as this is happening, he makes no sound, he doesn't scream and he doesn't try getting any secret message out to alert everyone else. Unless the silence was his message, in which case, I think we all failed here miserably.

Two of the blacks are now dragging the body away. Again, twenty minutes pass. We asked them to dispose of the body anywhere, wherever tha may be and I don't think they knew how to dig a hole by now. Unfortunately, it's that part in it where they don't even bother to train them anymore. So they dump him in the river, but I'm sure his wife Cho Cho would notice much.

It raises the question. Since we're all back in the tent, like a dumb-lout who isn't even questioning whether or not they could tramp us in every moment, we sit down, trying to get an hour. The caffeine in our veins and the rush of adrenaline prvents us from falling asleep, I shouldn't have asked. But why was there a man there? Most of them, with some exception or two were a rare occurance. We never bothered to ask or to point at what was going on now.

We drank in the morning and only looked at the river, nice job, blacks. You could see the body stuck in one of the distant fucking ponds. But it was far enough from us not to notice.

And then there was the other problem, back to the watch. It was the duty that got you. Advancing through the front was one thing. We all went together, farther and farther away, secured the area then back to our posts. A lot of days were simpler than that, mostly. But then you relocated and you didn't know where you were and what to do. And it was a good thing and it was a bad thing.

Because they thought we all looked the same and we thought they looked the same which meant no more rapists, no more murderers, every sin was washed. Until we started again soon after, but by then there was no guilt to look back at. There was something I never thought about seeing, I mean I never thought I'd see it. It never crossed my mind. But I actually saw a cheeze-grilled burger, standing out there near a cold one. I thought I must be dreaming or something, because it wasn't in the new camp, it was in one of the, in the country. We were close to the country side. Plenty more houses spread around the acres.

Their community was more tightly knit that anything we have seen before, and you couldn't actually get away with doing as much as you did in the good old days. Plenty of other things happened, much worse than what we did before, or whom we lost, but we don't speak about those things, not around him. Because he can't be trusted either, but for once, I think God smiled on my face. He looked at me and smiled, as simple as that, because, you wouldn't believe it but it was there.

And I got the beer and I got the burger and it didn't happen. Instead I got the guard duty, again.

It's what he got, by now everyone had lost respect over White. First he started chasing them around, then he began running around the camp like a headless chicken ever since they started replacing us. Fourn and Lock went back home, not a thing said so far. Special circumstances, they said but it never got explained why.

There was also the incident that happened there, we didn't talk about it much. We still don't think of it, because of good reasons. I'd like to think there's some place somewhere, out there for people like him.

It's two am, I think, I don't know. I'm not a reliable watch, I mean I don't have one. And it's twenty minutes fast. Also you're not allowed to keep a straight watch, you need to remember how many seconds or minutes it's fast so when you get captured, they can't know. It's a clever thing, or an idiotic thing because I don't know how that should prevent you from being tortured. Maybe it's supposed to confuse them about the meeting points or something, I don't know how they could get information about that and somehow manage to miss the hour. And wouldn't they have a clock or a watch of their own? Did it work differently in the east or something?

Again, I don't know and I could not answer that, we captured a few of them but they didn't say anything. And that's where the fun stuff starts. We called it that as a way to deal with the abuse we inflicted on the poor men. God forbid what they'd do to us if the situation was reversed. I seem to recall this being the most dangerous period of the war. While back there in told camp things went slowly and we were mostly a sentry unit, a few other regiments got dispatched in the west and south-south, all three points being a constant.

Ever since we came here as well, I knew there was something wrong. White was more distant than usual, he's almost taken a vow of silence. Rogers joins him. They spend a lot of time together, smoking bamboo-sticks and hitting on the locals. This sight for starters is different than before, I'd go as far to call it beautiful, but the captain would most likely nurture me and no eunuch ever made it through the army.

And they had nice stuff like porcelain and tea cups and pink trees that popped from here and there and just about the place. Even the negroes were somewhat happy and well behaved.

But Rogers and White spent too much time together and the place also started looking more like a ghetto. We all knew that this meant trouble.

One time and only one time we hear it happen. That doesn't mean it only happens once, only that they speak of it quickly enough for everyone to hear then they all turn silent. Afterwards, you end up with empty houses at night and floors with fakeouts beneath them. That's when we start suspecting that we're being fucked with. It's clear enough that they know what we're after and it doesn't go easy on them.

First the funny-lady gets drunk, Rogers and White spend the night with her. It gets blurry afterwards and we don't make a lot of noise, we got around her and she doesn't object. We drink from one of her small cups, and it's for the first time that we get drunk. We go down on her, she doesn't object. At this point we hear something happen through the night.

We go out, we're called in. The door opens like one side of a plastic container. They're dropping bombs in the middle of the night, we leave. That's what happens. By this time, her makeup ran across her face. The cold gets inside the room but she's alive. She's unharmed and no one did anything to get. Christ, it's as if they think we spoiled her or something, because by the time we come back from another tour, we find out that she's been raped and killed. Now I know this happens during war or without war. But I swear, it was neither me nor White.

Both of us are met by the Captain. Apparently, this is the first time he conveniently finds out about it. As usual, we get lectured about it. We don't get a word in, we're treated like trash, we don't speak a thing, we don't make eye-contact, we keep it simple.

'Yes, we were inside her house last night.'

How far did you go in?

'Christ, captain, do you get your rocks off this stuff?'

He asks again.

'Only a few fingers captain.'

From both?

We both nodded.

And that was it, we weren't given any warning, we didn't say a thing and as usual. It was the thing which kept us in line. As long as something did not exceed it, I think everything would go on to be fine. I hope it would in any case. Well, that's what they wanted from us.

I think we kind of got separated at one point.

It was the scenery, you don't see a lot of green back home. Not where I live. And there was another fuckup back then, John Sink, which we all suspect he did it. He was one of the few men missing from the front when we were called in. I'd like to think I caught him on the act and broke his nose but that didn't happen, that's only wishful thinking. I wish I did it, I'd have a story to share over a drink.

There was also the dirt I think, which was more important than what happened to her. I think we all agreed that dirt in this region was much better. Of course it was mainly because they had better cooking ingredients but we never allowed them to cook for us. Never trust the yellow men they say, it's written in the Constitution and the Constituion gave us guns so it can't be all bad.

It wasn't always this easy. Things don't go as planned.

And then the problem came with the pond. Since it was the main attraction of the city, we were somehow considerate about it towards the middle part of our stay. Going round in and out can be tiring at times after a while, and the jungle can be unforgiving to the men that do not know its ways. I'd like to think that by now we got completely accustomed to it, even though we still make mistakes. We're human after all.

And they kept yelling about something coming up, again and again, Saigon, Saigon, careful at the Saigon, the Hick tunnel, it's where it was. They say they could transport hundreds of Vietnamese people through those tunnels in the midst of a single working day. It's actually quite a bother, since no one like talking about it any longer. But they used to breed in there, not in that way I tell you, not like in the good old days where we fooled around. With all in mind their numbers started growing and growing until tens, hundreds, thousands of them appeared on the front.

But there was no way to domesticate them no longer, we tried our best but failed. We were losing people but at the same time, they were dying by the breeds and heads. It shouldn't matter any longer since we progressed a little and finally everything stabilised. You shouldn't be bothered much by it, once you got a night's sleep in a while, no nocturnal waking and no sleep walking or anyone messing around the camp. This time around we had people who stayed awake for us and others who woke up and took their place and it was well.

But the pond, that pond inside the well they made. We knew we shouldn't have approached it. The captain told us not to mess with it. Say and do what we want with the people, that's our business, but don't fuck with their well. It's their symbol. Crush the symbol and the people might either be stripped down and beaten or they might turn on you. Either way, they were civilians, they were mostly the families that didn't evacuate the area and we knew better than to do our thing.

If I remember correctly, I even brought George, Scooter, Brock and Lemming around and asked the negroes, and I remember specifying this to them.

'Don't piss in the well, don't go around their ponds, don't mess with their water.'

This isn't one of your ghettos. I want you to point at the sky, then back down to your captain and see him as your saviour now. Do you understand it?'

'We get it, don't piss in the pond. Don't do it, I think we get it.'

Then it was settled so much. And what do they end up doing?

Well it's not hard to guess and brush around the issue or to think it that way. They just did whatever they wanted, they did as they pleased and they got no sanction for it. Did it damage everyone in the camp now?

Of course it has, but that's neither here nor there. They were cannon-fodder after all, so we couldn't actually send them off. For every white soldier that died, at least eight of them took his place, which in turn saved another white soldier's life. From that we got some comradeship but not too close because we weren't communists or anything, but I think it did end up well enough.

Nowadays, you don't hear much about them, but when it happened, I could not believe it. I think that neither of them could even afford sending back a piss-jar, not to mention that theirs was a different kind of piss and no one wanted to deal with it.

Worst of all, I think, lived the chieftain. He had gone through a lot these days and I think he needed a well earned break. Most people don't even know you actually got one, at least once in a while, but then again, most people don't even get that far to begin with. He had only himself and the nature, and the Vietnamese who kind of took him as one of their own.

Since everyone mistrusted us, I only see it as natural that they would choose to take one of their own. And it got even more confusing when we were joined by even more injuns after a while. But they were not Mohawks and they were not Cherokee or Iroquois and I don't even think they were injuns to begin with. We got a few Vietnamese soldiers on our side who wanted to take a break from working on the dams and on their farms and the captain said why not? I mean it couldn't hurt us any longer. We already had so many nations, whereas, as long as everyone kept to themselves, everything would be fine and dandy.

No one spoke of bad things and they didn't happen, until you found out that another woman got killed and her body got disposed into the well. But I think we all knew who it was and it didn't take any genius to know. They gave her no burial and she stayed there.

And this point it started to stank the place since their pond was a yellow, and they started recognising that it wasn't us. After that, we kind of got redeemed in the first place and they started trusting us again but not the blacks. Instead of spending all night cutting trees, now they dug the trenches.

There were shallow holes, deep holes and the trenches, but all of them had to be dug out. And just like there were two souths, there were also the other trenches, which were like real trenches but they went around, where the real trenches were more like deeper holes but no one wanted to call them that because the captain told us we should invent a lingo in order to confuse the enemy in case any intel leaks out. So we made the South-South, the Trenches-trenches and the fast going watches. I don't think we had many of those, the leaks I wager, because if word got out, we would've been dead.

A great deal of dying happened around there, but the one in the field didn't happen as often.

It was always the one you suspected the least, I think. That woman back then, the one, the one with me and White, I somehow don't think it was the captain. Hell, his was a different poison he went after, or was it Joseph? I always seem to confuse the two. One's white, I think, the other isn't. But the Captain always takes his side at dinner.

And we dined with the captain from time to time. We even said the gosspeil, yelling, and we excluded everyone who wasn't white from the table. But that always confused me because they allowed Joseph to stay because the captain wanted. They did look very much alike standing so close to one another and they always looked out for themselves, even though he was a soldier and the drill instructor always treated us like trash.

Kind of makes you think.

If there's something to be remembered from the Cong, it's the feud between Francis and White. Robert never got over it.

The seniors took the cake after, they were our infantry as well, but that had to way.

Robert H. White, what a piece of work he was. He was a good man at heart, but the wrong circumstances in life made him weary of the people. Oh, he wasn't dumb either, as a matter of fact, he may have been the smartest man in the regiment, which says a lot about the company. But he was one leg short of Oxford, where all the educated folk managed to go to. Born into a piss-poor family, he worked his way on, he climbed the ladder, he gambled, he became an alcoholic, he got beaten one night by a bunch of niggers and then he joined the army.

It was a different time for all of us. Sure we may not have been as fancy as to dine around the table, but it was who we were. And we didn't complain about this kind of life to them, that's not what the newspapers liked to sell.

‘Twenty a piece, twenty a piece, please buy the newest edition of today’s peace. Our troops are pulling out of Cong.’

They were lavishing drowning in it. Perhaps it should’ve dawned on me, somehow, that it didn’t go well for everyone in the days after. You go there with nothing on you, it should’ve stayed the same. But they give you a lot of package up there and you can’t get away from that. You can’t drink yourself into a coma, even though plenty of men had, you can’t stand your ground in a court like you could do it on the field, and this time around the rules changes.

No one minded their own bussiness out there. And it was like everyone got indocrinated or something. All kinds of questions were asked, details, exact numbers, how you got here, how you did that, what happened after and you said what you could, what was expected of you, then you left. Done, just like that. Sure, no one had the connections the captain had but most of us got away.

Truth be told, the generals in D.C. didn’t care about us much. They paid no mind about anyone out there as long as they made a buck and it went like that for a long time.

I still can’t believe how they managed to pull it off for such a long time. I’m still surprised by it, in all honesty, it felt like most of the rifles we got were made out of plastic while someone else got the real deal. And that was kind of maddening since we haven’t paid our trip here and we have to behave and we were told all types of bullshit we would have to carry over. But we didn’t know any better.

Day, didn’t matter which one, fifteen. Then the actual war started.

And it was mad, it was the end of a century’s long conflict before the new one emerged. We were out there, snailing our heads down as we were trying to avboid being sprayed upon by seas of bullets that came out of nowhere. The gunpowder had left a trail and a mist out of its path, and you could only see the stars of blue and red and white coming out of the distant barrels. It was hard to distinguish from the distance and from who came near. And those Vietnamese who joined out hard barely gotten themselves turned and pointed at.

‘I spek enligh, I spek english. American side, American side!’

Soon he gets down. Two men fall. Shot in the leg but they are slowly dragged away. Various laves fall in the surroundings, there’s lights everywhere. Smoke started going on, the apache could be heard from the distance. It could fall at any hour. It could fall at any minute. And the sounds stopped but they still went on, even without us hearing it. It was the gongs from the East, we were going to listen to it. Tires were rolling near the road, parachutes dropping but they were carrying molotovs not men.

And there was the sound of accoustic fire, the explosions and the hellfire. For the first, they say, you haven’t tasted war until you killed your first man with your bare hands. George came to his senses and only leaped to himself. He shot him in the knee and knifed him at a gun point. I got my hear, he thought, my first gook-ear that very hour. I was giggling like a school-boy going after his sweetheart. I couldn’t look way. There was no excitement as the canons stated firing. The mist cleared, there were men behind bamboo trees and a few others who were making too much noise in the back.

It was a stroke out there, we weren't moving, but shooting, either from the ground or from a knee up the hill. I don't know how as who and who'd get killed. We weren't advancing, they got too close somehow, or we have. And each and either way, we couldn't make it. I knew we couldn't make it, not now. But we pushed through dirt. I tasted dirt, actual dirt.

I couldn't see anyone else either any longer, I could only aim at the uniforms from his point on. I can't recall how many times I ended up aiming at bamboo and leaves before rolling out of some direction.

'Drop it, there's a drop incoming, there's the fire, roll outta the way.'

They screams out of lungs. Fire came out again, they rolled it everywhere, like a giant snail, like a Hiroshima that suddenly turned west, the fumes got in our lungs but we got away. And I could hear them coming, not enough of them died. We weren't meant to get so far to the fire, or see it scorch everything in sight. I saw it, and I didn't know it first. I think I hear it before it happened but I threw the grenade first. Was it he one who did this? Had I started the advance?

'On your feet now, all of you, move on boys, we need to secure the area.'

'Did we win sir?'

'Move on I said, before I turn this gun on you.'

I don't know who that was, but he was dressed like an officer. We followed through, there were neons during the night. We didn't sleep through, but if we did it was roughly under the sashes. I dreamed of shooting people but I never remembered waking up. And they fed up alcohol and all kinds of drugs and coffee and dirt and everything to keep us all awake and looking out.

We made it through the first landing, only eighty feet through the forest-fire. It was enough, we went away. Then we came out of it. We snapped, we started going around in circles and made it to South, the other South but they never called it that.

'Sir, we got one living here.'

They pointed him out of the way, we got him by the back of the neck and dragged him in the village. We actually had to push through what looked like a swamp. We found gold but it was water, and we actually swam through like in the drill days.

Past us, in our territory there was the long-field and the salient. The salient was short-longer and the field was getting shorter by the minute. All that was being caused by the fire, but the fire never touched the field. As soon as we were out in the open, they followed.

Advancing through the north, they railed on us from one of their wheels. Right on position we aimed, they retreated. Check his pulse, the man was still alive. Everything still stank and it wasn't only the body in the piss-pond. Then we broke through one of the houses, barely getting in, throwing him on the ground, not even taking the time to tie him down. After pounding him we stopped.

'Open your mouth, open your damn mouth.'

Lemming go get one of the Nams and ask for a translator, go!'

He yelled, a lot. He acted like a god damn dentist without anesthesia, he was bleeding on the floor. This formation was the bull, since we kept pounding the place. Aland kept pacing around the room. Brock was shaken and didn't want to stop the officer.

We stood there as if this was something new. I don't know why this looked so weird. It was different than before. For us at least since we were animals, but he was an officer. It was much worse when he did it. You hear stories about it happening but don't think of it, you can't, because you ask questions then. Let's say we all wanted to ask questions then, since it was too much. Abhorrent, disgusting, he was forced to choke and puke on himself before he was dragged around the floor and bled. But he never choked, that's as much as I remember.

'Bring me a bucket, one from the piss-pond.'

I did as I was asked.

Barthram accompanied Rogers, White was nowhere to be seen. Not even the negroes could take it for some reason, despite being the way they have been ever since we came to this place. And it went on for twenty more minutes. He never drowned.

One of the village-translators came in. He was largely calm despite being met by this sight. It felt as if he expected to take his turn as soon as we were done with him.

I ain't no man of God any longer.

After seeing what I saw today, there ain't a piece of cloth that could even wash me up after seeing what I've seen. Baby wipes on his face, that's what they threw out. He started singing so fast that by the time he was done they started giving him another round just for the hell of it.

'We need to leave, we heard enough.

Lemming, take the translator out.'

Both of them heard the shot. Everyone got what they wanted out of it. You could say that the body stayed there up to this day.

And a whip and a crack, and that's how they walked out of the plantation.

It was how it was, it was how they treated everyone that day.

But as for them, they weren't there. Francis and White were back in the old camp. Francis got this close to being labeled a deserter, and he was almost shot on sight. There were a few things that didn't work out between the two of us. He took his sweet time looking around, not knowing what to say.

It was a failed act. It was miserable, everyone felt miserable. And most of all, Robert White.

'You know, I did not mean it when I said it. About I being and you being and sir and.'

He didn't have to say a thing. Most people wouldn't make the difference between the calibres. As a matter of fact they'd know. They'd know. He had a big head there. And he appeared to be one of the worst ones out there, until I got a hold of him, his lips were bigger than his jaw and they appeared to only encompass the skin rightly so. He acted like an ape for no reason and didn't know how to behave when asked to sit down.

Now there were two things you did when this happened, you either shot him in the body, but he was bare-chested and appeared to have no skin, only that salive-lip that spread around and the strange four legs that came out of his back on a lamp-post like body that erupted from his pair of flower-tongues.

Robert white already took a few shots at his chest. He detested seeing them piss blood, especially since he was wearing a gook woman's body as his lower-side.

He was calm despite being shot eighteen times.

Robet then took the time to read the rest of the journal, while he was frozen in place. He was a man of the worst races out there and he could see why. When they died, they reverted to their primate-forms. Dark hair grew all around their bodies, and they started shaking off as the gook-skin fell off.

He was off the part, of course he wanted to read the rest then.

'I saw it all.'

Scuffold was there, but he didn't do a thing. He was only there to collect something. After pulling a knife out, I said not a word to hm and let him do whatever he wanted to do. We both have, we couldn't have done it otherwise. I was insulting doing it to one of our own, but he started carving the Negro in order to make it as belieavable as possible. That way, no one would think it was one of us and everyone would get on fine.

I started reading through some of the pages.

'Being followed by him again, I sees he watching from the down curtains, I think he knows of something but I can't tell it.

Captain had a bad eye on me as well but I think he knows I'm not one of them.

White powder does not magic any longer, no one's tricked. They know what I am, they told me many times.'

A dishwasher in the jungle, someone was singing it out there. We were being approached, so we got out of the way. In the nearest old trench, there, he pointed and made a motion. I was to follow and leap inside, say no word and pretend I died.

It was just like before, with the injun, watching the road, seeing the same two out there. No one was minding their business anymore, but these were troops of our own. Different regiment, don't move. Silently he spoke only with his tongues, we weren't to use any voice now. Otherwise we would be heard, found and trialed, unless we could somehow explain how it happened.

And the trial was only destined to go in one direction. A rifle machine started railing everything in sight. It came from under the gook-umbrella before the Nelolithic mongoloids that came with their face-axes in sight. They brought some of their spine-spinning guns out of the ground.

But that was only the back front. We only got plainly put here by chance. We didn't mind it any longer, we continued drinking. It was much softer before, spending a few days in the other barracks.

That's the most avoided part, if any could be said of it. After jumping from camp to camp, we switched from tents to barracks. We didn't move much, at least not in the same way. Something had to be tried then. It looked like a completely isolated eighteen-square by eighteen dwarf-buildings. It was dangerous staying there for long.

Not many of us got past the war-field. I think that, by now, Joseph, the captain, Rogers and George were sitting at a single table. Everyone was missing. A few of the dropouts were given. They were smoking and drinking scotch, not talking much they waited. He came at last, as if he was only sent outside to look into the desert of a field for a single war-box. It was needed to hear the morsel code.

Tawny, the injun came. Slowly, he seated himself down. None of us wanted to look him in the eye, it was part of the other way, fought up there. We were sitting in a circle reminiscing of that day. But not everyone at the table was aware of it.

It was likely that they would be somehow disgusted by the actions we took earlier in the day. That was why they refused to speak by the peak of the hour.

'One of our 'Nams came in earlier today, he found the tunnel.'

We were watching. Closely, but not so much, at least not as much as we were trying to get a word in; everyone was weirded out by the flies which came with the injun. Panda-flies, one of the worst kinds possible, they only appeared because of the sleep deprivation. Some were horned, others were dressed in the smoke of our cigars, but he wasn't there.

Only nineteen people were present then, don't ask, don't tell. It was repeated a few times. And every time it got repeated, a piece of it went missing. Soon they would completely forget it, up until the only thing that came out of it was tell and ask. Business, go around into other people's business. It was the order of the day.

Cigars were put down, no one was smoking. Somehow, it crossed his mind to come here earlier. He's seen a lone, he's been through a lot but Lemming came first. He entered the barracks. This was a change, this was no circus den and he was no clown.

He considered making an inappropriate joke, but no one was up to it. Everyone was serious now. Outside, people were dying by the heads. Twenty men died, they were mostly the blacks. As soon as it happened, they got replaced and got sent back. It was the government, they saw them more than disposable, which turned out to be how everyone took it to their account. Whereas a white soldier had a twenty percent to up the draft, a Negro had something like an eighty; that was the times.

And they went on a blind thing and waited for something to happen. Here he came. Robert H. White was the next one to come through the door, he was bloodied, more so than usual. He looked completely out of it, everyone froze in their seats. Even the captain pushed a hand to the side to have everyone sit down. They remained solid. It was expected of them.

Was this it? He was armed. It could just damn be one of those damned moments a man could not take it any longer.

Obvious symptoms were shown, no one wanted to laugh or crack a pipe no longer.

He was pumping iron, he was pulsating.

High-heated brows which contrasted cold-dead eyes.

He was here with them, but also phased out. Despite staring at them, he stared through them and made no sound. It was not the kind of man you'd like having in your room, or at a dinner.

Let us not forget where he was. He shot a man before this. Breakfast was done for, he ate too much dirt. And most of them were too slow to do anything about it. This had vaguely been turned in, if anything. No child was crack-headed then. Opium was being spread around in the north and they could not be allowed to progress.

'I thought we were here to liberate them, weren't we?'

'I thought so to, but that was earlier in the evening, before you did, you know. Whatever crossed your mind, we heard the news.'

Everything was recorded. It was demonstrated on papers. A few sketches and some plans were thrown across the table, as if they were gambling my life away. It was just what I needed now, this was my rewards. Forty days spent here with barely a piece of action and this is what I got.

'Are you all done now? Can we seriously reach a stop? Perhaps? Perhaps I could ask something of you.'

He had a rifle on him and a piss-jar. It was soon replaced. He came here for a reason, we all listened to it before decided whether or not we could report him.

It was what the trial was about. But he hadn't actually stepped inside the court when it happened. The trial went over his head. We had all the proof we needed anyway. Other than the blood and the witnesses, he was covered in his lips. He managed to actually roll over the pool of life and his lips, as if it were a hay stack.

But that wasn't resolved there. Another call to action, everyone simply went out.

Troops were advancing from the south, somehow they took the path only a naval fleet would allow, but there was no fleet on the horizon. Mostly, it was a merde, a french death, it was called that way because of the French trade in Trinidad. They carried a lot of coke and rum, drinking themselves to death like sailors. Some sailors only spoke of it twice. Speaking of it thrice meant death, and we drank in their name, thinking of who came after us.

Mercenaries, they brought in mercenaries. Mao was divine, he was the man in power. His arm was made out of solid iron. For some reason they worshipped him more than our Christian God. And for that reason he had to be put down. That's the reason for the war starting. It's something they never put down on papers for a good reason.

They would be beheading camels in the future, that's what they kept telling us. Long-officers who wore diamond-backs.

No more insanity, not for now. No one saw anything wrong. We went off the barracks in time. Twenty or so barracks were set and build around 'Cong. But all of them got completely abandoned because of the bombing. We got invaded from below. More and more tunnels started finding us like ships and balls. Since then, we switched back to tents and even worse. Sleeping with the enemy in their beds, we joined the next village on the country side.

This one was different. The american generals were running out of ideas. Despite having established our dominance here, some people decided we would be fought at every turn.

We gave up on too much on a short period of time, first the tents, then the barracks, the booze, the smokes and the screens. Then we gave up on our uniforms, and we dressed like the enemy. And sometimes we were the enemy and sometimes the enemy was in our ranks. At the end of the day, that's what they tried showing us.

Don't trust anyone here. It's hard to tell how that was good advice, but don't got attached to them. Our people weren't our people, they didn't exist. They were machines, they were devices, they were things, they were invisible. As long as you saw a small dot in a sea of air, you knew not to shoot the dot. You only saw the enemy and you shot him, he died. Next one after, then the napalm strikes, they came as soon as they were expected. I wish I could say something clever about it.

But I was no deserter. And White, he would be trialed for a war crime. Except he wouldn't, I don't think so. If he went out, we all went out, all. All of our numbers, the nineteen that were present there, and we knew it, he knew it; it was a secluded thing. Should've taken the first chance to get out of the war, shouldn't you?

No poker buddies, that would have to wait. Hopefully he will die in the field, tis' what everyone prayed for. Now, no one trusted him. No hierarchy was needed because of this; it was the one rule, never. What was it? He tried remembering it, something about don't look, tell and mind your business? Something about the captain?

What the hell was wrong with the captain? White had something on him. It just went to show you that intelligent people don't make it into power. But somehow everything turns all right. The captain was being fiddled like a toy by him. Yeah, I'd like to see his face now, since he dissapeared as well. Vanished outta the place as soon as the war ended, he wasn't present at the trial either.

Short break from it, in honor of Bismark, no in honor of Uphill, no one knew why the boy told everyone in the camp his story. It was in poor taste, everyone laughed. It was how they honored and how they remembered the kind. Times like this made you remember the kid for who he was, I think. He was given a proper Christian burial now. Most of us liked to think that out of that napalm hell we gave the gooks, we cood the cannibals more than they ever would of Uphill.

He was in a better place, may God rest his soul in peace. Everyone gathered, except the captain and Josephth. Say what you want about the Negroes and the Gooks, but even they came along, the converts in any case. And this happened during the night, after something like a four hour trip that started back at them. They would not sleep this night either since the way back would take whatever amount of energy they had in them.

It got so tiring that most of them were glad to come back exhausted and be stabbed in the back. Otherwise, they weren't happy. Kenneth was there for some reason. He wasn't liked. Ever since he joined in, he was the most silent of all. He kept to himself all too often. Early grave was embded on his chest. He died of a stroke tomorrow morning.

We were in the new-new camp, with the new clothes that looked like the enemy.

Out of the broken homes, we made a tall insulin-tower, hanging the american flag on top of it. After all this hard work, some things were worth it. I'd like to think that. It was moments like these that we spent together and managed to form some comradeship which would last.

If there's some greater force there, I hope it's listening now.

George, he was from Georgia. His county was full of fish-men and taxidermists and Confederate sympathisers. And they looked like hicks and bozos, but they had heart. T'was all it mattered to them, no one could take it away. For all that was worth, they stood for what they belived in and they also cracked your skull open if you pissed on their flag or burned it.

So many statues, so many paintings, so many writings, it was what divided people now. Get rid of them or burn them? Neither worked for anyone and the stars were taken, the guns were taken and the children were taken. It was what divided everyone back home. Meanwhile the rich covered their ears and pretended no war happened. Everyone was happy.

Robert for example had it going now. If he returned back home, he would be seen like a hero. Either by his people or by the hippies, but the hippies were no longer hippies. They were never the hippies, they were the hitties, the outsiders. But they were the insiders as well. Hippies were the Government. And the Government wanted to pull out.

It was because they cut their heads oppen in their higher-ups and they inserted the docile species inside of them. From every corner of the world, they looped around and for fire's worth, they needed to increase their world temperature in order to survive.

In the back seats, in the black-rooms they showed themselves as they were. And their faces extended and shot tiny shell-like conical domes that poured inside the room. From around the walls, the ceiling and the floor, their faces could be replicated a million times, as they began speaking in tongues.

Bodies were needed where they lived and it was unappealing to conter them in speech. This madness continued ever-after and that's what they wrote in the newspaper, which didn't actually seem to be likened.

News were travelling slow from the front. And it was hard to tell which account was authentic. A lost of false alarms carried on, but that didn't seem to matter. This is undoubtedly the most imporant piece of history he looked back at. His eyes were both keen and kind for details. He held a prayer in the morning in a heathen land. A lot of things didn't add up, nothing made a lot of sense. It was a thing of the war, actually. Look at it, compare it with what you see on tv, what you read in the newspapers. No one wants to take the conspiracy theories serious because they're mostly fucked in the head.

Then the dead, they couldn't give interviews at all. It was a thing of the past, maddening. It was the reaction of the memories kicking in while trying to make sense of what you see and what you heard. Sometimes the bombs dropped way too close and you went home back deaf.

Robert's grandfather was in the war. He joined the Axis, but he was on the German side. That much he remembered then. While going around and digging trenches, he busied himself going step by step over the old war stories which made him cheeks ever so flowery, even though it was mainly from the cold. Cold, that's it. A result of the red, his great-great-great grandfather fought for the Confederates. And he was a typist as well. Everything was pinned down ever since that time. A lot of interest was shown by the press, that much was known. He carried the Grand Duke's will with him now and his hatred for the blacks.

A few more generations later, Germany, his grandfather worked there before the first war. He fought for the good guys, both wars. If there's something he inherited from him, it was caring for your own people. This what he did, he walked around in other people's shoes and made sure they didn't step wrong. Even though they made a loss back then, this time around there was a turn-about. No one spoke of that, past was stolen.

The States got the German scientists, he got his grandfather back. The ceremony was short but well-worn. You could tell it, he came back as a hero. Now, would it be the same for him?

Robert H. White considered this for a moment. He didn't know what to say or how to take it in. He's been around the world with the tour of France, he's seen some things. But this was different. Coming from a line of heroes gave you something, a vision, a quiet thing, a mind of your own. It made you clever and smart-smarts, like South-South, it was made up. That wasn't the point.

He waned about it. He whined about seeing it. For good reasons as well, looking back and forth, he saw how things went about the place. While everyone was busy dying, he was busy thinking. Then Gook-king, Mao, the worshipped had bankrupted China. It spilled around like a disease. It's because Mao's legs spread like long roots all around the place. He fed on everyone and managed to get just about as much food from their brains and bodies as she could. It's how they starved to death.

And a near-like extermination almost killed everyone. Luckily things were going to be different here. If only he had gotten a real rifle, instead of the plastic one he carried around. He shot fire-works in actuality, and they weren't even wide enough for him to kill someone, more like sting.

White took a second, he checked his pocket. He realised something. It was the moment he became a man, that dawned on him. After checking the ear he realised it. No tattoo. Damn that man, he was full of it, he was going to shake us during the card game. Not that it mattered since he managed to get a hold of the tooth. Bastard had it coming.

But he hadn't made it in the new camp in time. By the time he was there to enact revenge on what's he's found out, it kicked in too late. The engines were being cleaned. How did the Congs that joined them, the farmers, how were they so good on the field? They had no field experience, but it was clear.

And they didn't kill much on the field either, it was the Napalm and the mist and the star and the fisting of the ladies. It was that night. Somehow he was taken over by it.

'Of course it has, how could I actually come to forget about it?'

Moving on, the country-fair, it was the village. Despair came over him. Grief followed on a pair of empty gallons. Fires never erupted in that way because they were shallow. Everyone left from the surroundings, from the nearness and the short-sighted warrior in their boots and graves, only a few were left. I should've known it.

And It saddened him in some way, knowing that so many good men died.

George, Scooter, Apscoot, Barthram was missing in action and Brock were down. They piled up the place as if it looked like the Harlem. In some way, it wasn't as well received by the Congs either. Because they were there and I was there. Wrong place, the wrong time and that would be all that could be said now.

Oh, and the injun survived as well.

Bad luck for the worst company, a lot of road-kills away in the jungle and stop.

Dishwasher, the song kept popping in his head, it had a meaning he was yet to comprehend. For starters, he didn't know how he had gotten over it to begin with. Was it a mystery? Maybe it was, maybe it wasn't. Either way, there were the.

The drill is over kid. He forgot everything he learned the moment they got him.

Welcome to the real world.

Will you give into them or press on?

What's on the tv?

Nothing much, a news anchor at five am, they always do that. The weird thing when they switch channels when you can't really pay attention it. Sometimes, you press a few buttons and everything goes blank. The tv isn't even close yet, but it goes blank. And everyone know what that means, every time.

No good channels anymore. It's all blank, and reused commerical, someone needs to get fired. A documentary of some random channel, spoken about war. A memorial is being kept. Someone got some adaptation gotten after his auto biography. It appears to be too real until you realise that it's all fake and everyone's full of it, but you already know this. You knew this even before they decided to go there. You set on a foot and news at five.

Someones' supposed to be on trial, but they keep it all a mystery because the guest isn't there yet. How? Why is that they can't find it? It's all a mystery for everyone else, as much as it is to me.

Perhaps it should tie in somehow, they could use it. Maybe he's an escaped convict, or some obses truck-driver. He's someone who shot his way, or a pony, no, a fruit, that's what they call em nowadays. And they want to beat the pony. All right.

They don't train you for this. They don't even tell you of it.

Black room, no tv this time, nothing to read, but a bunch a weird letter on a table. It all looks like an investigation chamber. They want to say something, they want to start it but they can't. No, it's all left to me, I'm the citizen, I'm the wrong-doing american who came out of nowhere, took their jobs, took their women and hates them nigs.

Of course I'm there. And they brought some muscle as well. It's not. It didn't happen that way. It isn't decent.

It's just a chair in a dirty room, with only one light and they beat the shit out of you. Not even the same way you do, they use a hammer, but it's not made of iron. I can't tell it by the feeling. But it hurt, a lot. Every time they do it, it simply hurts. And they start with the legs and you scream and every time you scream they hurt you more, they shove something down your throat but not too deep so you don't choke.

It's not easy getting through it. I'm sure. They all make you feel every inch of it. Animals, they're animals, they're slink eyed and don't see you as human, it's a Negro-prison but they're yellow not brown. It's a shit-infested moth cell, then they leave.

And you think of everything you said and done and look above you. Red-eyed, only one light, there's not much and you can't scream. It's sick, but it can't go through detail. No one wants to think of it, no one wants to invasion it. Sometimes they don't look for information, they take the piss and do it for fun. They have all the information they need. No one knows english, no translator is being brought.

All of the sudden you're one of the Vietnamese women, out there, sitting on a couch, reading a novel. It's sudden.

I hear it on the news, no, on the newspapers or written in one of the newest released novels. And it gets dark but no one can explain what's happening in there before they come again. Everything's so dirty and unnatural, you're also fed and given water.

It goes for days. No one wants to be a deserter, no one wants to be an informer. And it's said after, everything you write on paper gets put down and they call you mad. But if you were to write it while it happened, you'd, you'd, they wouldn't know it. They wouldn't know what it means or why aren't they stopping. Or why have you done that to them and did they feel the same when you did it?

Was this justice? There's no justice in the war, you do what they're told and everyone is wearing a uniform. All of it is in bad taste.

'And another man pisses on a veteran. He is a killer, he is a murderer, he is the man who fucked up their nation, who fucked up your nation. He's the man who wants you to behave. The arm of the party, he's the one carrying a gun and making sure you're not around him.'

They make fun of the crippled on and the one who killed a dozen. After a while, they look the same, after one gets shots or loses in a ration. One of them is poor, welfare. Disgusting, he's looked at that way. Caught you, haven't I?

Says a single man with a camera in his lap, coming on from around the van, they're all trying to get the best shots of the monsters and of the freaks. It's too dangerous to hear or to speak of it in the midst of day. If they hear you, they might risk breaking your nose or, worse, reenacting the war.

Half of them drunks and half of them killing their wives. It's how it is, they can't make the difference anymore and who can blame them? She could be squint eyed without the glasses or slightly slim and bending over for a plough. And what does that position remind you if not of the time it takes you to reach for your gun?

It's all much worse for those who wait. They tell you of techniques of terror, how they torture of all them to the last one. Sometimes their families, other times not, it doesn't matter, as long as everything gets the job done. Missed, you missed it, the man who's done it had it the worst, he's the one with a family he had to look after first.

And then it's White. He cannot fight back for now, he's not there on the fields, perhaps he could've lost it as well if he wasn't careful enough. He's been through a lot after all. Not saved, nor looked after.

It's done.

Twenty am, fifty-five, eighty? Days after:

The court will settle with only one key testimony and then we shall continue. It's hard to listen from the other side of the tv, static's getting out of the way. Prayers go to him as well.

I think there's a few of them, of us who got us who still share a prayer for him, another time perhaps. He sure had it the worst. It was that expectation, it wasn't the stories, it was only what he knew of them. Finding Uphill's hand they say. A shocker, that's what get through you now, midly pressing and no emotion, those end up, somewhere else. And they laugh, if they don't, you're cruel and after that.

You stop questioning what happens inside that room.

White isn't in the court, he's indisposed.

Rogers also commits suicide twenty days after the war is over, barbiturates.

There's a nice field out there. A protected land somewhere in the states, maybe in Nevada. No one actually bothered asking of which tribe the injun is a descendant of. And no one seemed to care.

It was an easy life after the war. He was, he was always melancholic about the wildlife being taken away from them, out of their hearts. Ancestors drifting away as times change. There's still howls in the night taking their breaths away. It's still dangerous being there.

Being there, and doing that and trying to move on.

It's a regular thing. It stays with you. No sleep at night for everyone and that's what keeps it alive after. The habit of doing it, the retrospective that's lost, never finding a hobby. And shooting your wife, it's not the same. Turning the gun on yourself, it's not something they aim to teach you anywhere, as a matter of fact. Unless they thought of any better, some instructors might have you do it than be caught. Pain wasn't just a factor, but it was the habit.

The habit got you.

You turned back home and went to sleep at about the same hour, woke up regularly at the same hours and then you don't know whether you're on the field on back home. It's a dream. Eventually you have to get up. Join the workfield again. See the people. It's strange. Mostly, everyone goes back to it, whether they want to do it on the streets, in their homes, on the fields or.

This can't be put on anything, it's a feeling that can't be described. It's. It's the consequence of trying to. Don't know, can't know it.

It's a simple room, isn't it?

It's hard to get accustomed to a room after you live in the outdoors. Especially when all the walls are white, you can't write on it, or people will start putting you in a jacket. You can't write it at all, since it's mostly scribble, but not in the same sense. It's coherent, but it doesn't make any sense at all.

You compare it to workd of literature but you knnow there's something off, which you can't piece back together. And it's gone after a while.

There are skies out there and they are many.

Regardless of it, no one gets put on trial for the rapes. Those never happened.

Aland and Brock don't see much light any longer.

It's all Fort now. He's just about the only white man in the regiment. Then there's the injun and the others are missing. This isn't a great sight for anyone. There's no winner here.

Francis is still missing they say but everyone knows.

What's there? What's that exactly?

There he is, like a jackal-elongated skull, wearing a robe, he's a magic person, one that's here to guide everyone to the sea. He, of all, is the ungoly man, the pagan and the heaten in a costume. He who shall take all from them and consolidate the spot, only with his help will they advance.

There's something off him, most of the negroes are at least entertained. Laughing and yapping their mouths, paying to no surroundings, never knowing what's happening. It can never get too far, they don't know what could happen if someone were to gamble with their lives.

One side has eighty people down, the other, millions. And it barely started, who knows what's next. Everyone's getting liberated and no one knows what happens there. He's grinning know. Cousin knows, Fort can't look away, he's got something to say for himself during the night. Nothing's moving like it used to be. It's all the regular.

Up, aim, release, pull back, on the ground, repeat. They're looking out of some direction. It's hard, it's a mystery, they don't know how to do it any longer. It's a hit and miss, it's not for peace. It's way too complicated for my likings. If Rogers were here today, they'd talk of the good old days and about the fun they had. But even that night died off, for everyone. What a tender moment this would happen to be. Thinking about it back then, it was anything but forgettable, until you got kicked into it, that's when it's.

It doesn't get talked about.

Perhaps, there's no shame in stopping.

Life is so absurd after a while, just like a leviathan, they are unleashed upon the world. And the Crawling Mao gets forth, he gets what's left out of his life then withers away in a plain field of dead plants. Firearms are sold cheap. Fire-arms cheap, sold, made cheap, never used. Too long, now it's ruined.

Here's a cheap laughter in the forest.

Jonathan Sink's one of the few men that don't know how they got there to begin with. He's off to capture a man. He knows, somehow about the missing man. Everyone talks about him after all.

'Rober H. White is missing from the camp.'

First the barracks now the White, what else will God take away from us? By now everyone's done mourning or moved on that, even if Uphill would crawl from the dead without an arm and looking as if he had bathed in a pool of napalm, he'd still be just as left. There was nothing anyone was thinking. It was at this point in the campaign that everyone was drained.

And they were way too drained to say a thing. It was uneventful, really, White was missing? Call it a hunch, but everyone who was left, which wasn't too many now.

Scuffold, Joseph, the Captain, Ken, John and that was about it. No one heard anything of Fort. But the rest of the regiment didn't look like it was doing much crying, they weren't trying.

Next move, lost half of the battalion during a peaceful rally which went through well. It didn't go as they would tell you, when it just so happen for one of the bombs to flail, to bounced from cloud to cloud as they were filled with puffy-pus as it managed to land just in the right, the perfect spot, atop the tunnel, revealing them in turn and the room White was in after all this time.

One last time for the ladies, they veered in and slaughtered everyone in the tunnel. They were bringing the pesticide like a green fume of death that spread through both side as well. No amount of fire compared with what they released. Everyone stepped back as they pushed in the most volatile of substances, a type of gas that never even touched White at all. It didn't take too long after that. They died soon and he was back.

Ken stung his foot and ripped off his entire neck, off as in, a part of the forest fell in a mass grave, being dragged with him downstairs. He was chained by the collars and pushed in the Hyades as an infernal spectral which may never rise again. Though the enemy was soulless he could not fathom leaving things unturned. From the green pus-gas came the Green King, filled with toxins, one last time until he would prevail.

In his dance of wonder, he grew stronger and disipated in the air, as a song of dark swans in a lake of blood. Puddles would emerge at that and he could never deal with the dread in his heart.

Kenneth danced like a puppet. He was entranced in a peculiar woe. He saw things no man should wander and grew stronger only as he pushed it past the distant call of the survivors as they pitied him after.

At least the man they were after was finally recovered, he thought. It was an insemination of thought he could have never come back from. And that was yet the least obscure, the immaterial and the thing that ventured before noon.

Joined in the meal, everyone sat at the table. If it weren't for what happened there, you could somehow swear that this hasn't happened at all. He hadn't been a prisoner, he wasn't tortured, despite looking like shit. No, but he was, unfortunately, his mind wasn't right. By now, not this moment but in some moment that hasn't happened now, he got off easily. The trial was over, it was done. And the key witness left too early before a sentence could be passed to a man that wasn't there.

A break, how did the war end?

How do war ends when they only begin?

Except, it all falls apart.

There was one chance at redemption, to fix everything in the war. And no one could stomach it more than them. It was obvious what happened in there. No one laughed then. It just so happened that the troops that came from the South were reinforcements, on their side. It was laughable that they would arrive now, which made it all the funnier.

A brigadier dies later in the die. He crashes his plane, nothing remains inside his cabin.

Someone could still draw out some good parts from the water. There was still. No, there wasn't much action after that. It was a failure which resulted into one last thin.

The way back home.

It take a great man to admit he's lost. But there's no fallen titans, not in this part of the world.

So there, White is being carried back home. And the rest is being taken care off.

Which leaves the day of the departure, and the days after.

Scuffold stood alone in a seat, up in the plane. Two seats further, everyone else. It was a few rows out of their way, it was here that they parted, in spirit mostly. A few things first, no one wanted to speak about it on the way back. And the captain held enough of his notes that he would incriminate just about everyone else.

Only bloody hands paint the deck.

A stalker

Where are the woods and when have they gone after the fires? When the flames never reached the ash, where the trees were hanging up the last stranded side of earth, where the land was a patch, the planet swallowed by the water-worth. And in the light of day where they say, on the sea he walked, with a patch and a single watch, with a plain white coat, where Roscowaff was being watched.

There was no one around, last time, but he had seen him walk around. He was someone just like him, walking on top of the flat-sea.

Last time around, where he had been there, he forced himself to peer into the crater around the bottom of the deluge-flea.

‘Who’s there?’

It was only an old tree that was half-submerged. And the quiet of static that only made enough noise for him to dwell around the thought, scrambling around a tiny bolted brain-machine carved on his forehead, around the lobe where he wasn’t allowed to wallow.

For a second there, the ash looked like a man. Roscowaff was almost too startled by it to look away. Considering this for a moment, he wanted to ask something. He wanted to check and find out whether or not it was alive. They took away the quiet, it’s when the sound broke through the barrier. Two suns always followed through but one shined brigher and the other one was organge and flat. It felt like everything here was flat and slow-moving. Motions were still out there despite there being no one to talk to or to interact.

It was what gave him the feeling of being stalked, another Roscowaff like him, standing in the distance, looking in, and another twenty of them farther than him in the opposite direction. All of them were stalking him. Being alone also meant he couldn’t go in either or any direction without meeting himself. Yellow puddles and pups were tied in buckets, thrown around the moon. Most of them were frozen and shouldn’t be seen in the light of dawn when the cruel one shook himself off into the cracked satelling around which he gravitated.

Against the others, he was somewhat, different. Unlike us, not the same type of stalker, but he had another cruel thing opposed to them. He watched, and the watched turned on everyone. A fight ensued between one of the groups.

‘I want my teeth back, all of them.’

Peering now, he gazed from the puffs of space-gas, the nebula he was, the body of a humanoid genie-like creature with eighteen turned-around tall heads. All of them were crested with spears. From each of them long-eyes extended so far that they were indistinguishable from the sharp edges. It was peculiar and uncanny how theys canned for Roscowaff.

But they weren’t dead. Neither of them had wounds, they simply were.

‘My teeth, now I need them now. I can’t go long without crunching my lips. I am in need of subjugation.’

He kicked him in the shins. A part of his bone kicked out of a knee and started dancing around, pushing through the soundless curtain that dance around his bone marrow. Then he retreated twenty feet away. Both of his legs were now disabled. After reconsidering for a while, he opened himself up, exposing a mouthful of gangrene-beetles that started reshaping his legs. Antler-shaped hoops came out of his guts up to the point where he had been bloated by them in the same way a giant bullfrog would be. His eyes drew inward and now he approached.

Dead-legs they called him while pointing out that he wanted some more. His arms were skinnier. Neck-drown suit traps inside the bottles, sold for nothing. Taken by the cattle of their liver which started bursting out, twenty of them started going at it, and twenty were drunk.

A drunk-brawl soon ensued.

‘Take this you plattipus-knuckles.’

He pushed against the taker. One another neatly done, outdone in the spit, he dropped down as they came running on him. In as much of a mess as it were, they couldn’t express the pain as eight of them fell down, stricken right and left of their temples. A radiation filled-ball, a strike between the pool in which they all laid as the soft embraces started producing heat. They radiated the ground until it hadn’t been flat for long. In the faces of the ashes, all the dead people from the marshes started grabbing at their knees, eating tiny veins. Billions of them still remained.

‘I hear the plane coming.’

Everyone was distracted. And while they looked for a sign in the sky, or in the air, whichever aero-flat obscure sphere, they failed to see him dragging on. Coming from below their knees, they started grabbing each other and listening.

‘I got your knees.’

He sliced as them. Rosco started bottling the booze directly into their veins. Bubbles of blood and melted glass carried on and formed their bone-structure in the same veins of abstract-puzzles. And then he died, but he remained, as his soul shot down the ashen pool that hardened as well.

‘Get out of it before it hardens and we’re trapped down there.’

He hadn’t but a clue, he couldn’t point at the rue. Listlessly dancing, he started coming off like an obese barrel that rolled around. It was mad, the dance, and the lonely man who looked at this sight.

All the while, the genie-like watcher only laughed. Drunks as they were, everyone turned towards him trying to express something they were after.

‘Who was he?’

Sights weren’t exactly what they were. In was the munching on dry ice which made him go back to the patch of ground, the green of home. While he was there, everyone stopped coming forth. They weren’t frozen, not at all, instead they chose to remain in the back and make no sudden shake or the brow. It was the simple disquiet, that so far was how it is.

Their entire existence was blasphemous. It was a pity that they were alive, murmuring and muttering while trying to find their way in. It waned and went in as they hid and got outta the way.

It was lazy, it was what it was. Gin and sand in their mouths, plain as it was. Looking outta the way, there was no obsession here, only the walking. In circles, not so far, as they would go inside.

Then there's the day he comes back.

'Ivanoe, I have something to tell you.'

He attempts to speak, he stops once he realizes he's dead. That's it, kapoot, and shot in the foot with a vile and poisonous evil-dart. He dies.

Now come the matyr, whoer him, he dies for all. He doesn't pay and they don't listen.

A few more masses come along, and the entire place's trashed. Though the plane dome-wall that's set around the outer heat, the piece of led that's in his brain ain't working fine, he cannot help but taunt them improperly.

'A dream, I had, I think. Before I fell asleep under the shadow of banyan leaves.'

He recalled the worm-that snake, that weird expanding creature which pushed on through the world and cracked the universe in its wake. How it spread and kept on growing, how it pushed almightingly unknowing.

But it didn't matter then.

They were staring. It was not as expected, wondering then. They were mutes and stepping was words, stepping was sounds, stepping was speech. Stepping was sign language, it was how it was.

It felt beige, empty. No shame and no disquiet, he knew it, as soon as he stepped out. No one would watch or judge it any longer, mostly because no one could tell what was in his mind. Emotional novelty was nothing to him here.

'I know now.'

Rosco understood it immediately, it was drove him there, even what got him killed in the first place. It would be something that needed no recreation, regardless of what he believed in. When he met in, right in his face, it grinned. He knew it, how much sense it made, now that he was the one going towards them, driving them away.

He wasn't meant to be right, he was wrong. Born wrong, it was the satisfaction that soon elated him and vanished that soon went out of its way and left him. Somehow, after spending so much time here, he knew it. Ivanoe was wrong to befriend him. Sometimes it didn't come back, it could never come back, no matter how hard he tried to get a hold of it.

It was not a depression in his skull, nor a device. While trying to feel at it, he didn't find the part of his lobe he wanted to check. Whatever happened went too deep and couldn't be what he felt.

‘In days like these, seeing how you won’t move or run away, I feel as if I could simply harm all of you.’

Tw as what he said, and there was no echo, only another crack into the upper ceiling where the orange sun spake. And the wind rose. It went on coming with all the mist in this world, the steam joining and rotating around like a giant circle he watched. No fighting ensued this time as they waited in some sort of line.

It was hard to express any feeling now, or emotion. Since this hadn’t happened before, he went on a limp. Trying to wait it out, but that didn’t work out well. Fear, anxiety, obscurity, that’s what lacked his device. Too many of them paid attention now, to what was wrong. It was cruel, trying to watch him go. And whoever was watching was miles worse than them, as he’d know.

Just how far?

Taking no time to find out, there were other things he tried first. Near them, he checked and pulled but never as far nor as fast as to rip everything off into no direction. Apathy and indocrination, he tried inserting them in the same way you’d take a long piece from his mental device and then you pushed it inside, as a card. No sense, it was dull. Nothing worked and it frustrated him to no end.

Where had it gone? How come he couldn’t tell what went wrong?

‘I wish I knew what I lost. I think it was only a few hours ago so don’t take my word for it.

Termite-temples came in. Driven by the head. It was something they didn’t look back into.

Dekhunon

Pink carpets and strange mellon-walls, in a strange surrounding that only carried on twenty feet away, they said.

The darkest hour was soon to come. Every single cat turned to its eyeless owner, who woke up from their strange slumber, as coffins had been made of steel.

A few more other chains had been turned and yearn about the place in a condescending manner. It was their after all, the only place of refuge. He who was there cared not to hear of the spoken reasons, for he had been ripped apart, lost in thorough heads.

‘Need to get deeper into this platform-teeth, opened jaw.’

A few enlarged schizo-beds stood there, in which part sheet-of skin withered as they drew around the big headed necks that sprouted out of them. From just about every spot, they looked like miniature head-forests, long throated in the most peculiar manner.

‘I hear them walk, pleased to be in a nuance of cancer. May I have the disease begotten?’

Fractioned in the mind, he could not refuse it any longer. All the beds materialised inside the room. Most of the pixy-cranes, the pink remained the blood of the tunnels. Most of them were dead in the mind. And a seething body came to wonder.

‘Will I wish to hear it after?’

For the nastiest of times, awoken, none of them misspoke of the direst images that came to be. It was all that filth that gathered around, messing with their braids and with their strange remaining giant empty nostrils, crossed eyes. Most unkindly they gathered around. A great fire had been made, arousing. Never to be distraught and prising one another in spirit they were lost.

‘We need to gather the troops my lord-precious dead-brain.’

He spoke as he came back from the disablement of the machines. He was a single man with half a body that was part of them and carried still a few more lengthy tubes that drew in the back. In a giant pile all the junk-yard cementary of scraps elected the blodily growing blocks of spew after-clot. An emissary of disease appeared there as well. After examining the man he saw that all the stricken robots and all the other rusted machinery wanted to get him somehow, burning him through the magnificent lot.

‘Ah, now I get it, you want to die. It can be arranged, I suppose. Don’t over expose yourself to the chemicals around the ground.’

‘Which ones?’

‘There’s the izopod, which is a crustacean mice-particle which got spread around the place for some reason or another. And there’s the other thing.’

‘Which is what exactly?’

‘Make up your minds first, what do you want of me?’

He prophesized an approach, he was only looking back and forth. And then twenty meters in the back, a choice was made and after that.

‘I see, I see, what shall it be then?’

‘Twenty whips on my back stranger.’

He approach almost pandemoniously, never even doubting himself by the point.

‘Tichies in the bllewd, I think I need to perform another incision.’

‘And whereas would that be?’

In there he found some solace after some space was made into the room. Both of them presented one another their names. Part-machine was called: ‘A Borg by the name of Shipskin.’

The questioneer was Seik.’

Now they came to an understanding, being inside. They stepped out of the way as another creature had met them, one who had been him, a person named by the name. It was redacted.

He enacted twenty eight civil wars before coming to this point. He had heard the news from a distant vision.

A pair of fists slammed down the ground, making dents in their surroundings. Of course there was another thing to be weary of, that no one mentioned. In the alcove they rested with a few pieces of bread they had to make do with for at least a week. After that would be done with they would starve and starve some more. It never dawned on anyone how peculiar it always were, trying to get into some tight spots without taking care or considering what dwelled in them. First of the eighty-fivers came in. It was an intonation, trying to get something from them here, especially since they were listening to some message from the central source network.

Public announcement inbound.

‘Dear listener-man, you who carry your trinket with you on your way to one of the bound and lost bunkers. Need I say something clearer than this?

You of all the people that stood in line and had a chance to come into contact with the surveillance device have finally succumbed to the most dreadful of nodes, the mind-takers and the blood-intakers.

Rake the span of the meat factories and recover one of the lost meat-devices for me.’

While some strange man was trying to get the survivors as they were being accompanied by the giant and yet enigmatic being that mistook them there, something wild happened. Not here, nor anywhere. It was argued, shortly after that they didn’t have any mind of their own. Yet he, who lived in the bloc found something to look into after all.

Farlon Manckrat kept his screen. It got heavies now but he saw the thing within his eyes. Other androids couldn’t even fathom looking him around and trying to see what was happening to him. He left the people, and the beings, the humans and the other things that harbored the ticks, and instead, he chose to go all by himself.

Wherever the screen pointed, that’s where he’d go. And after all this time, they were only directed to another man named Malt, of which he had known nothing about.

Good and the great came to his head, it could be broken instead of paying some attention there and here and anywhere else. Not to be distracted and count less for what they were, but he knew a lot better than that. Not to spare any connection that might’ve been lost there. Or to nurture someone who might not care.

‘I’m listening, I think we’re far enough from them now. No one should be able to hear or see us here. And I don’t think we were followed either.’

‘Great, that should settle it.’

Came from inside the screen and as soon as it could be said, they claimed it. Every man that appeared on that small portable device started fitting themselves towards him. It had been earned so far, and every piece dragged itself past the hooves left on the ground.

‘Where are we headed?’

But that was yet to be communicated. A disparity between them continued upon his absense. For now it was unearned and unseen, watched between the belgium knots, he turned around and saw it, an abandoned factory that had no place here, outside, in the dusk. But this allure only drew him as he could not help it any longer.

‘I think we shall feel like its sight.’

We were alike, I knew it, the other me. He came out of the factory. Despite not knowing for the better judgement whatever could be told, I held the utmost content with my actions, reacting less, I would like to adress it before it leaped on me. ‘We found a way to meld and combine Mars with the Earth, and that way we shall manage to spread the atmosphere between the two of them.’

‘That’s mad, you’re no scientist, get out.’

‘Well, that would be a failure, wouldn’t it?’

‘How about the solar system becomes a, nah, that wouldn’t work.’

The truth was farther than it, as possible as it could be, as a matter of fact. As various planets started showing signs of becoming something which would resemble Acardiac twins, in which case most of them would suddenly share planetary umbilical cords as they’d begin deforming one another in the process. Thence the red planet became the red twin, both of them going on as to become as deformed as they could from within.

And they resembled humanoid Acardiac twins in all their beauty, sharing strange apperances that would be semi-aquatic and deformed. Even worse as they would miss their satellite heads while they develepod on.

The doctor stopped. All of them had been approached by a fully developed twin that came out of nowhere. After getting himself standing on the throngs on his twisted, bent, curved and conjoined knees, it smiled.

They were in-door. It was an abandoned facility or something similar it, unimposed by noise. Nothing worked in there, but that hadn’t in the least made anyone less paranoid about what went on. Only twelve people rested inside the room. Neither of them knew one another that well, but that didn’t matter as much. Simple as a bird being mocked by hard-pints, they were unaware of what each other wanted. Most of their inner thoughts were hidden and out of place.

Each of them had adopted a false name, in honor of someone they met. But so far not many of them knew a lot about one another. Hunger and thirst could not be imposed, let alone kill them for some reason of their own choice.

And they shall only be known as the twelve for now, as they prepared. Whatever the reason they were there for, someone was looking around. No one was or felt like the other and that was the least that could be said about them. Speaking in terms, not to make too sudden of a shift, no one danced. Such an odd thought, despite the lost track, what came after this? It was part of their evil.

They will decide what to do about the patricide of the greatest being that appeared amongst them. Peculiar as it may sound, they were about this place and everywhere surrounding it. Pleading with one another yet humble at the thought.

More importantly, they had been contained in here.

Largely, it had been the farthest thing from them, that could be gotten.

For there, above, in the dark forest resided Chivalry, charging through the the branches, through the darkest corners and the glanced-light. Pint of dark delights.

It appeared in one of the distant rooms.

Various plants had become pinned out of control. As a matter of fact, the company was there, checking them with their varied expertise.

‘These stalks aren’t supposed to be this tall. They feel as if we’re touching and handling ourselves. I cannot actually explain it here.’

He hadn’t the time to see it or to fully document it. But he pinned it down. It was as simple to quantify as possible. At the time when they had entered the room, they had observed the complete assimilation of everything in sight and everything around them, pots, plants, tables, ceiling fans, bells, various chemical containers, docks and other rotating devices. Most of them would constantly move back and forth still without being as much as disturbed as they were before. To claim it, so, taking one of the stalks that started growing on top of various placed templates of stools, they were fat and growing, expanding but slowly drawing in. Never had they reached their full forms or their full potential over the fact that they had started imploding slowly upon being approached.

Imagine a valve pushing steam inside a balloon, but have as many balloons pushing in from as many directions as possible, enclosing on an shrinking open space. Now that shrunk spot would have to act somewhat organic as if the air molecules were strangely plastic or made out of skin. As peculiar as that seemed, this was the thing that defined it, the brain-like format, the elliptic folds that wrapped around it, the region connected to the stalk and the stalk itself which wasn’t an extension but that very expanding organ which had been affected by even more popping spherical tendons that floated around. Most would be unseen, yet they would be unimaginable. They had to be slowly felt, and as one scientist approached, he felt his skin crawling. He could not hope to detest it even more than he felt it now. Despite everything that happened to him, it was said, it was done, the firmness of it rolled around his tongue and entered in. While hidden inside invisible packs of air, they had concealed themselves, that’s the reason for it happening this way. It was deranged, it was peculiar, expanding, hidden. Bubbles that concealed skin inside of them, made cuts and allowed the mass to transport from one side to another would allow the upper region of the stalk to replace one of the scientist’s bones. Slowly this would be delivered below into an inconsiderate amount of amoniac puddle-pressured stone torn. A place of fornication where everything was being made again and worn out.

Twenty feet away from him, he looked at a book of skin, wrapped around like a parchment, flat on every side yet slightly puffy. Nothing had even come close to affect its structural integriy. But the girt remained and it pushed inside his arm. It was not something to be seen but felt. None of the armed men that accompanied the researchers could even fathom what was inside of the room. The stalks were its visible life-liquid carriers. Because of them, so many weird insect-like fractured legs, which was an important detail, as from each fracture they started pushing into one another until they managed to made specific patterns that began driving into one and into the other, making bridges and long chain-like shapes, the mass of meat was being kept from falling on top of them while still being completely concealed. A head could be seen, even for a moment. Even though it was invisible and peculiar, even though it was mostly made out of the sticks that carried the meat out of the way, this was their mockery, their play, their peculiar act of taunting notions that had to move on.

Eyes could not be shaped and the head of the mechanic was there, in the air, floating, obscured, barely thinning out like the apparition of a ghost. The reason for it was the complete seal and the movement of the legs that had to go through it at all times in order to completely hold the system in place. If at any time they felt threatened by detection, they could dissapear out of the place and go away. After spending too much time in there, most of them had lost their limbs and organs. No humanoid could resist this out of the very fact that they were akin to a slow boiling frog, slowly being replaced instead of being given a face or leg to stand upon. And the strangulation only came outside, when the room had been abandoned and the bubbles popped. What remained after them was a mass of pulsating stalks made out of the pumping blood, the meat that imemediately took the shape of the door and the windows in order to get out, the many legs which freely moved inside and the various men that have joined it. Soon it would solidify out there in the open. It needed, ever-so desperately to open and spread its wings. Otherwise, it could survive, not in an enclosed space.

Despite the common similarity and asimilation of the human bodies, this damned thing was not red. All of the sudden it couldn't fathom the place and it began shouting before being released out of the way. The steam balloons only now came into action as they were slowly formed by the legs, in order to force and break the walls around them and break everything in their way. It was only this way that they managed to form a flat trunk while the human heads which pushed on its back started lending themselves death-maks, or molds in which they could hide. Deeper into the cubes they lay and rested. Many teeth protested yet shot ahead, they needed to stalk deeper and dig until they reached some of the smaller legs. As useful as they were, the problem was that they could only work on the oganic matter of the gums which instead affected the entire constitution of the head and the rims of the head-crown.

Deeper than the chest, what came to be, now, looked like the carving of a skeletal rib-cage, even more so that needed or shaped. It opened way for the sight of the legs and they formed gut-like drenches and depressions that had no place in there. As they revealed the empty baloon-formed missing spots in which they placed themselves in order to sleep. Many of them being completely encompassed in thin, intertwined skin nets that had tiny bubbles of bloted lice-like inflated suckers. The suckers came in a few important varieties. First one was one that resembled puckered circular lips. Many of them were only getting fatter as they were accumulating and dealing with the excess of organisms that were being homed inside its body. It could not be deleted here, for this was a problem. It was disgusting, disturbing and felt as if it needed a place to stay and rest. Overdone by the burden of too much organic material, the suckers started growing incisors. They were also growing small claw-graspers that pushed in. Another time of suckers only pushed in both directions until they formed empty cylindrical stacked long-fingers that were cut, then sewn together, forming jumping springs that couldn't help themselves but keep dripping. One could not fathom dealing with the type that imitated the human body in as tiny, twisted, compounded place as it were in.

Many of the suckers started appearing on the outside as well, in order to deal with the organisms and fight against them. It got worse as it finally smashed through a wall. By then, the entirety of the form had looked as if it had the body of a hardened mole that was a charging narval or an aerodynamic plane. From the pain and the hurt it had endured, the outer skin had been lost to the mass of legs that carried the suckers out until the ship-creature looked infected. Way too many of them started breeding and mixing until they formed various slow-pumping lumps that pushed one another on the side.

It drowned the holding of its prison and finally got out. For a change of pace, this was anything but liked. From inside a room he only bubonic appearance the walls had began drawing to the ape-of prime, in which sense, their tiny hairs became encompassed in the creature as soon as it came into contact with them. The departure had been made this much easier than it should've been. A chrysalis of suckers started protruding from the back.

As soon as a main head had been given form, its cephalic index had measured something of at least eight hundred fifty five centimeters, giving a robust open mouth that threw all of its forming cylindrical teeth into a pandemonium of spear-trains if seen from below. Well formed, the thought crumbled as soon as they stared at the desecration it had achieved below. The men entered, a new team of researchers attempted to set contact with it. Large handles, turbines that were sprouting cylindrical fire extenders. They would scorch everything in sight to make sure nothing survived. Looking around, the first sight had been that of a giant, wasted mammal, or so it seemed. Since it hid its rear-heads they couldn't even get close to realising what was going on there.

'Confirmation, I need a confirmation here. Was there another team before us?'

'I see. Colonel, I think our best course of action would have to be. Immediate exposure to our immaterial protons, we have to drown them in protons.'

The fire appears to be largely ineffective.'

Neither patch of the pest got removed by any means. As a matter of fact, they appeared to be largely taking a liking to the heat, to the point where they had grown a few shroom-heads instead. They were too much like in many ways, seen from a distorted way that did not apply to them. It felt like they were crushing their children with each step, and for the reason Payton Block couldn't explain it. Block was in charge of the second operation. But he knew better, this was no infestation, infection or yeast-like spread. It was only a manifestation it wanted them to see. The unity of scum, he wanted to mess with them. He made it all so clear that they could not get away. And for that reason, he bent down and did something which shocked the others. After taking a clear breather, with his mask off, he took one of the shroom-tops and ate it. It wasn't the perfected reaction he expected or wanted to hear from them.

There was a satisfaction there, taken from the fact that he had gotten this far. He saw it then. They were the infectors, the cockroaches and the vermin coming in. Compared with them, there was nothing that could be drowned from the warranting of the wholesome fills. By that he was the only one noticing them.

Large, almost fat, kneeling cranes that had only large trunks coming out of their splinted bodies, dripping on the various suckers as they attempted to fill them entirely. He approached. He saw an entry to this system of theirs, bobbed his neck backward and opened his throat. It was only then that he was fed, slowly and cautiously. It was only coming to him here and now and his feet were getting too hard to keep straight and prevent from becoming a jelly. The part of the ground he had been reclined against appeared to have turned into a melted shrine upon which he had been placed against. Yet the other man saw that he had become a part of this whole room, realising that he couldn't be spared from it. He saw something, heard it, wasted no time into interpreting in.

After everyone else lowered their weapons, he turned around, as a receptor would. He crushed the part of his forehead from which an ancient signal-adaptor came and through it, though it looked like an antique, he passed on the message to them.

'The dead lamb shall not be reached. Care thee of the dead lamb, as it will never be reached by man-impure.

Instead you owe us servitude.'

Farther amongst the body, tainted, the rooted spear and the chalked long tormented tower, Agamemnon was aware. He basked in his own glory, he waited for defeat. He somehow realised now, of all, that he had been cheated out of it.

'But what is that thing? What is that thine? A liver-kettle and dead sheep, but who would dare defy us and hide it from where we weep?'

No echo would no, no activity, the vile, and yet no one could count on it and try to turn the engines down. A power and might, delighted by the towers, the turns and the uncanny, many woes and bitter woes spilled themselves on coffee grounds. 'No yet master, hold your tongue.'

His decrepit teeth rolled like piano keys that were rotted by turpentine. He drooled through those bars, revealing a pair of fornicated tongues.

A highly tormented beaten face, that had been boiled in acid and fenced with a battering hammer, attached to a mettalic spire with its metal bricks twited around vertically, evolving in rims and blade like ridges. It floated above the ground and stood atop a marble floor that was darkened. Facing the distant castle, it wasted no second and looked at Charles. After a moment's respite, he only grinned knowing what would happen.

But it's not here, it's not here, they had lost themselves near the watch, after slipping away, he had lost Alan and thought himself unable to call back to the old times. It only drew morosely after, the whailings of the past inquired something out of him.

'Rats, I missed it again.'

Another aura of the sun shot out behind the castle. Behind the rims of its shadow the world faded. Plainly said, he walked along. There were other reasons as well. Torment-lookers, it's the best he could call them. Others like him came. Always, and always, they seemed to share one appearance. Metallic bodies that sometimes were rimed and spiked and had almost human like decay-faces. Charles could see no neck, nor had he cared about inquiring about it. He only did what he was told, always looking in either direction, then asking for something out of it. Any reaction, he could only do it so.

'Feed him after the kin.'

He was brought only a few walking turkey legs to take from the other desks. In there, at least twenty yearnings, twenty yearly flat blobs of skull-skin gunt trenches pushed out of in order to be eaten. And eaten they were.

'I think we're going to have ourselves a dear-night, nightly-night and the upper-night around the peril.'

Desperate or not, they brought only this in stare, it was unfair. No one went anywhere and soon they were all surrounded, waiting.

'I'll smash you.'

He said and prepared, with his fists pushing through but breaking on contact, as they fell just about everywhere they could land into. Plainly, it could be spoken loud. He lost his conscience, almost but found a way to get around it. Sleights of bleedings, slithering back, he couldn't be heart as he arrived where he needed to be at.

'Where am I being taken then?'

'You need to see him, there, towards his hall, you shall be set against him and see what's about to happen.'

They spoke only of the most disgusting of beings, that upon which they felt they could see nor feel any zeal when met against. And the zones they entered were rough, way too rough for the touch, darkly colored and hued, widely enacted into the most peculiar ways, as if the entire land was a construction field that grew out of it, while pushing in. A kind of mild desperation continued on a whim. He could only be as perilous as he could show it to the tin people around him. He had spared nothing any longer.

If there was another way to put it wildly, to have it yelled at strongly, it drew way too near. In as much as it would be, they saw only this agony. Spare of needles, cut and dry, the daft ones coming by. A promulgation, damned by the minute, calling.

'There needed to be a way in without me losing my courage and my being.'

As every stepped progress his thought, he couldn't face the fact that by the time he reached the castle he would be just like them. And there was only one way he could tell it, which was looking at the oil puddles in the weirdly concave-like debatuchery vision he'd be forced against. They fought there, all around, constantly in violence, drowning the loud shouts of the body-stalks of men that came from inside of them. Reach the mad sun in the surroundings discs. But no ivory lords waited in the whim of the fall. Most have been taken and killed plainly as much as one hermit would come with a needle-whip and strangle them in rows. An executioner would make a shrine out of them and launch a floating scepter with their heads on them, as the falling of a floating perilous filth blowing star gave birth to the surroundings. More of them fell and yet came back as almost semi-blots, clots and other humanoid remains that gathered around and floated into large puffs, dusts and mice. Particles that emerged in their sub-human goliath fighters, kept in cages.

Amused by the Torment-lookers, they would occasionally be tortured for no other reason than that of a desire for a mild satisfaction. 'Gluttenous tract, this is what they need out of him.'

And twenty more going in line, wretched and deformed, performing pantomime for one another, as they jested with the corks. Screws entered their placed bulls. Pulled backwardly into the school of stray, the paint they spread along remained.

'I see that you would reside there rather than face me in my own house.'

'But you need to enter the Residence.'

'I tired relentlessly, time after time, they heard thine and thrices, the voices that came soon after but never receded until they went away.'

Both of the parties present bashed each other's heads against the wall. First of them came to be, a chrysalis frozen solid. It was well wish-for and worn out.

'Take at least one of the right turns and enter the house, trust me. Ignore the dead people around you.'

Charming stranger, that he was, he came along. Kind of ruddy on the clothes, but he dragged a plane-wing around him, his cross to bear he said. Take that hint, he thought, don't go inside, bad things happen if you do.

'Don't act like I haven't warned you.'

Yellow teeth around a long face, untrustworthy fellow, he looked like the scruff of a cigar. It entered his mind, it crossed it then left, he was burned, a bum, walking on sticks. There and around and there-around. Perhaps he should've looked first. Before he had the chance to make his mind account for it, he fell, hard, as a lump of coal in a pit of clouds.

'We have to go, shouldn't we?'

Sicilian hare

'Ring ring, ring the bells now.'

Another container was spoiled before the coffer, in the absence of a director that would take the emotions and deal with the stoppings, he reeked of the faces that fell out of the train compartment. Most of the citizens died. Some of them survived in worse conditions and had been used to satisfy only the darkest types of hungers that were known to mankind. A plasma-like encompassing, devouring it aghast. Pruned through the makings of a cantor, the man had a heart for people who disobeyed.

‘We have to bare through and fight the comings and short endings of a blaster world that doesn’t want us alive. What shall we do now? I see that a piece of an asteroid-crier fell and broke a piece through our building, whereas they might not see the difference or hear about it now, I see hope in what they seek to conquer and I shall see it after it.’

‘Shut your mouth, my dear mongrel, I need to think. There’s no other space like this we could find ourselves in. I think we ought to search the moons. If we can land on them, somehow, or some place, we might find that which has no face. What do you think of it?’

‘We shall adress the court.’

In the wake of it now, they presented themselves from the back-stage, in front of them in the apparition of a red-like reddened blue cave of opal-whitened stones. It came to them only then that this strange behavior was instilled into them. They could not do it on their own. Bred for a single breath, they spared no second, now were dead.

‘I think we ought to separate the sea.’

‘But there’s no sea around here, only space.’

‘Who shall we kill them?’

No murder and no mind, it couldn’t be but life was lost and yet benign.

But all that power that started pushing and making the blood boil only needed to manifest once and only once in order to create the strongest entity like strength-peril that could ever embolden a man. That came in the form of a single man who swam through the sea of Greece to the bay of Sicily on his own. And he alone had been enraged by it, not only so, but he had his muscle get through a change that almost broke everything in the path which was sought.

It was so easy pushing others out of the way through the manifestation of that star-puncher that rounded all the bodies around the planet at he kept powering through them.

And as soon as he came on the stone-floor he shouted:

‘Di’Dorko, Glaucoma Di’Dorko, I have finally arrive upon your land and into your home with the supreme intention of ending you and your family before you could move on and take over the rest of Sicily.’

It was his intention to make it as fair as possible, as the man’s honor was at stake. But that was not all, as he felt something he couldn’t explain over a long period of time, blasted thing and all. It pushed through his burning chest as the prowess continued.

First of the few hare-hunters surrounded him. Neither of them belonged around the place, but he knew that they could somehow do it regardless of what he thought would be fair. And for that reason, something would start there, not as much as it would be allowed by the pioneers of knuckles but by the watcher that started drawing on.

‘What are you looking at?’

Luckily he spoke sicilian and managed to garner a reaction from just about everyone around. There would be no waste, not for now, little by little taken around them.

‘I’m giving you a chance to keep your lives and keep it to yourselves that I have come here.’

From what he could tell, most of the villagers from the surrounding areas were not affiliated with the Di’Dorkos, as they only peered in by honest glance. He could by simply looking at them that they were simple men and women who wanted to have nothing to do with anything happening here. Simple, neutral and peasant-like, creeping away from outta the light of a passing dawn.

‘We’ll take you in, come with us to the hare-garden.’ Whence the spoils of the hunt waited for the daring, it would be a show of disquiet and one of pain, if he had challenged their authority, nothing of the blessings he had received would remain with him. Hence, knowing the better, he wasn’t bitter about being captured and complied. It wouldn’t do, for now, to resist and make too much noise here. That and there were only the three of them who couldn’t even give him much trouble.

Overconfident and smiling, he filed a single shot at them, then moved.

Onto the hare-garden they leered on and from the looks of their impaled bodies, which rose as if from the dead, you could see their near human-like appereance and know that something was off them. It couldn’t be, yet he knew. Off and onto his way, he felt that power now barge from inside of him until he couldn’t control it any longer and chose to obey it. First of all, not to startle the armed men, he poined at one of the rising hares, from their bushy, almost chrome-colored trails and started crunching their skulss with simple touches. They simply phased through them.

Looking back from behind, they realised he hadn’t punched them at all, but with a simple speed, he had gently, almost calmly prodded into them, rewiring their brains until they had been brainwashed to do what he wanted instead. Such power could not be contrived by him. Posses the hares had grown their brains as any human mucle would, until they shot it at hemselves, killing one another in mighty drones, around the crown of their home.

‘How did you manage to do that? I’ve never seen such a peculiar thing happen on the coast.’

They were much closer to it that before. Every time something important happened, the land would suffle itself out of pain. Some of the methods of interrogation he was using them were unconventional. At least that’s what he himself thought, as it happened for them to be turned around and lose their advantage as soon as they entered the house. All was clear for the time being, until one would wretch. There, a lot, and plunder they were caught and tied to their chairs. All of their rifles were drowned and lost, thrown around in the peculiar bodies of the hares that got in. Mostly it was the anger, the apperance and least of all, they concured. Stopping with something in the least, or for the uncanny, unpleasant, speaking of no intention to bring him down or even harm him as they came around and found out what they were after.

‘We only wanted to invite you in for a cup of tea, nothing more. We didn’t know who you were, Argus, I mean, we didn’t even know what to do with you once you were caught.’

‘So you did plan to catch me then?’

‘Only for a short time until he...’

Arrived, he could think of no one else but the strange rival, the only man he could look back to and wonder how had he gotten to him. As a matter of time he would descend out of this building and make it out, alone this time. But not until he heard more of it from them, shaking with thirst and not even contemplating a thing, he gently rubbed one of their arms, ripping its upper-chest area and arm. Argus drank from them, it was tainted and sweet. Uncanny that he would be drowned by either feet or by the blood that was rushing through each of their heads. A middle aged Sicilian man would die in about twenty set minutes after being completely exposed in such a way. A man like him would last days, even after being thrown and impaled by one of the strange horns he kept spearing the wall.

‘This is a great start, isn’t it? I would’ve preferred it if it didn’t happen that way. But now I suppose I have no other option but to carry on with it, shouldn’t I?’

‘I haven’t paid my dues. I’m sorry for it, but we’re not connected with him.’

He refused to speak the name of Glaucoma and as he drew in closer to his neck, he pulled a single tooth out of it which immediately blew out of his chest. His heart had been connected by a single trail, almost like a string that had a few teeth lined and going through it. Pleased by this, he spared no moment. Calling to himself, he went on knowing he killed the first man in Sicily.

Only when he was completely done with it had he started working on the other two, slowly and across the right. Not only had they been pulled aside but the torture stopped abruptly. They enjoyed it, almost in a degenerate hedonistic way. Sparing himself not a second, he painted them with crimson-water. Then he ate them soon after, forbidding himself to go to sleep. Most of the hares would stalk and talk to him instead of them.

‘I’m listening, make it good, or I shall rewire all of you in such a way that you’ll all start leaping to one another until you’re all dead.’

‘Don’t get all aggressive to us, will you? I don’t think you should count of it, not this way. I think you ought to measure yourself with only the most bobbling fruit-tanks in the bank. Those should keep you strong.’

Argus checked for it, despite being as clumsily worn as he was. It felt unlike him, in a way, to listen to such precarious yet seriously weird characters, especially since they inspired no confidence and no way in him through which he might even get close to understanding what was going on. He also had this, strange and equatorial pain that came at the back of a mosquito ball that made a lot of noise as they veered all of their heads, their long lashes, million legs and tens of wings at him. Stung as he were, several times, he had not taken a single day out. Unless he wanted more. He ate something from the fruit barrel and came back for more.

‘You weren’t wrong about it. These berries aren’t that bad.’

‘See? We wouldn’t give you any kind of false advice now, would we? It’s only a matter of, how to say. Forming a friendship, is it not? Between all of us and you, Argus, I think we can safely say that you’re anything but like them, you’re of a different lot, a different man at that, someone who might come around.’

‘Say it then, get to it. Tell me what do you want, hares?’

I know that look in your dead eyes, I’ve seen in plenty of men and most of them weren’t even dead to begin with.’

‘We want this ranch for ourselves, nothing more and nothing less. What’s ours shall be ours and what’s yours? That should be the mansion you are after.’

‘Don’t you dare mutter his name!’

‘Glaucoma Di’Dorko, we know you’re after him now. How else could we have guessed about your hidden intentions if it weren’t for us to snoop around? We know about him and we know about you as well.

We have been scouring the place for too long a while to give up now. We have been planning an assassination for months now and with that said, the plains of Sicily and the depths, the holes and the pits under ground are all filled with our troops, in waiting. We shall kill Di’Dorko as soon as we can get our hands on him.

And if you aid us in that case, then you shall be given his mansion, instead of whatever you could get yourself after a battle with him. We are also aware that such a battle with him could not result into you making it alive. Unfortunately, nothing could be said about it, other than this.

We shall aid you in whichever way we can.’

‘But I haven’t even considered it yet, have I? The news is dire and I can’t even fathom a Sicily that’s under your control.’

Every step he’d taken there could’ve been theirs and their alone. He had no way of knowing exactly how he could react at it, or, rather, what might happen, what might be? Whatever he saw fit would be this, he would have to be weary of their influence for now. In whichever way he looked forth and never listened, there was this. A piece of his mind was thrown around and given forth.

Too tired to think it through, there was another consideration, of how many hares there were in total. Just this consideration took too much. Dead eyes reached their eyes as they were so dead that they became human-like. It was an uncanny sight that he did not understand.

Overly saturated with peace, he asked them to quiet down while in thought, as most of the night would be somewhat, strangely spent seeking his way out of it, without a single deranged activity making him place himself away from the bed. In a state of half-awakening and strange preaching to the closed ribs, he looked at the shack and how the bones grew in.

A giant hare body would be made there, someday at least. It would not be today, it would not be tomorrow but at least he knew that one of the days it was to come.

To be more specific, they only started reciting their strange hare-religion as he went into the lucid deep sleep, whereas reality became erratically surreal, he had seen them walk like men. And they were still bearing their small bodies on top of the chopped heads of the mena they had stolen the bodies from. Kidnapped in dream, they had been there for hours, walking and handling the man he had repelled. Lives were taken and hidden from him, but he could see their rise and the fall as soon as he could tell it.

‘There, on top of the sea-mountains, where winds become as hard as particles of patricide, rests Glaucoma’s mansion. Near it you shall find yourself, breed with it and find peace at last.’

But he hadn’t taken the meaning yet. He was unaware of its inner-most hidden chambers where they hid the feet of women, bidden by one of the servants of Di’Dorko. Farther than the sight, he saw a civil war coming after that. Hares becoming living mines and blowing through the blood splattering bowels that imploded in the sight of men. A nasty drop in population. During that night, he was convinced that he would fail to keep it all together, for more than it could be expressed. Workers around the windmill field had been busying themselves for hours trying to pick the wings and the mills out of the ground, but in later days they stopped their constant struggle in order to look down at themselves; callouses appeared where they ought not to be, as they came out as being stove-headed and less instinctive, largely collected on the side. Sore appeared on their fur, and after popping they started disappearing from the largely exposed bodies they left behind. Blisters started spreading on the mills, their wheels stopped spinning, wings expanded, the rocky roots stopped furthering below. Thence came the dreadful hares, whose bodies grew along wherever they went. And they were just as deathless staring, never swaying one another to look out. Never paying to look drowned.

At some distant place down Riesi.

Twenty minutes ago, a man had been shot on the street. Someone took a broad butcher knife and formed a spear out of a long road sign. After chopping him and a piece of the street, he broke one of the windows and entered the first house he came into contact with. Vile man, that he was, he had already melted half of his brain with a concentration of sulphuric acid and filth-scum oil. His eye gravitated towards the missing lobe. It was a milestone of imploding skin-poles forming his neck. All around it, large veins were seen to carry big and robust eye-olives.

First, a woman hadn’t noticed it. Mirande was merely drinking her car in a coffee cup. Most of it had been melted with a piece of her arm which went missing.

Pure rage infested his blood. Dirto pressed forth.

She was almost done there, but it needed to be stated.

‘I don’t think I enjoy anything more in this world other than animal torture.’

Nonchalantly as well.

It was way too complicated. Fingers twisted and largely elated she turned. Black-heads popping out her nose, but Mirande had a good run. Her face torsion soon came off and before she could make it to the door, she had her fingers ripped out.

Plainly speaking, it was raining snow-dreams in a summer-ever. Mirande hadn't spoken to her daughter in way too many days and she was sad.

'Will you sit with me for some time now?'

'Sure.'

There wasn't any coffee table in the whole of Sicily. But they did it anyway, on the floor, a strange carpet rested underneath them. It was hot enough to sip but neither of them complained much. Not after this long a time.

'It's rains like this once in a while, doesn't it?'

She smiled. It was cold, but the rain kept a drench flowing. Her eyes pleaded, she knew.

Both of them kept their distance and never touched the hot cups. It cracked a little. He was already a step out before landing. Neither of the drinks gone.

'I need to make another stop, so you may as well stop following me around, do you hear?'

Imbued by a scum-pose, he stared at the plain window, wiping off his spear. Nearing the bus-station, he got in while hiding the butcher's blade inside his coat. He was nearing the madness his brother felt in the past. He had an earlier feud he had to resolve down the cast of the makings, iron rails being canonically strawn around his neck. It was less obvious now than before, how many men had emerged and watched his every action. Time had an act in it as well. Perhaps it was the reason for his mind being pushed into the process of deteriorating for so long. Later in the passing of the day, he returned to his family and decided that he would start everything again much later. For now he only had to think of it from this point. Largely, it was a measure of his worth, going back to his abandoned home. A motherly value lay to the woman that had been pinned inside the bedroom-plain chestnut screen, with the torn-twisted giant nails that pushed into her chest being nothing else but the improbable reason for his father's absense. He was just about in every corner of the house, cut so many time that they were only wasting away as they were wispering out of their many malformed-mouths. None of them could even go as close as if to know who was listening and who was trying to get on with it. Little than it was needed, there, their teeth, or at least those who were so closely torn and twisted inside their beady-mouths and curved lips upon which puffy-nature they bounced themselves off, came the talk. Mostly it was the impossibility of trying to survive through so many events that never paid off to look back into.

It pushed out of itself and grew lumps. Some of them curled while the others only turned into the most inappropriate things they could ever become. Larely flat, pushing out and strangely concave until the point where they were so long and drawing that they reached each other at the base of the entire ceiling. Mostly, as it were known, they formed the perfect diagram of an underground basin which housed the ever-present body of mass that belonged to a cadaverous evolution that had been completely scanned through the gravel. Seen from every angle, it would form only a giant flat man that had been pushed around at every corner and made as if to blow himself around the curving of long needle-like pores. All of which would be separated and thrown around, twenty or forty centimeters from one another until they couldn't be removed. And they bred like tiny pouches, living in laps made out of bacteria and filthy scents. Most of them of them were domesticated in the ways of filth. It was dragging, how they spared not a single share of what was going down inside the house.

The father was had become the father of all. Most of the room had been only warranted as a way for him to become a servant of diseased-hatred carried mucus-pollen blotches. Rounded and made in the same image of living tumors, all of which carried on to form the directive and the sounded watch-like patch-like syndroms around every moving cathedral that surrounded the house, they started spreading elsewhere, but never came around themselves. It took some time, just to be sure about it. No one wanted to get outside no longer because of him, a mere man whose influence only dragged him away. It was impossible to even hope to create a dirtier space in his head, it created too many dark thought, keeping them around. But they grew like fat neurons that pushed his fragmented head even father out. A brain like his wouldn't even look human at this point in time, for the sole reason that it had rooted itself in the hotel-like chamber, the disaster of a mess it were.

And Dirto never came to the same senses he had come into before, out of the pleasant conversation he had with his mother, he saw and noticed the fact that his mother had already pulled his eyes out. It was a degenerate act, taken by eye-sight. A lack of light only came faster by him, and at once he thought about asking for more. More details would come eventually unless met thrice. About the same area they started creeping out of this place. Eventually, as if he cared, he'd think of something anywhere.

'Tell me of your day when you're liable to say it.'

Valiciano was his younger brother, a thing that had his chest rauncy, wide as if a widened hammer-desk, pushin his erect upper body region to the look of a weirly strawn eight-headed, sixteen winged bat, which only reflected upon his every arm that came about and started moving. He took his well time and extended all of them. Now he had been so close to him that there was no way to escale. Despite the lower lack of a body, he was part of this room as well. A cage-arm had been formed around. There would be no scape now. Valiciano asked him again.

'I won't give you another chance, Dirto, tell me what I want to know. I've spent too much time in here and I don't think I'll be able to take it again. I fear something might happen to me with the occasional catches, don't you think?'

Fingers felt, mostly too obscurely found around places that were unrelated to anything he had ever come close to. Only now had he come to feel pain, bleeding out of his nose. His spear was still outside and had not even touched a side of a vital. In his pocket, he hid the butcher's knife. With that in mind, his one and only chance was this, he could do it. Closely, his brother observed. It was his drivel, he wanted to take into account before doing it. That would only count for so much now. Closely seen, the meat-stove started boiling his fasting sister's intestines, but their highly acidic function started breeding the flying prime-fathers, which looked as well as he had. Plain and simple as his mind was driven to a fruit-fly, he saw the future in his gaze. Despite his lost eyes not being connected to his face, he still saw it. An empire and an inviolable colony of fruit flies would take over the appartment, his wife and over his family, breeding off them. What had largely been the reason for it was this, the dried peace of fruit they were on, a rotten pile that carried on to shove them over, thrown around.

‘This is what you drove me to, I can only hope that you’re proud of yourself and of your soul.’

He saw no reason to speak of it now, nor to say a thing which may bring the uncanny out of him without a good reason. Being approached by this sudden urge of dread, he pulled the butcher’s blade and pointed at his throat, ripping something out of it by the second. He could not have painted himself a bitter image than that. It was a hardly felt by his brother then, not until what came out of Dirto finally spilled in the bruises he had accumulated on his hands after the uncounted days and nights spent trying to scratch through the walls. After their blood connected, finally and only now had he come close to actually drinking some of his countenance and counterfeit personality, he had become a thinker. In the worst of time, he wept for his brother as his prison of arms turned from that locked position and started caressing his fallen kin.

‘I should have listened to you, I should’ve stopped you from falling into this pit of depression. How could this have happened to my dreadful being, to the countenance and the lack of a pitiful thing I was to you in life.’

Better days were yet to be recalled. For he had spent many of them in this room making sure that his brother knew the best meaning of punishment and resentment. Both he and his fiend of a cat would be locked together and allowed no food nor water for two days at a time, then they’d be fed, other times they would both lay awaiting death, never knowing when he’d pull the plug. And the room was in another room, a smaller cage-like formation of many walls that had been strung together out of some plaster that was completely made out of sharp-turnil, the body of a blood-sewing desperate thin man, which crushed his spine into the dell. He who walked here brought a brother. Many of them bashed their minds inside each other. Thence his brother and the cat, after the life-support was attached, and neither parent questioned what happened here. No satisfaction could near this level of pain that he had shown receiving over and over again, until he was satisfied. Dirto would walk again.

‘I’m chopping both of your legs for now, crawl!’

He ordered him, with nothing but the whim of a man who could not take it any longer. He had been indisposed for the longest manner. Lurking around him, they were trying to approach a consent. What was he doing there? After two legs had been ripped out, it appeared that he had come out of both of them, as a three-domed shamanistic circle, trying to recall what was going on before. Prior to this, he remembered them warning inside his tiny box.

‘Wait for it and when he’s not looking, allowed your other selves to eat his legs off instead. You’ll take over his body and grow in his lap before he knows it.’

Thence he leaped with bitter lips being bared off. It was the strange-strangulation that kept him from falling apart. This strange little man was gone and instead of him, Dirto came to a consensus. I will end my kin in this house and no legacy of mine shall remain the same as theirs shall. It was mostly hard felt the fall continued. Dirto had lost his life but the room remained. It wasn’t so but it should’ve been so. He was there in a wheelchair-mandible thron-machine that was constantly splitting him in half then reattaching him all together, revealing that whatever happened to the humanoid organs inside of him was only a mild problem since they had become a mucus-like build that kept him together. And with pull and drag to each side, he would feel himself slowly be curled into the basin below him. Everything was systematic there, as a bridge citadel that was seen from below, this entire structure that kept this motion of making and breaking him being reversed for no reason whatsoever as he was pushed deeper into earth. A slim voice came to his mind.

‘Escape, my son.’

A hole was made into the protruding citadel. Still broken in half with the giant machine stuck on his back he met them. Two rangers- faces strung on their bows, facing him with their eighteen winged arms at the back, legless but unfortunate enough to have their bodies reverse solidly as Jacks of spades. They stood there, preparing, loading their long teeth-anchored sun-palletes, darts which seemed to hold the entirety of space. Funnels made out of interstellar clouds of melting hydrogen, and deformed abstractions of eyes. Smiling they approached. A single shot managed to pull him forth. The citadel broke immediately and emerged out of his childhood house in Sicily, merging itself with everyone in the house.

Standing in the geode-like room, they fumbled. It was unnerving trying to get his attention and lunge after him.

‘What do you want of us?’

‘Calm down, I’m only here, for long.’

Split again, he took his time before attempting to speak. His legs melted and knelt because of the heaviness which pushed him farther in. Though they were dancer in their respective maddening forms, they only settled with each other momentarily as they dragged on to the other room. First door closed. A moment was taken, just to see and confirm it. Dinto’s father was in every corner as well. It came to him only now that he had bled so far that his father might’ve inherited a piece of his personality but not his eyes. A damned final solution had to be taken. Considering the fact that he would be tormented for eternity if left this way, he made his choice.

Drowning through this conventional way, he ensued a threat that would quickly be recognised. Deadly in the muscle, he blinded himself like a cripple with a mammoth-ark, a circular moon that entered one side of his face then left the other, forming a tiny rotation that never stopped. The ark would split in half as well, and thence he would enter despair.

‘Walk me through one of the fields, I want to feel the boils that might bring in the peace.’

A seething thing, a bloody goblet had been brought to him. His jailors were mightily repressed, their sores only made their face-nodes start inflating. In the midst of a vile-creation, they waned.

‘You needn’t follow us no longer, we were ordered to make sure you won’t cut through the end of breathe, need I say there are drier consequences for you if you live?’

‘And what would be the point of asking? You, who are masked and don’t belong on the planes of Sicily, you who would end all conflict only to put us onto your spots, would you happen to govern us?’

The emptiness could not be addressed. Not because of vowels causing wild internal hemorrhage sessions but rivers beneath them that started swelling as they made their way through the access. Where they stored their hatcheries, in which the men of Ark, the mammoth-strong, those hairy brutes and evil bodied, anatomically-wrong and the deformed wasted no time to breed their better kin.

‘Bow down to your betters, bow down to your betters!’

Came the chant, bouncing against the walls until they could do it no longer after that, it might just be, that they could see, nothing but the slightest filth crossing their minds in peace. It was a forlorn decider, maker of blood, which was being trafficked with the young ones. Traded by the trims they beggotten to the factories, the flying empress-chasters, the disciples of clot. All of them did not know what to expect coming out. Small caves, tormented caverns, termite-like patterns and yet not a single man could remain in the same vein as his king. He who’d dwell would be changed. Farther than he ended, he could not know what his legacy would yearn. Of this ruse they considered fading, making small cuts, see the patterns of bone become butterflies of skin and chatter. Taking out their teeth soon after, only to disappear and disintegrate in this air, farther than they could take in whatever wasn’t theirs.

‘Let them go as soon as you can. We cannot confine them.’

Said one of the mad crooks, the Raven-shook and the other lout, nasty-frenzy called them back, into the pit from where they wormed their way out. In the crest of their cradling bed, they made sure no one had yet come to realise what they had stolen, the emotion being other-swollen. Wondering where they might lead, they were consternated with the pleasing disease of numbness. Mind-taken, blindly-mistaken.

‘Set forth, or I shall decide that we shall dine together on sharp-rock and loosen our teeth until our gums become like melting yolks.’

‘What of the whites then? Shall they not be something akin the folk? Thine desire runs dry. I see that you can only seek a way out if you know your surroundings.’

It shall be spread around. Not for long. Matthew found himself falling off one of the distant cliffs that had arrived at the mid-cross region that separated the access of the gran canyon formed over the village of Reumino and the crossing of the lower regions that lead to the citadel weld. Their distinct region had been mishapen and dragged down, slowly succumbing to the great weight that was being produced out of thin air without reason or known shroud. Plain as it would be, they simply took it. His misfortune was their gain, it would be applauded if it were presented on a stage.

A foreigner in Scility, cracking open his skull and nose, getting up only to be taken by the loud and crushed. Slowly taken by the reins until he could not do it any longer, an access of the lower back region revealed a single flaw, domesticated into them before they could be drawn from afar. A small creature had resided in his skull, having replaced the entirety of his brain. This Obsidian creature never got the chance to grow, as its roots had still been implanted into the man’s spine before his knowledge had been complete and retained. Slowly, he pulled and sipped on it, the lout remained and contemplated of a no better thing than the taste of this woman-like beast. Cowardly as it were, as the creature it acted like pushed away, had it known it sooner, there might’ve been a chance to get away. But this was too much and no ultra-san could embody the struggle it proceeded getting through.

With each pass, a side of the skull peeled off, with flakes falling, drowning and getting off the way. See from above, you might see two eye-like shapes being completely melted through the first two weak hands tried getting through. Two long segmented fingers remained as the other had already shrunk and started being drawn in with the mass that the loud was eating. It pleaded for its life in an unknown tongue he had no idea and no intention of understanding. Less than it should be, more than impactful, the body struggled, Matthew fell apart. More men joined him as they fell after that.

First the loud, with the giant pear-shape, leglessness rolled. He could only grab something while eating or chuck his entirety whole. Forwards, as it came to him, he couldn't hope to draw attention. At least, from what it'd be seen, there was only one direction in the taking, a loathsome fall, the bodies piled as soon and soon, through them he had carried the most primitive insult evolution could dictate in his unnatural mutation. He felt his primate ancestors draw near, bearing the time before he had been bread this way, in the times he had almost resembled the body-art that the modern human was, his jaws faded and they spilled like a basin of fish being fully released from a net on an old sailor's boat. This sight had been amplified by the divinity of the fading intestines that crawled out of the jaws, most of them being almost diamond-like hardened and very much growing until they hatched younglings of their own.

'Mad, mad, this a mad obsession. If we do not stop it here, we shall be completely lost, both in body and in soul. You know this cannot happen unless we push it through. We need to hang them, kill them, whatever might happen if we could get through them.'

As if they spoke, as if the rope, it didn't matter, there was no hope. As soon as the loud started drawing their guts out, their hidden creatures taken with them, at that, he had become morose. Unable to think of anything else but the mad loss, barred songs, he contemplated. Sight, sight of the divine, he had been enveloped in it as his body had almost become as pruned as an ancient body, somehow well preserved. Not akin those which were life-like but those who had at least managed to prevent themselves from completely decaying and lose no limb. It couldn't be the lack of a satisfaction now.

His eyes shone with a golden light which threw out of his, pure divinity being spilled. It hurt and he shouted, hosting no resentment to his lost brothers who did nothing else but laugh and be inconsidered of the peril they all were in.

'Can you no see what's happening to me? Can you not feel it in the least? If I were to tell you of the beasts I see, in distant plains, all of them would remain with you in the veins of the lost.'

We have to escape from this place before they come back.'

'But are we not beasts of our own, you loud? What kind of primitive cowardly creature are you that you'd even fear another beast that comes after?'

'Listen you imbecile, you cannot fathom what I'm seeing there. Unlike us, they're made out of pure glowing air, they can't be stopped nor looked at without pain. And they are us, after the making, they heed our bodies in the making.'

They want possession and want to blow, they want to stop existing just as we hid away and try to grow.'

‘But we are immortal and we cannot be destroyed. You lout know nothing of it and only appeared to have lost your mind.’

Completely ignored, they feared nothing and no one, least of all, some peculiar vision done by one in perilous pain. He couldn’t submit to it, nor try making something out of the pain. A vileness like that could not be met. A defect in his mental knowing, rowing through the masses, scum and molasses, plaster for the taking, stopped, they couldn’t fathom knowing what was going on. In their way, they swallowed the remained and loomed around the giant body of a morsel-like intruder who had arrived here way before them. Double-headed on each head, he rested on a giant volcanic rock-plate that was completely formed out of machine and devices that leaped around and started making the long-forlorn preparations for his revival. An action in the making, dread coming from below, they went back from where they came and hid before he awakened.

One of its giant heads were already infested with the hare-disease, though part organic, part inorganic, it could only be pushed so far.

It was this recession which got him in trouble in the first place. An elevated plate-parlay pulled him down, only a few meters, to a place where he couldn’t be touched or approached. He was repartitioned by them, mad socialites filled with the most unnatural looks you could possibly find on them. He would be scoured for hours at that without any possible explanation, awaiting for him to appear. Thence he came, rounded as a wreckage would, enver being able to move as he should. It got much worse, for that reason, Dirtio would have to meet his brother eventually before this peculiar citadel collapsed.

Too fast of a snap and he was out cold again. Argus only came to his senses when he was there, standing whilst the wonder came to him. A source of inspiration for the sunny day outside, being only followed by a bunch of hares, barrel dares that only sprouted songs of brass.

‘May we accompany you today?’

He was almost out of it just like he had been before.

‘Damn hares, I knew I should’ve gone outta the way.’

The least they could do, for now was get on with it. There was nothing he could think of at this very moment because he had not been prepared for the boulders of bodies they formed in order to accompany him along the way.

‘Twas expected, but say, who are you exactly and what do you want from me?’

All he could do now was entertain the thought that he could not get away from them.

He made it as far as he could get to. With all and all, he made not of a single slit.

Lamb decide

The floor shook, but that much was understood by everyone involved. Without a way out and anything to hold there, they could only relentlessly take it as easily as they could. Taken from a short period of time, countless days passed. Still not a single mover appeared to open for some reason. If there was something to be taken from here, it was their slow lives.

Despit everything going and turning, with the small cogs twisting and looming, the cockpit yearned release. Barn Cornpow and Eerie were the only one left in mover eighty-zero. Most of the others had already left and closed the door behind them. It was a peculiar thing, being there, alone, making the signs they called it.

‘Your turn, go on, change the water.’

‘I thought I did it last time.’

‘And you’re going to keep doing it until you’ll admit it.

There’s no life out there any longer. We can’t know where everyone else went.’

And there was an eerie silence that was unresolved. And as soon as they opened the door, they could see nothing on the other side, nothing even closely related to what they were promised.

Inhabitants of the station

It was never going to return, no matter how one looked at it. From whichever angle and the weather, it only crept around and ate the eyes. They paled in comparison with what went on. All those acts of wild crime could not even keep track of them, with the city being occupied. It was another day that felt like dying. No clear sun and no clear sky remained. And everything was bloodied in and cracked.

One Mathias Corkfrew came out of his home during a midnight in sole December. He hadn’t felt like it, in the longest time, but he kept walking. Even though his hands were tired, at least he reminded himself that there was some place he needed to be. It was decrepit. How the pain fell off the people. Everywhere he looked whereas they hadn’t managed to touched, looked as if it were encompassed in black and white. A specter of images came near but he didn’t care what that had been about. It was his time around to ask them.

‘When are you going to leave now?’

‘We can’t know. I suppose the walls and the station will melt by the time we’re off. I know it doesn’t mean much to you now, or at least it won’t by the time we’re out of the place.

But by then, think about it, stranger. Your very soul will have matured. Isn't that what you wanted in the first place?

You'll be able to leave like everyone else without being caught in here, in a place that's been preventing you from moving on.'

Ah, so that was it. He couldn't see any point in running or constantly walking any longer. Everything was always so vague that there were times when everything felt, strangely if anything, lonely. It doesn't happen so often for him to take him of the day and talk to a stranger. Let alone carry on his condolences, for what was going on here. IT felt as if it was raining purple. Drops coming from atop the ceiling, he thought of satin for some reason.

He was drenched in its material but he couldn't get away from that feeling. Depression made him feel that way and unfortunately this would last forever. There was no way out and none the taking for what got him there. As a mere consideration, he actually came to think about what life might be if he had lived forever. Even after everything being said and done, he saw no point in dying.

But they, who were they? Thin-skinned, metallic rod-people, walking about, crushing the place the best way they could get it in. Were they here before? Perhaps they were, even the children knew them. And they were the children as well, or their past had split from their insides and grabbed a hold of their memories of youth. No one knew what to do here. Everything was too twisted for a normal life to be lived. Sometimes they all died, then they woke up in their beds without any injury having been sustained. Other times nothing seemed to happen, them being way too mundance to be touched. But this was different, for some reason. It all fell apart instead of them. And no one could point and declare with a sole reason that everything will be as it should.

It went through their heads and no one seemed to spare a single mind to the idea. They had been declared dead-men ever since they arrived, or plastic cattle if that meant anything to anyone.

'Follow me, I think it's the least you should see. Since there's no reinforcer in here, I suppose it should be kind of safe.'

At least as much as he could promise it, despite the fact that there was no guarantee here to begin with. He was determined to find out what was going on.

Corkfrew saw them. Only a few of the cold-rod bodies open a door off one of the walls. They were greeted by a long drop of stairs, they followed through soon after. It was an old abandoned station. Most of the walls were occupied by the units, some who appeared to have screens while others had the similar face he saw in one of his dreams. Apparently everyone dreamed of him. A few chambers stood out there, all of them open. Though there was some mess below there. Cork though about asking but he felt no need for it any longer. It saddneed him to be here, to see what he thought to be the insides of his home, or the backburner which made them all act the way they had.

A train had crashed not far after. It looked livid for a while until they approached it.

'Don't worry about it. It's hard to tell who lived and who went on because they were afraid to die. That's the reason so many of them are here for. You wouldn't understand it.'

You need the time to grow and unfortunately there's no more time this time around.'

He almost thought on crying, but it was all he could do for now, follow. Keep quiet, like many people in his position. Why had they all stopped moving?

Even him, of all who decided to follow was too weary of trying, he was tried of everything. He was frustrated and all alone, going on no back burner but on something else that didn't even have him wish there was more to it. But he looked around, even before the surroundings gave him the impression of melting and he knew that there was no one alive in here. And no one alive from anywhere, not even them. Whether it was a curse or not, they felt, empty. It was something no sound could get him out off.

'Can we take a break?'

'Not another one, I'm sorry. You'll have to power through this one, at least one last time. I know it's hard but it shouldn't last forever.'

It was the end of an era, whence he hadn't lost a nerve. Struck out, he came to see them, as decay took the best of everyone.

First the land outside was shallow. Feathers spread and sprouted off the ground.

There, farther, about, in the distance.

To have gone aplumb, they whailed after looking at the sky, conveying no hard emotion nor would they account for what was going on there. A Carrion arrived at the spot where the tribe met the peculiarness of stone-paved dirt and the suburban area where livelihood was the rage that flowed through gut and cranny, a disaster waiting to happen, yet swollen as it went before. Prior to them, they should've known it, for fire had been embded in the sound-foam opium they had degenerated to instead.

'Another shot, another shot.'

It was crystal clear, the opiate made them mad. The moment this primitive on-looker arrived into town he had come to understand what went through their minds, why it all happened the way it had. Most importantly, he realised how strange the retreat had been, a questionnaire of pleasing diseases, all of which surmounted in the strange glanced they spared. It was in their eyes, that's where the key was, that reflection of the innards of their souls, as peculiar as it sounded, it could not be ignored any long, nor made out by any prayer. Dissatisfied but longed for, that could not be checked. Distress could not come to play, they made peril out of their body-hay, feather-like pitches being thrown and messed with on the account of ground. Molds could not be settles not fought for in the scruffs that was being molded. In part, they had been given freedom, to the highest-degree and from the likes of it they had become mad, it was way too clear.

'What have they done to you?'

'Who are you? Where have you appeared from? I seem to recognise something in you I have not come to account.'

Before he could leave him to the taking, before he could make a point, it was all too obvious now. Retreat, retreat, they got up to their feet and seemed to join them instead. His fellows, the scouting group he came with.

Plenty of unforgivable acts have been carried with and done for. Ostracized by those who joined them, in the deepest accesses that could be found, there was the wonder of pain. No one spoke about it out loud, out of fear of retaliation, what that meant, the pain instead would cry after instead of them. It was plain to see, at least for the few of them that were present there and had the least of a mind, a part of them had still be stiffened, trapped inside, not let left alone to rot.

Vessel

Something like it wouldn't work in the real world, hence the vessel spoke and grew. In its innards drew the past epochal gigantism suffering bodies which had once been used to stabilize the growth, the hormones pushing forth until it could no longer be face, as the harmless destination, as the creation of a plain world upon which they might feed upon the lower ones, the creatures that would be given birth from the undeniable scorroug bodies, fat and thrown into the shades of the lower areas, the filth that went through girs-formations, the ecological zones and the plainness of long-zones that were empty, other than to be filled with the strange vessels and the kin of their own. Large empty ares had been used for storage, it was the only logical conclusion that could be drawn from around the place. Thinking as a vile man, he entered the state of disquiet and dreamed again. This was what had been preserved, if anything, beneath one of the vessels, in the depth of a well-like cylidrical abyss, of which depth had been completely controlled and forced to lay in peace and untouched, they shook themselves as the minds bashed and charged against charred walls inside their cranial boxes. None would know better if they were to be met. No longer would they sing the songs, or make it seem like time was lost. Strange, this was an intricate design that shouldn't have worked no matter what the worth of days had spoke to them. It was too plain, too deranged, unable to release all those arms that fell even lower, like lovers beneath the soles of feet. Destined to meet with the ulcer-like posion in which they swam, there was nothing more, nothing to be drawn.

'Who shall call upon this world?'

A man had the guts to ask. Though he was lost in a fantasy, he had been there, present in the molds of the bricks that surrounded the well-abyss. After such a long period of time, they were morose, moronically putrid, to the point where they had become infantile, or infantilized to the point where they thought like children.'

Standing in an enclosed area, this was no delusion. Since the outside was plain, the bottom half of the planet looked as deformed as a pair of elephant-people, growing and expanding as the bubbles spread. So many fantasies could finally be lived without having to worry, bodies being rebuild, patched of land, the sky all made, and most importantly, they could not be hurt, or tainted in those blobs of paradise. The gift was supreme, time could not interfere with the grand mangnitude in which this planet and the system had been created in. Ye, who watched, would know that not even the heat death of the universe, nothing could erase the ground, the vessels or the fantasies that were formed around. Nor could there be a stop to the contradiction that was his fate. Agamemnon would still dream of destroying everything underneath his gaze.

But to speak of that no longer, the man shuddered, looking after. Looking after something which made him unhappy, it was a turn, a change, a deranged activity, which only loomed around the grappling and the singing and the days which were saddened.

Jealousy

Canon simply turned and ran away from him, having no clue as to known how to deal with the fiend that erected itself on the ground, pounding madly in entranced sand-dances, bile being completely produced and spread between the hours. It was an act of pity towards itself, as the creature began feeding on the wheels as soon as it was aroused. Sickening scents, degenerate ends, and the crying stopped as soon as the people began worshipping it in its degenerate state. For he had yet to bore a scuffle, a hurt that would render it unsufferable, in poise, remorseless, dead of a disease, headless in the uncount of many because it was no mere humanoid. They gathered in the case, and one by one the men started feeding in their heads, sacrificial makings, as the women were too cowardly to approach, these priests lacked in wonder and in mind, as they grew stronger, yet benign. As the roots of the creature and those of the men spread, a transfusion happened which allowed them to continue even after the supposed death. Beast though it may, it fed on the ashes of their heads, burning them crisp before it erected itself forward and started chomping without rest.

Someone was doing a salute twenty feet away from the scene. It was somewhat disregarded. Even more than that, it was the sign of the outlaw, some filthy masochist with the right mad to sustain the vow, as he did as he pleased and pushed everyone out of sight until he was met face to face by this carbon copy of a lurid dream he had faded in. For when he approached, he felt alive, unlike the ones who had been devoured, he saw the creature for what it was, seeping through its insides with nothing but a glance.

Eight people suffered of orange-blood addiction. They drank it from the vein-oranges which had been spread around the market. Most of the orange trees had been placed in two distinct categories, those who had been bred that way, human-oranges-trees hybrids alike being thrown around the ground-cluster and the men who drank too much and had their heads undergone a complete growth which rendered them obsolete. It was a strange, yet putrid way of living. So far they had allowed the real hybrids to snick through the soles of the underground tunnels and pop out from inside their scalps.

One mourner came forward. His name was Prammouth. It was his turn to inspect the junction and figure out for himself what was going on there. Since the dirt had been contaminated, hardening as to remove any semblance of organic growth, there was still the origiastic nature which had filled the minds of the men who came forth. Various images, hallucinatory jests and spooks leaped like shades of fire only to ingest the people around the lanes and get them hook on whichever advent their heads had dare imagine and tell. Some fantasies were livid, whilst other were lurid with the most fluorescent cankerous a man could fill his mind at night. And they were struck by an unfathomable layer of sleep paralysis.

There was only one type of paranoia which appeared to prevail in a time of loss. It was that of the electronic death which appeared in everyone's minds. That false machination which haunted everyone, of which each thought would mean forfeit, conceit, a mental exhaustion which could only cross the line and cause them to stop.

Soon the field stopped when that part of their brains activated, though they were in part plant, they had started bursting their three-sided horns which came out of their entire bodies, bearing many symbols and marks unknown to the world or to anything else. The encephalo-programming started and as it had, as they stood burst-chested, the pillared horns started singing out of carved faces, bred for disquiet, sang for the dead. As one Jonathan Ascott came clear to the others who may or may not have been as present there in thought, he had realised that the fall was inevitable. Lacking in the chemicals, an access was given forth, thrown around the heeding worthless plunge. It was a disease that kept on adding, cutting around the throat, where it let them know who was in charge. And who better than the singers in the mad of day, where the sky grayed out and instead of light, only a puritan form conveyed everything happening in the world in the simple form of a mirroring prism. Falling through the access, swaying, they conveyed the fear only for so long.

Thence the first arrival, where they had gathered around the man who inspected the strange occurrence, only to be ripped apart by them, one by one, men holding him like ropes around tight-horses running in every possible direction at every shimmer of the sound. They were still trying to make it seem like there was someone in control of them. But on a whim, one Arkanses said.

'I think he had enough of it. We should stop instead and try making it to dawn.'

About eighteen more men arrived and they prayed for the symbol, something they had taken about to their very souls. It was peculiar how, in all the sea of gray-light stars, there was one being colored as it became a space rose. Fro and to, around the moon, they danced to the mad perils that started getting through to them. There was yet no hope to make it seem, there was no quiet and nothing.

'Listen, we have to return before they find us, otherwise, there will be no hope. No hope I say, for either of us.'

Thence they strayed their hands and stopped beating, paying no attention to the lanes. Farther away, at miles if not, canyon-distances that spread the rains, the rat-entity danced on a field. In quiet, it had reigned over many generations and appeared to have only the slightest vision problem which came out of a broken heart. But to that, what could be drawn at the very least was the fact that it still bore a heart, forlorn and lost. Longer than it had been torn from a body that would not mourn for none other than himself, the watcher of lies stood closer to the pole-crank, watching it die. Off to mourn another day, he walked around on a road whistling.

'Better days could not be farther and it could only get this way. I see a loney walking day, away, they wait for me at morrow.'

He had been only of the bloatiest lots.

Match

It only took two strikes around the head to kick someone in the dirt. The ring was set, twenty meters from each end. Too much space, fists too heavy. It urged one to keep pacing and keep pacing around until he couldn't help his muscles popping. Room was full, all thickets sold. Told of something even remotely even, they were null. Beaten to pulps. One strike of an arm was worse than the other. Soon a forearm popped the jointed and looked as if it bore some force around the ankle. Chasing one around, spoofs of strings in the neck carrying blow-torches as their skin started melting. Their arena became a poor of skin. Skeletons fought in it while their organs whiffed each other into smoke and boiled in scum-throngs. Many were lost, spectators came out of their way, out of their seats to appear around. As the door opened, the guest of honor had arrived. His name was Calt and he was out of it, snapped and busted on the lip. It had to go harder, he had to go harder now. One of the boxers had his liver, and gut hanging around his tibia forte. Many of his other bones started pushing out, forming small disease cattle-walker, who couldn't happen to push each other out of the way. When the command was given, carried, stricken down, the entire floor turned crystalline, with everything around and in the ring being encompassed, other than the skeletons. Each went to their spots, fed cigars, pushed on the fire as the smoke carried on the template. Needles to the extraction, some marrow would be saved. Some of it would be used later as their crucifixes were made.

'This will do for now, but I don't think I'll be able to eat much later.'

No one was deranged enough to understand what he was saying. At beast, there was a clatter of the bone, then the shape happened. One of the craniums became two of them, not entirely split but strangely convulsing into it, bouncing around as a ball inside the brain, which only started phasing out when needed. No longer would he understand what was going on, since the second skull was made out of the brain matter. And it could only go so far, after being pushed around. Multiple concussions had left him damaged, stricken, praying, swaying himself for the scum-battle and the land that started slinking out. There was a need to go back at it, as the bones started feeding themselves off the crystal, growing, bulking up, becoming redder and bluer. Then they went at it again, going as far as to punch through their spirits, through their guts, down there, where it mattered. As the guest of honor only came back to regonise what was going on, he repented.

'Who're the fighters?'

'Hicks we picked up off the streets.'

It was just as expected. It wasn't needed. It wasn't spared. Someone was talking, it was hard and jarring. A foreigner distracted four men who were trying to enjoy the fight. It was a woman, but why was she doing it? Almond could only take it for so long until he snapped out of it. A fight could ensue out of the ring. They were almost done there. Caught before it even started, destined to lose in the first attempt.

Then the second end. Another session started, where crystal became crystalline blot, a chain could be seen as it was dragged inside and made the pain happen. It was indiscribable, how time after time after time, to no end, they repeated the same actions again, which would be seen in the reflections below them. Exactly this happened, even after the fact. They were dreading to spend another second repeating their actions while a sea of frozen bones released their hold and knocked each other down. In every single one of them, the blue skeleton won, but the spirit was altruistic. For anyone who could fathom seeing it, this was the problem here. With a hoop in the neck, a trottle came after. It was evens, the sight of dementia, visions that popped into the eye. A wonder, even stronger than anything that happened, loss after loss, what was that? It hit them where it counted. Similitudes of flashes and then, the realisation came. A skeleton was red, the other one was blue, but in every sight and every corner, and every kind of mild disorder, couldn't make the colors off. Sometimes they were indistinguishable from one another.

Limericks, they tasted like slices of lemon. Color blindness, it's what is what it was. It excused one from seeing what happened around him as time went on.

He leaped inside the ring with a strangely bioinspired chemically-made armour. All of it was made of shards imbued with the liver-meat crooked, the ones that shouldn't be able to move. In no circumstance had anyone that moved around been able to cradle their own thoughts in order to avoid the burning sensation that kept spreading between them. It was impossible to remove or get away from it.

'There's another challenger.'

Suddenly they came back to it, dumbfounded over the fact that neither of them could concentrate or look away from what was going on there. It was a mess, which spread through them at last, as fight ensued beyond and around the rings, that could only happen one way out. Two, about the place, they sang. Voices lost in glory, no memory for anyone who waited on them. Soon enough they stopped the laughter, looking at the disaster happening inside the ring. As quickly as he could return, there were no more times, at turns to mourn. A dependency ensued on them. No longer was there any quiet to fore turn.

'I see a way out, for those that march.'

'About this place, we can't look back, don't you get it, can't you understand?'

'We're resting on the strangest bed, the ones that shatters and might end.'

A blow to the knee revealed, as soon as they pushed through and never covered the shiver, the entire floor, the crystal moor fell and broke. Through it they couldn't fathom turning or making it seem as if they shook at rocks, the signaling of the broken masses. Peace belonged to the mad ones that fell through the bodies of red and blue, and yellow, the purple, all of them cracking as they were cut in halves. And the audience was punished with no word or chance to fight back. They chattered, it didn't matter who would make the noise today. Days were spent underneath the ring, in a mass-grave where only the strongest and the guest of honor, those who fought back and those who made it past the morrow.

'Lord and cathor, sing us a song to pass the time.'

'But will you entertain me with another fight if I choose to do it?'

'Least of all, I should consider this as a chance, we could work something out if you don't mind.'

A damage to the mind, the sitting, a slithering of tongues today, about this place not many kept them, as most of the brusies had been directed around the mouths, in every possible way. A fealty could be felt, the shallow throats carrying missiles that were hid inside their bolted blocked corpses. Most of them had come here to hid, for there was still a war, around the ward of the land. Awarded no disease, they listened, envelopes still carrying the news.

‘An extra message, I could not fathom more today, but what had happened and why does this encumber us no more?’

‘My dear son, I think there’s nothing but blood in it.

Can you see a destination towards which this pint of clot points back to?

Do you see a return address or should I make one up as I make my way back into the civilized world?’

‘You realise neither of us has a way out, do you?

I can see it already, you know? In front of my eyes, it’s ever so clear that we’re being mocked in the worst possible manner. They want to make fool of us all, in this shack underneath the ring. We were set up, you know?’

The old hick came with nothing underneath him. He wore a coat, beneath which his skeleton looked so thin that it might as well be made out of air. On top his head was fully preserved, caught between two turns of medal-shaped holders that made it so he could not die without a battle’s worth. To this he considered the uncomfortable position he was in. Through his eyes lust, but this place was barren. Loss of function, there were a few hereditary functions that were being taken away from him.

He lost a few oaths there, he was destined to lay out there, wondering what might happen at times.

‘I wish I could see reason, you know?

For everything that’s been happening so long. But the principle held off unrightly.’

They were unable to contain it any longer, the prowess being wasted on no foolish cooled down mind, throttled in the head, beaten and left until dead.

‘Is that what being a human is like, rotting in here without the means of getting through any kind of delight of our own?’

‘Nay, try again.’

Said one of the corpses, then? A recollection.

The people outside the bunker, they were holding on their dear trinkets, trying their hardest not to cross the line and break them over after passing. No one said a stiffening thing after a while. Listening to the most incredulous amount of jibber-thought, they came to surrender, least of all would they know.

‘Where’s the man named Malt? I knew him, at least I think I had, some time ago, it’s so hard, trying to recall him, that I think. Sometimes, I doubt he’s even real.’

‘We lost another one. I don’t think this is the right time for you to question reality or anything of the matter. Do as I say and stay with us, do you understand?’

‘But why? I feel this is my chance to do something, you know? I could finally get my mind working again without trying to let them pry in.’

‘Hey, chemo-brains, I’m the obscure.’

‘What?’

‘I said, look around you, there’s no more of a bloc for us to live in than there’s anything growing outside. How does that make you feel?’

From a stranger to another.

‘I feel as if I’m being mocked. Neither of us has spoken for long, yet I feel like you’re all lost to me.’

They tried humming on. But nothing was drawn on the skin-plates.

It was sad, waiting.

They stopped at a nasty whirl and seemed to be dragged over, like bodies that cropped their heads inside out. They started slowly at first, trying to amass something of a small curtain of top-head weapons, anything they could pick off the ground. It was all needed, in some way to get themselves off the charts and various racks from which they gathered their common sense, in order to stand there for hours. Wondering at the masses of ticks that were trying to scower the land in the distance while the wild approaches made the rest of the road. Something was lost only then, when curiosity faded.

‘I think, if we run now, we could make it half-way through. Don’t you think so?’

‘Of course not, they’ll only take us down as soon as we make the cut.’

Ten am, somewhere around the house. Man walked around the room, crossed half-way through the kitchen. He sees mother and dog in the same place, while she noticed him reading a magazine on animal abuse. The man proceeds to stop the animal to death with one foot.

‘Shall we take this to another room?’

He ate a piece of Asther’s head on the way out, then he spat it out. Disgusting creature he was, the man spat on it again. Taking no second off, he turned back on it and stamped some more; so much so until his lip burst out. Only then was he satisfied while doing it.

Should’ve waited for her there, it was the only decent thing to do, without making too much noise.

‘Shut your filthy mouth now, I feel so much rage.’

Came a voice from outside the apartment. He burst through, with an open face, with nothing holding him together, trying to make a point out of it before pushing back through. He charged, and crushed both of his ankles before he could riposte. It was a fluke that kept on giving and taking from them. No one but him, no one survived. Farther into the fray, where there the shadow of another challenger appeared, the ground shook, without excuse, thence came the matcher. He was trimmed and small, and appeared to have his eyes set around the place. Despite the failure and the misscommunication, they all appeared to be dwelling in their spots, no one bothered by what was going around. There were dead people and dead-men fighting and plenty of others that had returned from their dirt-made and highly encased coffins only to find out what the ruckus was all about. To no surprise, many of the match-makers that came through, there was still something they could take from them. And sacking Rome they have, with the bones falling in their places, many of the disgraced fighters going along to no other song but that of the ruin. Flailing like a crystal-shade, most of this place had been lit by an explosion which had come from the farthest mines that would behave. Letter to the cutting, brought to a disease, distressed the matchers brought the couch in which their chosen man retreated. He was tall as he came out of his shell, well built, almost like a magna-ape which had grew to the size of a great truck of a chaster of cinderblocks in a sea of cement, the cementary called. His head was flat and appeared to be longer, by the sides, open but not human-like. He had a pair of highly mobile spiked teeth which rotated into circles around his feet, chest and the better side of his head. In their constant motion you could see his eyes constantly appearing and disappearing before they appeared on different parts of his body. Or the brawling gloves he carried with him, the mask which had a few hooks that were strung to his larged doming chest and the abominable peculiar crested trunk region which gathered just about every possible blown form that he could muster. In those he had accumulated enough blows for any common man to be taken down. Plainly put he had misunderstood the limits of a normal human being, having acquired this chest only by a trade. Below the chest, bellowing to the watchers rested a pair of mechanical legs which needed a constant recharging. It seeped as they drew on, he wanted to wane in quiet and wait for the others to appear but so far, he was the new and only important contender of the lot.

‘Hear me out, for I am his manager. Norelcon, and he is my boy, Thonder. We have come here with a promise and we shall be settled with nothing less and nothing short but the complete eradication of our damned competition under every circumstance and every possible way.’

The man was out of his mind. This Norelcon could not possibly mean it, to even think he could barge in and fall like the rest of the people and challenge everyone. But they rose up and listened, as the other chasters appeared to be gathering the money and the bets. It was to be conceded that they were desperate to have a fight no matter what they said or looked around in any fighter. If one were to even pay the due, if he were to call it, he’d know’

‘I shall make you a deal then.’

Thonder Ulbor shouted aloud.

‘If anyone can lay a single organ off its function, I shall call it a quit. I shall gift you the organic malfunction and I shall admit defeat.’

To which the skeletons laughed and at once, they started growling and releasing their extra heads, arms, legs and began expanding their skeletal-skin growth. Each of them came in a pair, and most of them were never fair to look back to. Not that it would end with less, they could confess to no one watching or the stress of many lookers’ woes. It was uneventful how they appeared to finally manifest. As if they revealed themselves on account of being creatures from other dimensions. A sickening pair, it was highly unfair, to be looked back to and feel the responsibility of distress. But they were looked upon for far too long and they had never realised what it meant until now. There was no fear, only sadness. Many glanced and lost their nerves. Spectators which had only come here with the hope of the mind, of even getting something from the various rows they had swollen and squandered during the time-offs. But even the newly evolved beings could not fathom standing their ground in a fair fight. It could not be done, with them being pushed on against walls and battered, beaten, made a show out of, and even worse. It was the complete eradication coming from the punches and the supreme pain. As one of the shouted.

‘Please enter this place of diquiet and make yourself known.’

He was shouting to some entity. A moment of quiet in the newly made ring, just as the floor rose, white of marble-sand frozen underneath their bear throngs, four pillars of skull being encircled with large snakes and better-looking dames that had been completely set in pieces, glowing as their mental extractions faded.

It was quiet now, enough that it could be withdrawn from the place. Someone lost their dog outside. It dawned and reigned on them that no man would ever look upon another with lust. As that lust would only lead them to look out of the way, especially since the debauchery had only started then. They could not stray enough from looking. And that had not been earned just then. Plainly, they spoke in tongues now. Everyone outside the ring, stopped from their swaying.

The skin malformations on top of the strange skeletons had been completely ruined and thrown into chaos. Nothing was even remotely redeemable from this sight. Everyone was denied the least amount of quiet of peacefullness from their surrounding. Someone of them bled out of their eyes and only extended their large tongues in order to take in as much as they possibly could. It was sweet in some mouths, while in others it tasted sour.

Towards Dina

One of Aleskey’s fondest memories:

He saw a woman, ever so pesky breasted. Focusing on her over a long period of time made him feel at peace, it was something not even he could resist thinking about her during the after-noon hour, a splendid bird, a cocketee in some way. But the proudest think he’s done after drinking was shoving the entirety of the bottle on the second hole around the waking.

The gun was loaded now, up to the last shot. He hadn’t known a lot about this John Sink but he knew the man as someone of a different dish than he was accustomed to. He was allowed as far as on a knee, proceeding into barely standing. Both of them lowered their guns almost instinctively. There was no excuse to do it, there wasn’t any given that he could raise it faster than the man, no matter how long and heavier the rifle was. Aleksey's arm was broken, a fracture taken without him being aware of what happened to him. So far, he could only pull and release a muscle before giving up and taking it again. If there was something now, anything that even remotely entered his head, it was that amusing thing.

He smiled and almost chipped a tooth. It was something he didn't intend on recalling, yet he's done it out of the blue. It was distracting even for Sink who was too sure on himself. Taking too many breaks only to look in the back, noticing the other soldiers march in. Surreal was a way to describe it. As long as the civilians were right, he could only see a few of them down. He'd make it, perhaps the good way this time. It was forced, all too much for his own worth, being paid by the hours.

The new-captain was probably too busy doing one of the locals.

John Sink missed Aleksey for a moment. He had limped across the room. They were staring face to face, and then, Aleksey slapped him right off with a single blow to the chest.

Sink fell and started bleeding, way too confused to realise what was going on.

'That was a good duel, but now I think I got you at a disadvantage.'

A few seconds passed. He unloaded all the shots in his knees and into his privates, then he took his rifle.

'Don't worry, I missed on purpose.'

He didn't understand a word of Russian, but judging by his sudden change of expression he was irresponsive. Now, to deal with the campaign, as the bleeding stopped and there was no doubt that the man would make it through.

'I'll have these if you don't mind.'

Stripped and changed, he took his time to act like one of them. As dangerous of a maneuver as it was, he was set on doing whatever crossed his mind. It went unheeded, like a kick. He was back on the streets of the village, thinking of nothing else but her feet. Poor Dina, the real Dina, the motherly Dina who was all alone in the forest, in their home. She had little idea to what was happening in the real world. It was because she hasn't traveled a lot. It's that way with some women. He considered sending her a gift, but what?

Perhaps a drink might help him. So he started staring at the piss-windows, he was almost done with it. And then he took another barrel from where he left it and fled out of his way.

'Is there anyone there?'

Aleksey had done that before. It was his strange way of talking and trying to stick with them. Or something close to it in any case, after a long time he would know it. And that could be checked as soon as he had the guts for it. But they were pushing through behind the lines. Many of them carried long armed guns and rifles, despite there being no opposition out there to stand against them. This would be the job for me, if only I could dream better about the world. He thought only as far as he had been allowed, until he found the barrel he had been so desperately trying to fight over with the old lady. She gave him a reason to live. And he took that reason on a whim. No more sadness being condensed and no one bringing in their best.

‘I asked something, show yourself.’

A man came out, friendly looking, fat around the face and lumpy on the cheeks. But his eyes were not from around here, nor from there. Aleksey knew better than to look for a Tartar prince in this young fellow, as kin of less, there were so few of them here and there.

‘I’ve been hiding here ever since they dropped the bolts, the giant eggs still came forth by the time I managed to get in.’

‘Who’s responsible for this?’

Pointing at one distant barrel which had been kicked in, a few times over the circled metal ring that had encapsulated it before the drop, if there was anything to be observed, it was the lack of a soul to his common cause. Or the lack of common sense to challenge him at that, as the prince raised his fists at Aleksey, not knowing who he was. It was obvious, so far, that if he knew, perhaps, he might’ve lived to tell the tale or at least to make it as far as he could be allowed to. Instead, he chose not a single word to leave his mouth, many others would’ve at least pleaded as someone like him knew his way around the fists. He wondered, just how he might do it, instead of wondering how to get out, how to leave and live least of all in shame. Not many people, men or other weaker things could stand against him. An exhibitionist of muscles barged, as he grabbed the frame of a corner, from one of the adjacent houses. Then he started smacking it between his hands, his arms convoluting such strength that the prince decided to back down.

‘Many sorries if I offended, I did not realise.’

He had heard that for far too many times, especially today. It was his strength after all, trying to make it out of the way in quiet. Exiting the scene before the curtain fell on him again. He was pleased with himself now, ever so much that he decided he would leave the spot before being found.

‘I need to find another barrel.’

This so much was a given, in the shallow pains that he had gone through, many houses appeared to laugh and cry, directed at him before the time.

Rage and hatred

He took a few steps away and punched a hole through his own head, smiling as he bled.

‘It was a damn good day, wasn’t it?’

No one could tell what was going to happen after the sky, the moon and the shout of the many wonders came after. It was his entry and the only way he could possibly make a difference around the place. It was also the first and foremost only entrance during the fall.

Duran stood close to Rod. The ship had finally reached the sky-dock. Greeted by a few locals, they began unpacking and making sure everything was being taken away.

‘So, this is it then?’

‘Right, then we should at least try.’

‘What’s happened?’

‘Nothing, I, just thought I missed something.’

In the past, during a time when it was much easier to create, anything, in his mind, whether it was some wild fantasy or a peculiar memory or something which occurred to him. But now, everything was too juvenile to be ignored. They hit him where it hurt the most, yet they carried on and flew over with the land.

‘What are we looking at?’

‘Have we lost it?’

‘Lost what?’

Everyone turned over to the crisp edges of the ship. It was still there, somehow, they were unsure what the reason for their appearance there was, but they stood on top of a wild land, whether it was known or not, that couldn’t have mattered. But they had been set in flight, constantly hiding.

‘This must be destiny, I believe, isn’t it?’

‘Indeed it is, who would’ve thought we might’ve ended here?’

Through the spear of Schnor, where they rested on top of one of the other places, not a single road stood there and none stooped down. It was highly instinctive, trying to get anywhere.

And who shall he be this time around? IT died out for now, with all the soreness that inflicted itself upon his rocky-heart, the loss.

‘I shall near the seaway and cross the roads, and miss it before it hits the spot.’

A bald choice, lest of all should they know what was going on without wondering at the lives which were being lost. The secret way out of this mechanical paradise, trapped inside, left to rot as they owned the way out.

‘The company dictates that at least someone is killed. Failure to comply, extermination. Don’t endure for long and least of all shall you forget what you’re after, need you be reminded that there’s more?’

On the left side of the quadran-zone, the area where the devices that manipulated the cradling-boards in order to move the prototypes stretched into the large ravine, there stood a few holding cells. In each of them, enough had lain, to better spades, bodies like theirs. But never again.

‘We need to bring them back to life, they’re not machines but biologically endowed.’

In such conditions not even atoms could survive the passing, yet they have been changed almost entirely to the point where the slightest harmful touch would recede into a dead sea of wild marches. Never ending as the trance of evil, atoms paled. But he remained as a lonely strappler, one who worked on the condition, the mad addition and the lone machines, not entirely sentient, but somewhat obtuse. Having lost what was left of his nature, his head was of green, erected like a pillar that turned and curved into a disgusting churning organ. From it fell the scuffle and the dark blood that came after evolved into microchondriac cells. Spared from the living, they became neurons, and nerve cells that began manifesting his body multiple times, in every hidden stop, only to be set in a flight of speed like tiny parasites trying to flee.

‘I saw that.’

‘And you let yourself go free. Can’t you see that there’s no other way out from this? I seem to recall that there was a time where you’d give an eye.’

He had. Spoiled in the head as he was, it only grew. It could not be stopped, until it had started manifesting the frail canines that started churning. Since they were made out of cartilage they had no strength to break the carbon beings that surrounded him. And they floated and seemed to pass. At times, never to be seen as they went into the cells and check the livelihood of the experiments before they could be grabbed. It was not decent, what they were doing. It was somewhat unfathomable, just this extinction, and the wordless spakes.

‘I shall start again.’

Sitting himself, he had a flash. A mind like his own allowed him to understand where he had come from. It was barren, everywhere around him, rounded and checked. There was an end which shot to the horizon in every direction, a wind had swept, giant that were deformed inhabited the plant. Uniformed men desperately attempted getting through. But most importantly he could see something they could not even fathom seeing. Multiple bodies had been completely buried underneath the ground. He, of all was the only one who could see them, he thought, unable to concentrate on anything else, he wept. Waiting for something to happen, it pushed through and left the rotting to clasp.

‘This is what I wanted to avoid.’

Writing the code that would slowly embed the broiled faces into the walls. It worked well. He had recognised a family which had been tightly knit together within their own guts. Happily after, they were distraught as anyone in their turn. Mourning minutes, turning into wormed out steps.

He, the Son of the Etriarch came to turn. Wrongly searching in his gut, he felt them. Every child he ever killed still attempted to get out. They were restless as they kept grabbing to his gut and heart, attempting to cause a stroke, never ending their awakening from the slumber that took away their entire worth.

Luckily he had killed the mothers, battering them without their fathers. They, of all were left alone, of purity and of worth. He could not decide what was to be done of the others.

Walking on the steps and turned, he couldn't decide who was there and what did they want before they could cloud the snore. A slumber with many faces, one of the taken aspects which had been extracted from inside the cells, many dead, many living, many in-between. Uncannily watching, trying to wash away the sin of stars. Most of them had boiled one another in ion gas, until they had broken each other in halves burning like hells. There was a worthless wonder and a filth of the least. A leash had bedraggled all of them within the hour.

'I shall make sure you suffer for some time.'

It was undeniable, trying to get through them in hours, least of all, could they cower. Waiting round the day when free, they could see the world outside, where they would be destined.

'There's an intruder from outside.'

And the world could not be denied in any possible case that it was anything but a malformation of amny raised hill-like buildings, enclaves and other unnatural disasters that had forced the various species to become structures. In a way, it was divine. SO many cathedrals made out of monsters, worshipped by those who were undergrounds. Many of the intelligent species which had been driven down created strange symbols for themselves in which they lay and waited, never ending the quiet and the out-right swollen pain. Minds were being broken by their visors remained on the spot. And many other strange happenings only added to this at last, it was a sing of being clueless, dread came with the distraction. From each screen it only looked alike, the disaster being pushed aside. It was felt, hard felt, destroyed.

Spirits were being taken down, no mind could fathom satiating the sound coming out of the cathedrals. Least it should be, least of all, better worth.

He took his time like a good Son, and started ripping out various flays of skin off their faces.

Advent of envy

'What shall he be named?'

The embodiment of all he envied, and all of those he looked back to with brazier for skins, but he couldn't help it, he's grown weary of everything.

'It doesn't matter. I wish I was mobile as they are, I wish I was as strong, as flexible, until I could reach.'

But he stopped immediately, without trying to get himself, running around, first in circles. That was as easy as he was on a sportsman's field. Spread around the junk of lost balls, wide, as deflated oblongs, but metal out of pure alloy taken from the cut bodies of universal punches that broke through the ground. Dirt became mudd immediately from the sweat he produced. As soon as his second fist landed, he liften himself above the surface and threw everything around him into the air. His fingers protruded through his thighs, until they started bursting.

‘More, I need more, pain, I need to.’

He pushed his toes together back down and started touching the pieces of dirt. By then they had become strange patches of metallic air, which shot through his arms and through his back, as penetrative as bullet-ants that started prying in his fire combs.

‘Where to now?’

‘You’re coming with me?’

‘First,.’

‘Canon Hatt, that’s about it, but you’ll forget, so I’m not going to ask yours.’

‘Would you mind calling me Hatt then?’

Canon didn’t answer, don’t bother.

He walked around, taking the first flower he could lay his hands upon. It was something soulless, just like what he felt. But he started bending it like origami, making small stars and long knives, seeing to it that he could push deep enough, only deep enough to leave a mark. Then he started bleeding in front of Hatt.

‘What was the point of that.’

‘I’m trying pain.’

He was mobile now, he could almost feel it, trying to leap around the fence, getting on the other side, then back in, where the rows stood. Only then had he lost his finger and started jeking around like a body of two.

Hatt barely got out of the way, tripping on a few chairs, landing on them while making his way through the motion, through the barrage, he was struck there, in the pin of a lingering nail that was forgotten there by one of the field workers who had attended the match. It almost made him miss it, before it pushed through, the gangrene starting on the ground. Canon started his weird motions, looking as close as a dancer would, leaping in order to avoid his toes becoming tiny blocks of cinderblocks inside the field of spikes below him.

‘Careful there, don’t lose your legs.’

‘What, why would I?’

He landed on top of the frame around the second they started moving in. He grabbed one of the largely forming conical spikes that fattened out of the original nails. Not even Hatt could’ve prevented it. They immediately started going into opposite directions.

‘The flower, look back at it.’

In the midst of the missdirection, he had lost it, allowing it to float around momentarily before it landed on a hard patch of air. Enough distance had been taken already by both of them. Twenty feet from one another at the very least, before the competition had arrived. It was grand, but not as much as he'd like it to be. It was the body of a fighter that had come out of the ground, completely encompassed by the same material as the floor, spikes around the body, and cut around the flower which couldn't have been worse for the wear. In his lack of a plain spirit, he chased the fighter but stopped before the fence. The entire stadium had been completely and unequivocally twisted like a sphere of glass, an illusion which pushed around.

'What do you want to do about this?'

'I don't know.'

But the frenzy kicked in nonetheless, as he stepped only in a few centimeters at a time. His body convulsed as his hands press harder on the air. The atmosphere changed, and all of the sudden, he started at it again. The fence was flatly placed as the ground underneath him, and before the fiend of stone could touch him, he made for the stone jugular, pushing in with the same amount of force generated by a heavyweight boxer, crushing the neck and the head in a hard attempt to finish him before he erected himself from the half-a-body he had become on the ground.

Hatt's two legs were twisted as he looked about the place. In the time it took Canon to smash the man, he had picked up a few flies by hand and started throwing them like tiny pops of corn. They bounced around the seats and started pushing on through them, like small minded moles. Forcing themselves through the plastic, they became winged. In sight, the seats started flying and making wild sounds, as if they were alive.

Seeing this happen, Canon grabbed and ripped a pair of stone fingers and threw them out like tiny blades, making sure the chairs were taken down before they had the chance to finally take off.

'Is this what you wanted?'

'I'm still not sure what I want.'

He looked at the blood running down his fingernails. There was some disquiet there, seeing the past flashing through his eyes. Walking near him he decided he had enough of this place, but not before bending half-way through and finishing what was started. A single punch, obtuse but heavy had lain again the stone-athlete's head. Half of it, in the back looked as if it had been made out of plastic, the same one which had been taken from the chair. As Canon started turning it around, he noticed the other materials that had been drawn from the surrounding area in order to form him. Iron, some highly degradable silver and most importantly some unnatural insects that started gnawing around one another now that they were freed from the heaviness he extruded.

A pair of strap-like depressions were present in his chest, they were shaped like belts, which made him weary of checking. But it was indeed the same model as the one he had on him before. The buckle had a distinct model which bore the sign of a horned skull-face, a symbiosis of the kin which appeared to be spreading all around the stone, plastic, iron and even the roach-flies that were trapped inside of it, akin to their ancient mold, of prehistoric folds. It neared a time where there was no distinguishable feature from him and everyone else. Thousands of them appeared, but not fully erect, only in part of the ground, as their chests heads and arms still held on. Some were completely made out of stone, others had been surrounded or encased in the metal legs below the chairs and even the mill was there, twist and turning as it pushed the wind away.

Immediately infuriated as anyone with half a brain would be, Canon appeared in front of Hatt and started slapping him around. There was something close to some disquiet between the two of them and that did not even begin to shove a mark inside his throat. It was completely out of question to ask him, but how had he appeared in the first place.

‘Why’s the stadium empty?’

‘Because of people like me who show up and make trouble.’

‘I take it you regret something you’ve done before?’

‘You’re barely scartching the surface here. But you can follow.’

‘It’s not like I can be stopped any longer, now, can I? I took your name after all, which has to mean somehting.’

Canon flicked his locks, they were thinning by the second. He carried a few bullets which had been lined through them, like flocks or strings of laundry mats caught in spiked clothespins, clearly appearing in his skin and moving. Slowly enabled to eat where they did not belong.

‘Coward.’

Hatt ran away before he could grab a hold of him. IT was this strange fellow who first saw that the sky was missing, and his instinctive reaction was to make a run for it. A horse ran in, a mule and a bull, all of them stopped from the charge to reveal that they had been beheaded twenty minutes ago. Dead eyes looked back into the prison of stone below them. Soon they bled and shot out tiny solid rivers that almost blinded Canon as he made his way out. The man had to scrape himself through them before looking back as their inflaing bodies. Backed by a desire to hid, he turned around the corner and masked himself from the pain which was generated in the back. All of the animals came out it boar-explosions which revealed the bloody face dissipating in the air.

He was back on the street and through the crowd he saw not a single sign of Hatt. He got away, but he could still feel his prying eyes coming from somewhere. It was a certainty not even he could deny or avoid, despite prior attempts. It was a sign, proof that there was still some hot-blood flowing through his veins. Hern took it on himself to search for this second city on top the roof-top. Most of the members had been recalled, most of the soldiers were gone, which left only rumors of the existence of a few children who were lost.

But if there was somehting farther away from this, it was theirs. Theirs was a heavier chain to drag.

‘We are evil, but would you consider this for a moment?’

Worthiness was a disease they could not fathom touching.

‘Cowardly arrogance, that’s all bothering you, isn’t it? A bit of pain here and there, the mad and.’

Suddenly the conversation stopped. They were approached.

Like a canon fire, he barely stopped before he could push through them and rot.

‘Is there no other way we could settle this?’

One hundred and fifty two feet away out of the stadium, a couple was sharing a pack of cigarettes.

Sweating pig rotations, wheels which had goose-throat at every swirl. They created small whirls which pulled in some people, which were drawn like metal coins to magnets, stopping at their throat-level until they created small puff-fish familiar sights. And they puffed even harder as they started floating everywhere around. No one appeared to mind what was going on. Nothing was wasted as long as some people died. Courtesy to everyone who looked ahead and decided nothing was worth it, let alone passing by. A rabid creole person, as dumb as a rock came. She got on her kneed and begged.

‘Please let me in.’

But she was denied. The reason was that the wheels were intelligent and they only desired those who were the strongest, most efficient, those who have evolved their minds. Pain could not leave when there as quiet, nor would they be able to babble when condensed. A supression of their feelings faded and soon she begged no more, instead, having chosen to run on the street, she chose to leap forward. Thrice entold, though that was the least, most importantly no beast of a man would look around, no wool or sound could make them loom around for long, disgusted. Too many thing took his eyes away.

‘Where is he? He’s a man and he looks like.’

Canon thought about Hatt for a moment. By the likes of him, he could not even fathom what he looked like withotu any reasonable sight or any amount of wonder.

‘He isn’t here.’

Talking out loud, he shot himself in the leg and wanted to stop there.

He turned back to the stadium and left the sight immediately and hid.

Why was that?

He tried his best to do something but he couldn’t help it any longer.

Hatt seemed to be the only one who gave voice to his thoughts. Without him he didn’t know what he was doing. Whether or not he said anything or it all meant nothing. He had so many memories he wanted to share, and so much pain he had to get away from. They hurt, his fists. They were red, almost swollen from hitting. And he wanted to tell him but not the others, but he wasn’t there.

It was the first time he returned to where it started, even if everything only happened minutes ago. He didn’t do much any longer.

But it stung the most. Not being able to do this right. He ran towards the middle of the field and began punching everything again, hoping he'd get any result. But he hadn't. They were even bloodier, but by the time he would make it outside, no one would notice. Certainly no one else but him.

Where was that famed compassion and where were all its children lost? Fewer, fewer people were gathering in the upper-zone where the stratter-sphere came into a bubble-head. Giant fetus-brows could only spew enough blood-iron to increase in size.

'Could you be haunted in the skin? If you were to make a single cut that pushed through, would you happen to mess around a trail of ancestors you inherited in your blood?'

'Something got into you lately?'

How could it be maintained for so long? There was so much of it through the street, a mania which had become as violent as it would possibly get. Tension could be felt through muscle and bone. And bones were plenty, being spread around, a miasma of emotion that made them happy and they bit and sliced and pushed one another into the ground.

'Make a lot of noise, show some pain. Then try at it again.'

A slight consideration ended, they started drawing their teeth out, pointing at one another as they took aim. Then the first shone. It lighted the surrounding bushes as each molar came off and leaped about the place in anger.

There in the distance, he wondered when he might come around. Loop of lumps, into a large intestine-like body that looked like the corpse of a spiked man from which a giant scorpion tail pushed on to grow out of his neck in order to become a man of its own, armless, legless, limbless with only one head at one of the beads coming out of the tail-like giant overgrown tendon. An arm apparently pushed out of its right primordial man biopsy, which bore an organic skull instead of a shoulder. From the looks of the two malevolent giant fiddling fingers, those could be misconstrued as being legs by an on-looker.

From its muscular chest there popped a pair of eyes, surreal-looking, with a pair of teeth and a tongue coming out of the opposite side of the other arm. Going through the disembodied trunk, a giant round and vacuous eye would stand between two split tails like that of a syren. But from one of the syrene tails, a many toothed face emerged, bearing two miniscule eyes and the fever that spread through its outlandish body, as well as the many gazing eyes that dripped with an ivory substance.

As it erected itself on its back, the strange, yet peculiar way in which it was employing its winged spikes served as wind-signalers which only dreaded itself more. A mad belief appeared to extract its body out of the mad-frame it had pushed itself onto. Now that this wild creature appeared in the middle of the crowd, like a strange ghastly thing which did not even come upon anything else, it started producing the pig-wheels out of its wild compressed. Wild and large, impressive and unaccounted for, they started chopping the nearest human beings in halves neither of them had even been aware of. Madly encased, the beings had no faces, those that appeared were nothing more but the servants of gibberish, the after thoughts, the wild erased humanity. Apes that were given birth in existence on the spot and there was nothing wild and nothing worse than was what going on there.

Nothing to see. Especially that wild prick that could not be found any longer, whatever his problem was, he was not one of the kind, he was a blind fool and a maddened tool that refused to come along when needed. Who could blame him and who could believe that what was going on was even remotely heeded or asked. Cracked on the whip of a sickle, the creature embodied disease. It was distressed because it waited too long and confessed to nothing else but the most maddening of perilous speeches it had heard while manifesting in different worlds.

‘I have dreamed of a town, it was lost but no one about it appeared to live, not in the same way human beings had.’

At which he smiled, having gathered and garnered their attention, this was nothing less but a victory of its own. But clearly something happened, and nothing could be denied. Despite that mouth being filled with the most unfathomable lies, there was no denying, no crying and yet to be.

Canon rised himself on his feet and came back to his sense.

‘But where is that man? Where is Hatt? He couldn’t have claimed my name in vain and left the spot we were supposed to meet at when we left the train of thoughts.

Nothing about it should make any sense, but I feel as if there’s another way.’

To which he took the first turn, he lost about eight gallons of sugar in his blood returning but at least he was still on the streets. Afterwards, there was quiet. Enough for a difference to be made, this was the impotency of masses, the ones that were dulled down stood erect and listened to the creature as soon as it pushed itself in the nearest corner, an entrance be entranced.

‘I’m here.’

He gave himself away, the foolish one, he was, without bearing any consideration for those around him or what that meant. If anything, he could simply set himself in place, like a pillar, eternally forlorn and lost. Unable to contain anything, even less of what went on, whilst they picked, and pricked two fingers, even less for him to see, he had achieved nothing of value, merely crushing his fist through them as if they were nothing. Less than that, the mad-man awakened. This so far had been set. It was a symbol of the meaninglessness he had displayed and those around them who decayed.

But then Canon chose to dance, to their songs and nothing but glance. His palms had flown around the men, hitting no one but instead pushing them away. Waves of wind on either side, not to deny that was was happening was nothing to be joked upon. Least of all, he felt the disaster that was to come from both fronts, it leaped about the place, never to be embedded by those who wore no faces.

‘But who shall sing you if you find? I cannot be around you, blind. Foolish person that you are, can’t you see that searching for me leads to nothing? Nowhere might you find me. ‘

‘Why won’t you make some sense, god damn you?

I think I grew attached to you for some reason but I’m extremely confused.’

‘Don’t fight it then and give up.’

But he couldn't, not after pushing some more people on the ground and groping in the wrong places. As soon as it happened, he thrust each foot on top of another and appeared to leap higher until he glided right in front of the creature, the maw of despair being fully presented. In front of him, where the road had been completely crashed, where the cracks revealed the flames and the plunged beneath the trash that hid beneath the earth, he saw an entry, a look down to the girth of the underground passage. Mourning not the least his mind dictated not even the slightest hope he'd be entrance.

'I see that I have failed to feel it.'

'Keep trying.'

The voice of Hatt said. It was reassuring, somewhat. Senseless wonders, that's what they were. It was disgusting and disturbing, seeing those happen. It was as if all the line swere completely drawn unfairly. It was a show, on-lookers being placed like planks, played upon as they lost control of themselves. Forth came one of them, wondering out loud. As freociously quiet as he were, wrapping his fists as they drew out their crested resting devices. Too many had fallen then, unable to control themselves after carrying around. A slim chance to none, as long as it seemed, lay somewhere near their.

'Another passage has been opened below. It is the old town, which has been thought to be lost to us, in prior days.'

There was a dissident running away. Good thing he wasn't there to see the rest happening. They were trying to pace faster.

Confusion

His kaleidoscope eyes merged with the long protruding head that erupted from his chest. Two large inflated, molded. He was there to inspect them.

For every tvbox inside the storage area there twenty or thirty stored people inside, whistling as they started creeping in and out in order to show a view. A glance came from one of them least important handlers. They were out of it now, pleased with the munching. Only the bottom few had died constantly, being sufferers of the mild mold, golden in honey-like crumbs that had been eaten through. It was this condition which perturbed them. There in the taking, the filth had encompassed their beings at they dragged on.

'I need to have a drink from them.'

Their insides were scoured through. It passed. On and on they turned around, they were only trying to escape not too long ago. Make sure it doesn't happen again.'

It was a given, this promiscuous pleasure of pushing in.

Knuckle-head dragger came around now.

He presented himself to the strange inspector, who was with the company, there was no introduction there.

‘Let me tell you about that one time I threatened my mother with a knife, when I almost stabbed my cat.’

It’s been some time since it happened and the man had little comprehension about the events and he could not distinguish reality from his psychosis. He had a perfect recollection of everything which happened to the slightest detail down to a perfect photographic memory.

It was an emotion unlike any other, weeping aloud, as the house was being set up for him to get through. As he recollected every string of sight, he remembered the chasm which was his home. Although it looked somewhat stumped and preieval, there was a charm of its own.

But was there even a point to it any longer? They knew, as much as it was destined to be that everything was poisoned, all the unfathomable speeches and the writings and the varied filth that made it into the writing and in the dark canon and the other. Nothing would be spared from the unnatural thing that had been theirs for too short a time in placing. No more obscure conviction could be held aghast.

It was done, they were shaking, tramped in the head, all of them facing one another like blasted things, inflated minds, maddening themselves as the times passed.

‘It was I, my lord, who gave him the God-box, in honor of the trapped God who had been set inside his square prison. And it was still I who would not look down upon this joy of madness.’

An elevated joy surrounded him, in the air, pronounced like a mind-blow cancer stroke which gave him the high.

‘I see now, shall we talk? I feel as if you’ve passed on the knowledge I have instilled onto you and have become a fully pledged knight of degeneracy.’

As lord Agamemnon had commanded, to his magnetic people, skin of metal flakes and machine-turbulation instead. He who had been the master of cretins faded and they could not fathom it at all. It was an insatiation which only bred them in masses. This being needed to invoke, not feeling would forlorn him now, no reason of his own to cather to the dread that came to him today.

Twenty more days he spent wonderingly caught, wrapped in a mass. He stopped and wondered.

‘What has heppened to my mind? I felt it then? A few days ago, I think I felt a surge of power and emotion which had stagnated within.’

To it, he felt unevenly morose, for what appeared next to him. It was a change he did not consider encountering, an apparition, a mental block. A piece of dirt-square which had squabbled through which took him out of the light of day, until he spent the night writing on the surroundings walls, pushing the thorns out and waiting.

‘What had happened?’

‘You dreamed of something evil. You failed to fall asleep. And in that half-lucidity you have decayed in the mind and have realised something about your filthy, unfathomable fantasies.’

‘But that’s not how I am.’

‘You are ours nonetheless. Now there’s no hope that you may escape from the pandemonium, the fear is here. You may go.’

Going along the road, he shattered his mind with a metal pick before taking the wrong turn around the town.

‘Hello.’

‘I haven’t seen you in a while. How’s life been for you?’

‘It’s been awful, I feel drenched and disgusting, look at me and what I’ve become.’

He had been ashamed to be looked down by Hern. The Compatriot had well recovered and was soon looking around as his turn had come around him. It made him want to luck out. So many children lay dead on the streets, the flies being in windows and he was still the same man. As he had been before, he couldn’t count his fingers off but recalled meeting him on a lonely street from which he had partaken in this pized event.

‘The taking of the pig-head, who shall do it?’

‘I shall, sir.’

Pinned down, all around, they crept around the sound. Shame, that they listened now, they were cruel, how they messed with the swine.

‘They grow so fast and fare well in life, don’t they?’

‘You talking about pigs?’

‘Nay, I’m talking about the children.’

It was maniacal how so many of the flies had bred inside the children and started taking them into the upper holds of their sky-kingdoms where they hid their giant human-nests.

And they formed a giant cut-like face that would be worn by a nasty criminal on the streets of London. In pierced eyes, they found solace, where most of the flies died and got replaced instead by their distance puckors that had given birth, instead, to worn-out cackling mules. Prudes that would be dying over and falling off with the rest of the debris of scum.

A buffoon, full of costume, dressed in green, but not the normal green like grass cutlery, but synthetically made, entirely fused from the soles of his face, to the suit with the eyes gaping out of the piece of rotten cloth that had completely covered his mouth. Feeling the vein callouses remain there over a while. Something was still missing.

The irony was silver in his veins. He was in some unknown country named as Vilverline. Dully watching some of the clothes hanging on their sweet swollen robes, he searched for a word in another place. He saw her, the Doucchess, who was in her prime a widow to the late deceased Forrage. It was a common thing there.

Was this what happiness tasted like?

Cold orange on a stroll, there was the caller of the old death coming.

The hours passed in vein. None of them, or at least none that mattered would ever so solely shake themselves off from the stump, the plain thing being this, it was simply adorned in his mind. He was different then, for some reason. So much so, around them and there was too much noise going around. No one was willing to make a pass.

‘Then you shall be the one responsible for everything, shall you not?’

‘But what does that mean?’

‘It means I support only the slightest amount of pain if it means going around and cutting. You should curb your nails, like they used to do in days of hunger and get in the pack.’

His face was coming in, way too close through the moving machenite. It was almost done now, as the light coming from the pushing light, the solemn moon had stopped attending and the power almost drowned the sight uncannily caught inside and contained. By the main generators, his arms emerged, barely pushing as they attempted to eat at his throat before he had attained his second head. Thence he leaped, crawling with the sides. He hadn’t the strength to lift himself up and it appeared as if his lips had become the color of opal.

‘May I come in then?’

Ethias, the half of an Etriarch of skin had finally arrived through the condenser. To the men staring at him, he appeared as nothing else but a fluke of a body, one which shouldn’t have belong there. For the amount of scum which scuffled and was generated inside of him, he was rather, unpleasant. Taken for some time off, he was trying to eat his own liver out but failed terrible.

‘Something went wrong with this experiment. I cannot feel the lower side of my body. I’m unable to regrow it under any circumstance. What have you done to me?’

‘Calm down, that’s only a side-effect, nothing more, it should run out.’

‘Run out, what have you done to my body exactly?’

There was a calm stare which followed in whichever direction he appeared to point at. They were dry in the teeth, if that made any difference whatsoever. It was only as eventful as it would get now, since they tried getting him as far away from the machine, there hadn’t been an excuse for it. His constant suffocation in the warehouse was the second sign that he was being contained, trapped, left to rot in the mind. Of course there would be no saying and chatter.

It was the head of a dog-looking cat that was made out of the bottle of a molotov cocktail which rested on a blunt trunk which had nothing more than a long tendril-system which rooted the floor. Its eyes were large, serpentine and revealed an unafathomable pattern of numbers and shapes that threw themselves in its pupil. He was the insides of the island, near the nest which was the manor which governed the land. He produced an uncanny dimension in which nothing else was being produced but the dye, as wild as it were, without a way in, they thought about it, the people present there. You looked at them once and you figured it out, they were dressed fancy. With robes made out of their predecessors, the giant leaping strangely bio-enchanted evolution off-shot that would look like something struck between a combination of various geometrical shapes struck together and a few amphibian creatures that spiked around their heads.

‘As an addict, I think I should speak the loudest here since I got the most experience out of everyone.’

‘You got a few shots on me, but honestly, I’m more experienced than you are in every possible field that ever existed. See how I can bend matter?’

He thought about it for a moment. Just by the swindling of a, of a.

‘What’s wrong?’

‘I can’t feel it yet.’

Mad stuppor Pox

In a small lane, where the last trough was still being used on Penny street, it seemed like there was no closure. Days were passing with the sun and they were only trying to run around with each passing of the word. They were crawling upon false feet, trying not to cut one another as they pissed the cordon watchers, those who were trying to knip the blood in the drenches that were dug around. For in those drenches hid a few busy-bodies who could not deal with the disease that was being spread around. In the epitome of their creation, they were damned with the only thing that remained in their mind. A cortex that was being harmed by a giant nail that constantly entered him without telling of what went in and what went out. A disease about the size of a giant tumor that became him, it became them, it was shape of a fully grown anatomical body. It was alike to man. In his glory then, they could not fathom going around. They passed the pain. It haunted them for long, shorter than expected. They shared no reason and no wound for what seemed to be longer, much longer and less alive. Neither of them knew what to expect then, for the servants were used to mine.

‘Twenty more men shall be used for this, what do you think of it?’

‘I think you’re only trying to make me feel bad, worse than that. Can’t you see a way out without sacrificing more men?’

‘And who might we use then? Our local Negroes had been driven to death by exhaustion. What does that leave us with?’

‘Can’t you get another batch of slaves?’

‘Not this time around of year, I think you’re really pulling for something, you’re stretching out the cantors.’

And that was for a good reason as well. They feared those strange men. No one could ever proceed to see or even fathom men who had brain portions of bodies. They multiplied in the air for no reason whatsoever, like flies. Worst of all, it could not be called onto them at all, it could not be purged from the mind, this unhappiness and the blindness coming out of the blind surroundings.

It was maddening how they polluted the air. How they spread and how it made it so, peculiar to look at. They floated and left the mines to their surroundings. And most of the mines started imploding with skin until it could not be necessary any longer for human beings to be preserved and saved. Seaward, looked upon, you could see every single one of them being worn out. With every blade, humans would come out of the fire. They would be reconstructed regardless of the skin-disease and the mad forms they produced and felt against their weird legs. It was uncanny, trying to explain it or even try fighting it any longer. Many other procedures started cutting through them, lest of all, could it be gotten. In the mind they would be forgotten. Frog-pox, like pesticide, it spread around and grew on the exploding humans forming in the air and into the ground. Sometimes the new-slaves would simply go ahead and mine through them in order to get as far as they could be allowed to.

Somehow they were not able to do it, not then, not when it was needed. Walking on strange surrounding holes and the paranoid brain-holes that emerged from their hearts only blow them out of proportion. It ate them like wild leppers, then and now, lost but not abound. They were dead to them and everyone around. Not even the owners cared about them any longer.

‘What do you want, then? They were yelling, shouting, trying to get through.’

‘Can’t you see it now? You should take this chaos in and bed with it. Just get over yourself and enjoy the chaos we created.’

‘But I cannot do it. Not.’

‘Listen and relax, we already won. There’s been a prime, everything’s been created now, there’s no hope that we may outdo what our ancestors did. Enjoy it while it lasts.

No one’s going to bother us from now on, just look around you.’

A mine-field where they mined beneath a stone wall-cave filled with some abandoned drilling machines and various other metal-achievements, animals that were stoned, carved, dead and encaved in mollusk-skin and the dead negroes. What else was there to hope for? To long for the achievements of the past was nothing more than a wakeful thing, a bid that was being played with for far too long. IT lead to nowhere, no satisfaction and nothing else being brought back.

‘I see.’

‘And who are you now? I seemed to have lost it.’

‘It doesn’t matter, neither of us has a first name, which means no bloodline and nothing to fight for. Who’s going to take care of my children.’

‘Brother, they’re dead, you killed them in a wakeful slumber, of a drunken rage where you aped around and put your wife into a grave.’

Of greater terror as well as in her coffin rested a bunch of perched bones. They had slowly eaten and tortured his wife as she was being buried alive. Case and point, Pox, he was.

It’s been a while since his young days when he had come around like a nomad with the Rock-us gang. Somehow, they had still the greatest memories up to date. No more frustration to meet them. It was all in his head and there was little to no satisfaction to be derived instead. Now who would make it? Certainly not Pox, he realised it before everyone else.

‘Say, I think I remember who you are.’

He spoke about it in the past and in some way, he remembered who this fellow was, even though it was somehow, reluctantly to say it, a chance in a million that they both ended up here by taking the wrong door in the Residence. The Snake, that’s who he was.

‘Of course, now I know you.’

But, listen, listen, I have to tell you something. Since Rock-us ain’t here, I’ve, I’ve been thinking of something.’

‘What?’

‘I have realised that I have developed a strong revulsion towards females. I cannot help it, I simply loathe them and their presence. They’re the most cowardly creatures, they have no loyalty and they would betray their people with no excuse whatsoever.’

‘Have you spoken with someone about this?’

‘Yes, I have spoken with one of the Gods, and they have showed me the truth of the matter. You cannot fathom what kind of knowledge they have imparted on me throughout the ages.’

Pox often fantasized about forcefully engaging into various sexual acts with unwilling women, abusing them both physically and mentally, gagging them, pushing them around the corner, tapping their privates against stone-wall, eating them after slicing various parts which had been infested with the disease he carried and malnourishing their breasts to the point where they became uncannily drowned in his own pus. He feared no one, he was brave, courageous and never took a bath. Pox was a man now. He fantasized a lot.

He took a few steps away and began yelling:

‘Joy, joy, joy, joy, joy, joy, joy, joy, joy, joy, joy, joy, joy, joy, joy!’

He realised it then. It could not be ignored or forlong again. It was a pitiful realisation he could not do without. Shouting around the plance, he wanted out.'

It waned after a while as he didn't know the cause of it. Some reason here, one there, just about the place. They settled on discussing about all the strange things they recalled. Their olden days and everything around their exploits from around their band, whereas nothing could be settled on for too long without them noticing what went on. Both of them were much calmer despite what the circumstances dictated. Whatever's worth bent out of their heads, like a dying passion that couldn't be remembered when it dawned on. It was the seeting in which they met here, the broken cog that refused to move on and mix with the rest of the devices.

Pox remembered having met a woman on the way. As usual, he approached her, just like the style demanded, and just how he wanted to do it.

'Hey there, you wouldn't happen to be lost now, would you?'

'I am, you're real aren't you?'

Cheesy, she was way too cheesy and she knew if not as quickly as it was demanded that there was a reson they did not act sooner on the act. Whether or not they wanted to move around, or let it go, that was theirs. It was no fault of either part, that they cherished some needle rack in the born-throd. A spine crawled after. Some of the lower holes that appeared in the ground were like hives, in the worst possible manner. It waghered an attention, to be more specifict about it. He was not like he used to be, and they were both trying to piss each other off.

What she had seen down there clearly marked her for something as disturbing, as jealous at it were. It was the force which drove her on. To make a step and take another, she was disgusted and lost a brother. It felt that way, so she told Pox.

'While making my way towards one of the lower levels, where the shafts are crossed, there's this depression, I think it's a tunnel that leads to an underground bar. My brother went there, making a simple excuse such as. My dear sister, I will return to you once I'll have taken care of some bussiness I have to deal with.'

To which not even Pox could deal with any longer. He was more than disturbed about it, that she would even propose or make such marks. It went too far now and he wanted her to stop talking. With every second that passing feeling like the mark of the hour, every damn single time and after every sentence she spoke, his mind crossed that threshold where he wanted to strangle and murder her in cold blood. But that quickly wanted and by now it would be premeditated. And she recalled other things, like women did. Way too many times, she couldn't stop it. Talking and talking about the most meaningless matters a creature like her could yapp about. It was horrowing, it was blasphemous, allowing a female to talk.

Most horrible of diseases stemmed from her and the pain he had to go through after listening to the recollections of what she went through to get here and what she was on about.

'I was a slave, I had been put in a barrel, they wanted me dead, I'll tell you and I cannot help it. But I feel so much pain now, I was freed you know? You wouldn't understand how horrible I was treated.'

Yapp, yapp, yapp, he could see it in her eyes. She was not human in a sense, cut around the skull, she wasted not a second more to recall. He was dared. Pox, beware. He took a step back, took out his railer and shot her between her eyes, watching how she slowly faded. It was mostly earned. Diseased with many pearls and beads of blood that carried on to create Crete, the entire island in the form of a disease that became her body as it opened, split and reconnected joints. Of course he thought of it as nothing less than what it was, hard-earned and less than likened. Much more that it would be addressed there, both him and Pox felt nothing about this story whatsoever.

The Snake thought about it for a moment. He would, wouldn't he?'

'I think she deserved it, for daring to back-track her way like that.'

'But listen here, The Snake, she still has a brother out there, unless he's somewhat dead. Don't you think he'll try finding her and enact revenge upon me?'

'Maybe he will, but can you trust yourself not to fall for it?'

'What do you mean?'

'I mean what if she had no brother and what if she made that entire story up only to mess with you, my friend?'

Consider this, for me, at least. You need to sleep on it and think for the longest hour in your life. And listen carefully because this part is incredibly important and you might miss it unless you pay enough attention.

We have to be careful here, as well because I seriously, in all honesty as there's honor between thieves, that she's only lied to you.'

'Like every woman does.'

Pox was mightily proud of the last statement. Even aroused by some means, and if there was something in this world, it was his unaware mind which made everything better. Being much and well versed into all the intonations and the damned feelings that crushed his taking, he took the soles out. He looked around the place. The ground was shaking. Someone was coming.

One of the slaves had arrived; the human-braided brain of his changed until he had become a flask of crystal-like surfaces which made it easier for the flies to cross the path and mess around their newly found hive. Something was extremely immature, or puerile about this creature. Downright insolent as well, collecting the pieces of scalp that were buried by the wild man-dogs that had been done eating the bodies of the natives.

It was dangerous being around them for too long. Both Pox and the Snake were weary of it, as much as time would allow them. A wrong turn and everything would be done for. As much as they wanted a reprise, it could be done. He was becoming violent. Too violent to be contained, he shook violently, his skin bumped itself and waddled up and down as if some people, some prisoners were shoved inside of him, unable to be released by any means. And they could be seen from the popping tartar of hellish blots that kept draining themselves out of him at time.

He was spotted with disappearing holes that would be seen for seconds before going away, like manifestations of portals that pushed the clots away. As they hardened, soon they started appearing in the air, holding inside of them only the smallest beating hearts. About each one there was a small extensions of a cord-like umbilical knot that soon started feeding and cradling them like children of their own. The beast, this particular beast was mesmerised by the written messages he found on the scalps. Someone had taken the time to write and they did write a lot. Like a maddened person who couldn't even hope to handle what went through his mind. He looked sickishly in awe. Like a sheep, wool had become his skin as soon as it could be seen by either of them that it had become something close or nearing barbed wire. And from inside of him, his chest exposed, a ribcage that wasn't organic started producing tunes and wild intonations that could not be held to the unaware and untrained ear with any hope that he might recognise it.

They avoided one another and couldn't fathom trying to father each other. For another one of the slaves came near. Some reason here, some reason there and no one knew why they stopped working. It was a still, a union which was unearned. How could they stop working? They were dumb, mindless, lazy by nature, yet this behaviour had been instilled in them. It made no sense otherwise that they would become so tirelessly moronic. It brought shame even to those who watched.

Pox's skin was warm but It crawled about the place one he realised that there was no saying he could get in.

'A schizophrenic rabble, that's what they're reading.

I've tried going through one of those writings but I failed. It's all nonsense I tell you.'

'Yet they're there, reading it, aren't they?

Of course they are, that's why I wouldn't cross them.'

And what could they do about the place? It wasn't likely that they would cross themselves or run away. They were aware of the danger and what came with it so far. There was no specific force that made them do the things they wanted to. No specific action that might be taken either, only this thing.

'Can we focus on it for more than a few seconds?'

No more scenes than that. They went through the rabble without the slightest danger being around. It felt like they were trying each other's nerves out but they couldn't pinpoint the reason for it.

What could they be doing there?

It was just a slight idea so far, but what if they actually knew or what if they could make out what the schizophrenic babble actually meant to them? It could be a secret message which was supposed to be carried from one slave to another, which meant they were actually intelligent. And that was nothing to be jested about. Just as a mere thought, if they somehow developed their own language and if they were the ones that planted those pieces of scalp-lust, in that case it could not be denied that they had a share in everything which went wrong into the world.

They could be the oratories, the one that planted the roots that made everyone mad.

‘I saw it, before.’

But not even Pox wanted to say it out loud because what it implied. Just as a mere thought, he knew that planting evil people and the bodies of scoundrels would make everyone on the planet progressively viler. If there was something and some way to get rid of the degeneracy, of the violence and everything even solely related to it, you had to burn it. You had to completely erase and purify it, and then spread the ashes until they became naught, for even then the violence would spread, but at that level it could at least be manageable.

And he had also managed to find something about them. They were an uncanny race of experimental archetypes that were unlike any kind of genetically imbued servant that this world had ever seen. Somehow they had been created as a mockery of the darks in the likes of their bodies, but their brains were that of some specifically selected from filthy apes. Despite the clear difference, in which the apes had clearly shown greater intellect, this worked for a greater deal of time. Until this had been revealed. The news of the dire being only the fact that they brought them down. Before anything could be said, or more of it observed, both Pox and the Snake turned their railer and took them down. Two long shots broke and smoked their small brains and from the looks of it, as they popped out, the small men inside of their cortex finally stopped shaking and died off.

‘What a disturbing thing, isn’t it? Wouldn’t you consider something like this as being a shameful loss?’

‘I would most definitely think of it this way. Say, I think I remember a day and a time when we lived better, don’t you? Have you ever considered that we had a better life out there?’

Long before we stepped on the property around the Residence, and long before we met the master of the house. I seem to think the same thing and I cannot help it any longer but weep every single time a memory of home pops in.

My dear Pox, I’ve never felt this before and I think it’s a stronger emotion that not even you could generate in all of your hatred for them.’

‘It is great, isn’t it? As I said, as much as I’d like hunting all of the slaves down, nothing compares to hitting a woman. The knuckle and the back of my hand, making contact time after time on a field of dead women, you couldn’t fathom what’s going on through my mind now.

There’s this release in my chest and in my mind. It’s justice I tell you, a reaction to what’s been happening around the world lately. I think that’s the reason I joined the gang in the first place. I simply couldn’t take it any longer. And every time it happened, a part of me died in the most irresponsible manner. I could not fathom going on for too long, you know?’

‘Of course Pox, of course, I think you’re truly lost, even though you’re my friend. My reasons were slim and meaningless, I only joined to have some fun.

Now I’d like to return one day, knowing that there’s a warm home waiting for me, a woman and a child as well. But what of you Pox?

You say you’ve degenerated enough to hate them in all their wild and mad incarnation. I cannot help but look down on you with pity and contempt. I know you shouldn’t be that way, but unfortunately I cannot change you. Just as I cannot change them, poor things; I know this because, after looking at myself and reflecting upon my every action, I have failed in many regards.

Perhaps I would've ended up just like you, but instead I chose to turn my back and look towards a darker path to exploit my emotions.'

The Snake enjoyed bear-biting. More so, he liked pinning various species of snakes against cats and dogs in a show of strength which could not be helped, since it did him way too great a pleasure now, striking at them while they were down. Never helping it, even though he liked pushing it down their throats, which was his second factor.

After the animals were down, or after they were hurt enough, he simply lay down with them, the same a man and a woman would. Of all the gang, he was the mildest one as well. Since this all happened outside the boundaries of decency, and just about the town, no one knew what he was doing, not even his wife or child. It went on for too long now. He wasn't bothered by it. This was likened in the various inklights that had been pressed around his body. The Snake was marked.'

'Will we get rid of the bodies then? '

'No, observe.'

Taking a few steps back, he shot a single bolt that made a tiny explosion in one of their heads. A giant human imploded and formed out of their bodies instead. That should conceal and strike the deal as nothing more than an accident since both of them had actually went through a mad process known as reciprocal symbiosis. Since he was a new-born, it would take too long for him to realise what was going on. Both of them were safe that way, no one would know what's wrong or what happened when they had been out of their way.

A shot of penicillin later and they were back in.

'I suppose we should head towards that underground resort and meet this brother the woman was talking off.'

'You don't say a thing like that without being prepared. Do you have any idea how armed he could be?'

'Should it actually matter, Pox? We've been through much worse and from the looks and the feels of it, this is only going to get much worse than it. So you'd better prepare for it.'

Henceforth, their belief in the Constition faded. For every set of mark and work, for every passage, amendment was just about the place. It was a deception, a rule of cut fingers. They bloated themselves with a disease and walked like conjoined twins, too close to one another, towards the resort.

And in it, things got worse.

How could time pass so wildly outside? Why, there a dinner out there which served an empty table each day at the same hour. Why was that? There was a reason in itself, for which the maidens were tested and least of all, was it expected for every second to be checked. As every now and then, everyone would miss it. But the food and the served drinks would simply dissapear without giving in a single light that would be shed. The moths had almost passed there, yet seconds in the ground didn't matter. Everything went so much slower down and by the time the last order was carried, one of the people present would die.

But who would make the first move?

Carpent was old, he was misunderstood, he was morose and a drunk by now. His drinking buddy, the Satyr could not satiate his fear of knowledge, and he had catalogued every kind of booze and plunder they received. Why was it that what they had received was so tasty?

'We call this drink a Dina.'

Hours of torture flashed into the barman's mind. He only allowed a single smile to pass his lips and the dry cold drink erupted in the wild. It was not as disgusting as it seemed. His problems had yet to take form in one way or another. In other words, as Pox managed to put it twenty years forth in only a few seconds, he hit it. He hit the spark, he lit the matches and no one cared about some lost bar, where something happened and they drew their skulls open on the rims of the silverware. Most of which were very much fake and imitation. And they'd be damned if they knew a thing. Ribbiting, about the place, they were disgusting and lost to a pair of familiar faces that were focused on.

He was still pumped with so much rage, he was so deranged and no creature could even compare to it. Such an amount of pain couldn't be contained no longer and Pox was looking around only to see the grow fatter.

'Lower your railer, I think it's safe.'

Despite there being no explosion or no heat loss around, they were there, appearing out of nowhere with no amount of repercussion being held. On one side of the wall, his hatred and this passion emerged. It was a wild representation of some wife-beater, him, if he had been born in an alternate world where everything was allowed. He punched that creature and made sure to leave as many pumping holes as there could be, even knowing that from every single one of them, instead of blood, or the sand that was in the frame of the mine, there would be babies. His children, his bastards and those he had not fathered in a while. Embarrassed by it, he looked down.

Unable to be judged by his action and longer, he simply stepped in and started kicking her as well. As if it hadn't been earned enough, this was a somewhat sterile action. It was well earned. It made him feel so well, releasing so much dopamine in his diseased brain. Pox felt satisfied, more so than any woman could do it for him once in a while. As he kicked and punched her, a smile arose. He continued doing it with the help of the other creature as more fists rose from it, spike and wose, some of them no longer resembling arms. And it felt so satisfying hurting them, with every blow molding her into a more deformed caricature which only devolved into something that could not even resemble a human being. She felt so nasty, the woman only degenerated into a pile of unrecognizable forms and shapes that added to her nature. Then she begged, becoming a puddle that united with her children as well. All of them had been trapped, becoming spiked, as they filled themselves with thorns. In need of such protection and satisfaction as the likes of which could never be expanded upon. Looking around now he meant it.

Pox tried, for a moment to impact a child, but even then, as wild and as mad of a disgusting creature as she were, strangely, she protected her young. It was shocking as he stumbled back.

‘Proud of yourself now? Are you finally going to stop it? At this point, I can see why you’ve been driven away even from the gang.’

‘Shut your mouth, both of us ended up here for no other reason than being in the wrong spot at the wrong point in time, from a Residence to another, from the loss and into the gutter in a span of hours if not days.

If it weren’t for you, I think I might’ve culled it sooner.’

He called upon some weakness he held. An addiction that remained with him despite the passing and release of hormones that haunted him until this point, which brought this to The Snake. He searched his backpack, only for a short while, and whilst doing so he found it. A few needles he carried around with him. Most of them were somewhat obscured and forgettable, forged and lost, after a while. But it was important to note that this was no normal substance, or at least it couldn’t have been so. Instead, they appeared to have come from a lost, long, winged creature, who had suffered of some blot-clots. All of them were stuck inside the syringes, but they were still injectable. They would do for now. He was watched, he knew it.

‘Here, have your fun.’

It was distracting, nauseating, how everything continued after the first shot. This was godly, it was taken for granted, everything he’d seen around.

‘I’m a murderer, I’m an assassin, am I not?’

Startled by it, he began laughing as wildly as he could. There were some many other things he’d like to share with this little man but he knew he could only let him take out however he wanted and whenever he was into to. They were deceived by it, or only him.

‘Right on you are, my dear criminal, my good killer, train for the rows and the cutting of toes.’

He kept cackling but he was ignorant in the manner. So many things were happening there, which he could not explain. It felt as if he had been in the mind of a distant, ancient ancestor, or some ultimately obscured parallel being he couldn’t point his finger towards. Various fins could be seen in the walls. Some of them were pools, where the shark-beings, or the human-like fisheries where they produced pearl-eyes started drowning. A drought could be predicted, in a few generations that wouldn’t even be forlorn. For each moment that carried after, they were aware, after a second wind went at home. A disciple enacted one ritual with a lost God, one of the scum ones that wouldn’t even be preserved at that.

Looking around this mess, it was much easier to determine what was going on and who’d be impressed by such inflammatory things. So many dirt spots, in this meeting, under the spot of candles, some may know the kin.

It was one of them. A hooded figure with an inanimate-looking head on top of his real one, old and reddened to the face, as he shrunk at the sight. He was joined by others similar to him. It looked like, for all the purposes in the world, he was alone here, with little left to him to do. Less than that to be sure, it seemed all nastily caught in a web.

He still made sure he would hit the first thing he saw. If his weird senses beat around the right spot, he'd see her. She had to be around, he could feel the perfume.

One of the hooded figures raised an ancient hand.

'That will have to wait for now, do you hear? I can sense your spirit and I know you're not from around the place. I know you came here for a purpose but for now we shall count on you, being without a face of your own.'

As it struck them as perilous and bizarre, how the weirdness of his mouth switched between that of the man and that of the small figure instead. It went through phases, switching minds, they lacked in knowledge and pushed around. A scum of features, better known as they ebbed around the ceiling had been thorn apart by his will alone.

Thence, the strange occultists, looked around. They were out there, like stamps, displaying large canines that would have to do it for now. With every pace and every wonder, their rage grew stronger until they stood agape. It couldn't be contained no longer, hence the meaning, then the contract and the next thing was said.

'You shall follow these instructions and search for this man. Listen you scum-man, you need to do something for one. You need to listen to these clear instructions and kill.'

'A woman.'

What were the chances? He couldn't hold the joy again. Either him or any other, they would feel his insides and the chest expand around again.

'Joy, joy, joy, Joy, joy, joy, joy, Joy, joy, joy, joy, Joy, joy, joy, joy, Joy, joy, joy, joy, Joy, joy, joy!'

Pox almost shouted out of his lungs. With so much of his pain and rage being expelled, he could finally rest and press abound. He finally felt less exposed. And less than that, he decided he would do what he was told. Walk across the river, where you'll find out standing mule. A clear description of the man was given, with his fifty lumps, the hunchback emerged, pairs of eighteen arms for every lump and every hump that came from his back, standing on a trunk that looked as malnourished as the skeleton of a giant cobra, only that it was forked in part like a tongue. He was crested as well, with what seemed to be totems, which were his bone, some of which resembled little men that grew on his back and spoke when he wasn't home.

But home referred to nothing else but the absence of his mind, which happened ever so lately that his similar fits of rage stroke Pox's heart, as he recognised the creature as being something of the kin. Both of them were unable to control their whims and the rage they felt. And both knew better than to seek love out of someone who might not understand them. It was part of their world and the wool their brains were sacked into. It could not be likened to anyone else, the blaster manner.

'And look out when he speaks, his jaw is made out of four triangles. I know it's hard to envision, how they move and expand until they look like spheres or convex cutlasses, but his head needs to open in order for him to pull out the communicator organ.'

It seeked nothing else but a retreat when it's not used, for it's too deranged to be used any other way.'

Voice boxes, all of them inside of it, the rubbery thing, this flaccid phallic object looked like a giant cannon that's been completely wrecked and fractioned, until it released everything inside of itself, pulling inside the body a few of the lumps. Some would grow and others would appear on this organic communicator of his, until the point when the arms appeared on top of it. And only then would it speak. Later, the laughter could be heard and dealt with.

But for now, he was approached by Pox. He saw it happen and he didn't shy away from the looks of what might be the worst creature in existence. No matter of his hate, he saw a sight that would leave him agape. Though they were in some peculiar woods, in a strange valley, after a strange meeting with a sect, he saw something smeared on some rocks. Not far from where they met. It was the marks of some of them, which he had used. Their kind of bleeding was different than his. He was so satisfied by it. Not only by the sight, but by the creature and what it had done; we truly are alike. Pox thought.

'And now, you're the one they sent this time around.

You're to receive the next set of instructions in order to reach the princess and drag her away.'

'Wait, am I not to kill her?'

To which, even The Snake was startled, by what his companion peered at. For someone who was into a strangely concocted vision, he stood his ground and managed to follow him just rightly enough. Why, he was there. That was not good.

The Snake looked at Pox's fingertips and the soles of his feet. He had phased a bit out of this world, to the point where he had almost been merged with the vision and the strange attire was worn.

'I don't think I should've done this. You're going to be taken out of this world if this act continues.'

He considered the danger for a moment here. It was well earned and pushed about. He couldn't do it, but he had to know where they would be taken by the strange substance. And what kind of man would he be if he had left his friend out there, all by himself?

As crude as he was, there was the wild danger of him doing too much damage on his own. Knowing that the ladies would have it worse, he took a shot himself. They were doing something unnatural as this now, switching dimensions, carrying themselves over. A perdition into each direction could only make their filth escape.

We brought this on ourselves, he thought. Thence they went out of the spine of the cave and out there, where he appeared he satiated no hunger as well as he behaved.

'Do I truly need to spare her now?'

'Unfortunately, we need her alive. This is why I suppose they had ripped out your mind and your soul, look at yourself for now, your brain for example.

It's manifesting in the new one, never stopping the growth. Do you have any idea how damaging this is?'

But he couldn't fathom looking around or searching for more. It was too much to take and less than he could do it.

Again, he came out of nowhere.

'Someone's coming.'

Surely he wouldn't care. But they both got defensive immediately before either of them could look away. It wasn't meant to be, the strange embded wonder they shared between themselves. Farther than it had been projected, he wondered what this meeting was about.

'Pox, it's me, The Snake. Tell your friend to lower, whatever that is.'

He wasn't in the least shook off by the strange apperance. But his frustration clearly showed. Both of them, it was sick. He saw the stones. Pox grinned, he knew it. He got his rocks off by looking at it. Thinking of what went through his head. So many times, he was aware of. He knew that there were plenty of times he could've spared himself of this sight. What was worse, could be the fact that his mind took it in every wrong direction. As much as it would have to be avoided, he simply could not help it any longer. His actions were condemnable, but the wilder part of his brain forced him to continue think, what the butchered Pox was. Sickly done, he projected himself as the creature, using all those appendages on an entire village filled with Amazonian beauties only time could spare.

There sights to be held that would shock the masters. And those of them who made it through would drag themselves away even from the bastards.

Even in the days where they had been in the gang, Rock-us would never be as violent as they had become when they were around. And there were better and there were worse days. This had been the latter.

'Fare that way and let us continue in that case, if you know him. An extra pair of hands would do especially since she needs to be gotten a hold of.'

'And what will I be given in return then?'

What a disgusting face he had. Both of them as a matter of fact were becoming molds. After matter, the latter happened, but only an assassin came on the other side, whilst the other had been just a variety of villagers, the old sages, a pair of animals, some extradimensional bloodless creatures, the paganistic winged tormented souls and other guts that scrambled in as the journey from the two dimensions drew on. Of course neither of them survived, and only the assassin could be seen going there, wondering about the mine. He had no way of knowing of the implosions or of the meaning the strange concotions withheld from him. It was strange how he did not question anything, nor would he be gotten away, no matter what they said.

It pained him to drag it after a while and he would pity no one but himself. Sapped of his vitality, the remorse needlessly ended. After a shorter vile, he fended off the strangers and went into each and whatever direction.

'Will you stop worrying about it? As long as I'm with Pox, I'll make sure not a single finger on her hand will be hurt. You have my word.'

‘So be it. But consider this, say, if there’s a chance, the slightest if a shimmer at that, by any chance, by which you may come to harm her or cut off her guts, know that there would be no problem if you found an exact replacement for her.

You needn’t worry for whichever may her look be as long as you cut and slice and make it be the likes of a victim such as hers.’

It was an interesting proposal, to say the least. And they had no accommodated not a single second for what this destiny fortold. They feared dragging it for too long now. Some weird paranoia if there was something either to him or to them. It was their loss, going down the road, paranoid that he might follow them somehow.

‘I think the way back is clear.’

So much so they could handle. But not a second spent. Don’t look out of the way, that way they might not peer at what was happening in one of the distant bushes of wax. It wasn’t either of their deals, henceforth they couldn’t do it out of spite.

Long there be since then, when a blow to the unnatural epips was dealt in anger. Some watched the passing, others ignored it. But some ingots of faces could be thrown around and they’d be seen. Slicing and battering as they were carried on, it seemed. There was only a single way of knowing and finding out, fiddling with everything around their minds. Poor servants and lousy as they were, they overcompensated their madness through some delirious things they did instead. Leaping from side to side, they tried doing something differently this time. It was the only way they could inflict some pain, less deranged at that, if there was something that contained their blood and luster, it was the sudden evolution which spared no man of the land.

Even the assassins had fallen under it though it would not be felt until the eighty fifth generation instead. Spoken like the truth, they mattered, counted less than it should be told. Soon enough, they showed themselves after and refused to go away. Pox was first to consider it gone, not a single whim given at that. It was plain. How they appeared to crawl. But they appeared to look like men who leaped out of a tower in order to extend one of their arms and catch a falling breasted child, heaving just one hand as they were frozen in that strange position they would spend the rest of their lives in. That had been their peril, that had been their lives. Struck by this curse, they had something which stood out. Tiny legs around their bodies, going as far as to be present underneath their arm pits. They looked like tiny beads like single scorpion claws which worked together in order to carry him as far as might be done. Worse would be the way they dwelled in and the strangeness of their act.

After they approached they quickly surrounded the two and asked about what might be held. What they were there for and why neither of them spoke of the land.

I wish I could tell them. Or so they said, for every minute or so they made it feel as if they held a single thought alive. Better to lose it than get out of sight.

Both of them remained in a state of shock, constantly looking with little hope of them noticing. It was something he’s done, that’s what must’ve aroused them. A quick shroud taken only a few minutes or so ago, but Pox had pissed in a vase. Then he emptied it around and that aroused them all before the face of the land.

‘We ask for a gut.’

Hence he pulled a single one out and threw it around them. Most of the creatures laughed before their many legs started stretching until they were akin to that of giants. It was a forest of shadows which changed the entirety of all the plain animals and the various growths that spread around. No shroud would do and neither would know better. Fearful of what happened there, no one asked and none the better. It couldn’t have been clearer that they wanted to sweep everything under the shrug.

They ate what they could in the air and appeared to have caused both of their heads to pop in a tiny pox-puddle of blood that dissipated immediately before they could be gotten off.

‘I suppose you could hear my proposal now.’

‘What did you inject in us?’

‘Nothing Pox, just a few clots and some chemicals that weren’t supposed to work, at least I hope they haven’t. Unless I did some irreversible damage, in which case.’

He hoped that wouldn’t last. There was no way of checking it after all, with all the thoughts in the world being uncanny. He had spared no needle-rack, nor many, fewer, bonds around the throat. Spoken before the disaster happened, they culled the days and moved on. Contrary to each and the passing, they took the time to measure the ground. It was fine, after a while, trying to dig out the scalps. But, it was a given, they were engrossed in it, the plaque around the brain was settled into a smoking pan.

It was time to eat. Two eggs, perfectly cracked and mine-bacon they pulled from the pig inside the wall boarding. It took some time to gut him evenly and perfectly, at least in a way which would be acceptable. And there was little, if anything could be drawn from it that they cared about what happened there.

‘I wish we spent more time here. Say, The Snake, who do you think she was? Royalty must be so different than what we’re used to.’

‘That’s a good question, isn’t it, Pox? It’s not something I would normally expect from you. But I suppose it’s something I could wrap my head around, if I happened to take another shot. Say, If I were to go around and walk through the forest and through a palace or wherever she may be.

With everything I’ve seen so far, I would imagine she would be somewhat tall and pale and, I don’t know. Some.’

‘Wait, how do you know about her? You appeared out of nowhere after all.’

He smiled a little. He was there for a long time. He heard something from the babble. And he even whispered something of his own. It was unclear whether or not whatever happened there was an illusion or the maddening rabble his mind had created while the man kept whispering in his ear. It was all so, it was all too convenient, for them to all of the sudden avoid using force.

‘You tried tricking me, haven’t you?’

‘To be fair about it, Pox, you were out of your mind. Honestly, you snapped right in front of me. If I weren’t as sure as I was about your sudden urges, about your self control, I fear that dear old me would’ve simply died off. Without a single thing said.’

As someone who was weary of danger, he had to make sure that first and foremost, nothing would happen. And the more they stood there, in the tunnels, the more pathetic it came to be. Both of them were tired now. Yet they wearied themselves over even more than it should’ve been acceptable. It was a pitiful existence, they knew it, yet there was nothing stopping them from taking a bad route, a turn around, clearly indebted.

A purgatory awaited, to the lesser, his mind was gone.

So many dreams of nasty puckors strolled about his mind. Uncannily drawing them near and deeper to the point in reality where a bid broke, ye the few entered through the throng.

‘I need you both to be quiet now.’

Out of the solid he came, phasing through, unmoving like an inanimate quip that couldn’t move its rotating head. With every wonder there came another. Twenty of them came in like, never daring to shake themselves off to the point where one might step too far to the left or too far to the right. Bodies were similar, but heads different with each belonging to a different man. Reminiscent of the twelve, the imitations were like these. One head belonged to Clothnham, the others to Sinclair, Jard, Sargent, Pyott, Everett, Katherine, Jorgmund, Call, Sour, Crane and Prude, but they were not set in right. Foremost of the uncanny, they were not right in the neck region, the throat being taken in every possible direction and blown. In a piece of wonder they looked like they prevented their bodies from being bloated and inflated only for a short period of time. It was uncanny and disturbing but they made sure no one knew what happened to them.

As each had many bars that had impaled them, holding them together, bearing as many holes as windpipes would hold, never taking it out, the better the merrier. Least of all they guided them.

‘More noise means we would have to equalize everything, in which case.’

The boixterous approach faded. It went over their heads. It was a deranged activity they had partaken in. For the benefit of the slaves, they lifted themselves to show each leg which stretched into the body of a struggling slage, who was conjoyed at his feet.

‘They need to be repaired by us after each breaking. In order to do that, we need you to be as quiet as possible. Would you simply do that?’

Could we count on you not to make any disturbance whatsoever? After all, I suppose it isn’t unfair, or so would it be, to ask that of you.

It’s way too clear that both of you are at fault, if not the cause of this disturbance.’

As vile as it sounded, they couldn’t get away of duck under the shame. A wall saying could say it better. Hence, either of them, in whichever order, as it didn’t matter who did it picked up a scalp and read from it, or at least they tried.

‘Damn it, this isn’t a message, it’s a map.’

‘Pox, you imbecile, don’t throw that away. That might actually be useful for. Right, I’ll keep it quiet.’

He mimicked the word, unaware whether or not he got it. For the same reason it was understandable, he picked the right moment in time to ask again.

‘What does it say?’

The creature went back into its place. Now they would keep the quietest they had ever managed to. And that had been something to look back and admire.

‘I see we reached an understanding.’

Though little was said so far. It was pleasant getting it out, just then, for once, his body spoke the anger his mouth would not mutter. That was just a thought Pox had, while not, to take away from what he had with her. The Snake didn’t want to admit it either, as he recalled his previous encounters with Hestia. They stood like drunks after all. A flame reflected in their eyes, whatever happened, they only missed their bottles of his cup of wine. It was through nights like those that he beat her, again and again. It had something to do with the anger he constantly felt and she happened to be the closest to him when it happened.

‘That felt.’

Almost a slip there. He smiled at Pox. It almost felt too good. They shared a smoke eighteen feet under. It went just as expected after a while, keeping the quiet they said. He couldn’t tell him though. Either way, he could not admit to the man that he held, somewhat to a certain point similar values. Whatever the fact might be, that was a doorway to some unwanted truths and desire, some flaying he had no intention of recollecting.

‘Say, Pox, think we’ll find something down there?’

That brother of the dame you killed, think he’s going to be mad?’

Pox was silent. There was only one thing that seemed to be solid in his mind. He hadn’t considered it a murder as much as he saw it as an accident or some kind of sacrifice that was completely justified in his eyes. Whatever role had crossed him mind, he wagered that no one would approach him yet, not as long as he kept to himself or kept around me. Both of us liften the brow, it was part of the mind shaft that tended to go around and curve in the wrong place. It was filthy and filled with mixed-mines or various diameters. For the same reason we came here, we couldn’t be aware of what went on around or beyond the shaft, in the walls or into the various meters that went and swam through the mudd.

A shark-tear, shaped with the help of its hammer head, hampered the ceiling. A piece of it dropped, revealing its young as tiny puddles began dropping and spreading around the place. Inside each of them, at least from what could be looked back to it, various head-tracks appeared, sliding in and out of existence. Through those almost smoking red pops, which shot out of the water and began heating as they dissappeared, the face of an almost ghoulish man could be seen. From the bottom of his chin another face, similar to his but smaller, rounded and more convex. In it there was one eye that stood out because it had been projected to the point where it had grown long enough to be his forearm. From there, various nerves pushed in and out, like a rod of stagnation. It dripped constantly with a liquid puckor that drowned his bobbling head. Something kept him inside, preventing him from leaving as there was no happiness in the symbol of hedonistic urge that overcame him.

Various times, stranger lime-winds pushed the smoke away. It was, soon enough, lost to them, since they could not deal with the intrusion.

That night he came through the ranks.

While pushing through the various tunnels that appeared at various, close to being invisible spots their eyes averted their sight from, there was one entry, one in the area in the west which looked almost docilely plain. There was a door, a wall, a carpet and even a bell-ring outside which was strangely drawn out through a rail that pushed out of a giant key-hole. Other mechanisms appeared to be near it, but they all shot in wild directions that appeared to have nothing to do with what was going on. Too fearful of doing something either of them might come to regret, they chose to stay their arms and go one at a time.

‘I see there’s only one way through.’

‘Would you mind being the first one to check the room, Pox? I’m desperately afraid that something might happen to me now.’

Since, I suppose it would be fair to admit this to you, especially now.

I believe I’m truly cursed, in all possible sense, and without a question about it, I think there’s nothing I could do, if I were to try, to prevent my demise if I checked that door.’

‘What are you on about?’

‘My death, dear Pox, it could come at any moment, it could draw near when I least expect it, and to that I couldn’t bother to get myself through that door.’

‘But what of my safety? Am I the least important of the two of us? Should I expect to be thrown around and used at every dangerous corner?’

‘Of course not, I wouldn’t dare make use of you if that were the case and the circumstances were right.

This is something I simply have no control over, my dear Pox, henceforth, you’re to make the first step and leap inside instead of me. It’s something you ought to do, without a doubt and without a question.’

Hence the first attempt to open the door came. He was something of a devil in the mind. It was not right how some twists came to be inside the room, as they succumbed, both of them, as time followed, to the most bastardly sight they could wrap themselves around, a camp-fire, close to it, a burning of the room that would not spread from leaping on every counter top and every man who had been burned alive.

‘We’re late.’

Said by the Snake in the waking of a vile hour, no changes were shown to their expressions. They walked through it, acquiring first, second and eight degree burns all around their bodies, taking their railers out as they showed no attempt to reconcile with the fate.

‘Quiet now, I want to listen to the fire burning.’

It was a constant, trying to seethe inside, as the kettle of skin created various plump faces that only spoke. Like a virulently lucid dream, it came to them then. They spoke in parts, lazily, as if they could be heard just once.

‘Search for us, it’s beating to the hour, make your claim as soon as you can and don’t return to the tower.’

‘What do you want?’

‘Form a band and make your claim, you ought to do it before they remain.’

In place, of the matter, destroyed after a laughter, it would only be the right thing, finding it before it sank into the letter-trick. Another envelope of blood into the fire.

‘What do you want of us now? Can’t you see that we’re minding ourselves now that we have nowhere else to be?’

‘Silence, there needs to be silence, in the concrete blocks, the stone and the frames, the pillars that hold everything from falling onto you.’

As from the walls they came again, all of them lined in the veil of a ford, cowardly trying something of their own, without a disability of leprosy. Some of the walls became just that. And as the lepper-walls began enclosing, the fires stopped burning, become largely encompassed by the same illness, slowly drawing onto them. As blank sheet of human beings, they could not fathom doing this to anyone, anymore than it was needed, through the satisfaction that was being taken away, and pushed on.

‘Make two rights and open it through, you should see him.’

Deadly, as if gone through and through, he had lost his feathers and he had died. Of the grace of Clot, he was still alive, much diseased and formerly his own. Siskelot, the champion drew on.

‘I shall join you, no matter what this means, as I found no worthy suitor there, no Carrion and no pleasing sight. I was taken by the disease of the mind that had taken hold of me.’

He swelled, like a morbidly tainted creature, of which bones started drawing in all the meat and all the fat inside of them, leaving opened pucks, spread around evenly around the body, yet distantly crossed. It was through this disquite that they wondered at the pain. What had this mad creature done to itself and what would it say?

‘We accept your condition, to our admiration, I see only one thing. What have you done to yourself?’

‘I have killed the two guards, and I had dragged them around the corner, taking my time to draw in their blood and guts and push them inside.’

‘How did you do it?’

Pox showed only the slightest compressive honesty as he drew forth. He wanted to know more even if some things didn’t make sense.

‘See through the past, uncannily drought about the corners of the grant citadels the Carrions formed. As high and mighty as they were, beware of their wings and of the decay, for that had been, before, as one would carry, only undecidedly the most morose symbols that could not be seen as worthy of the malady I sang.

They grew cocky as they turned and looked about the rise and spread. But this infection only made them detest the sun, and look about without daring to question what happened.

And as they turned, and lay in quiet, as they underestimated me for all they decided to, I have turned the sprouted, my belly opened and from above, I sprayed with needles and with disease. From my insides, the pleasing destruction, that decay pushed through their backs and through their eyes as soon as they had turned their gazes back on me.

Mercy, mercy, yet they said, for all the mockery and the attempt to force me to know my place, I had shown none. Meeting their blows, one for one as they weakened and I took their blood, I drew it out and ate their throat before they would land the slightest blow that would turn them back on.’

Whence it happened, thence they failed, slumpering around the ground as they fell. It was decided, way before the taking. It was slow and quiet, how every operation should go. There were failed attempted and the marrow being taken from the low mead and their internals, before he got on his feet and walked away.

‘Be weary of what I say now, for Clot had looked upon the vileness and on the destruction, he had given me insight.

I know what happened inside the giant Carrions and how their abortions had been given life. An unatural act could not be corrected be another and those who would be given birth could not stammer after.’

He feared to say, that there was another creature down there, which had been projected on his mind, the sound-foam could not be denied. Nor could it be fought against, nor taken by the lodge of his puckor instead. He feared a transition of dead-dead, living through the mild mounds of mild-dew. He drew through the gate and closed it, being so near them that they could draw nothing from what he seemed to be.

‘I wish you knew what I’m talking about. I wish you saw that I was shown about the place. Then and only then would you understand something about the fragility of the mind, it cannot be preserved, that one will not be standing there and cower forever.’

In the image of his own admissal sight, the machines attached to him turned off, and he had finally got up. But to this destruction of the lower-zone, they couldn’t fathom drawing on.

Some Carrions gathered around the door which lead to the attic. By now, it looked the part, skin-walls and the insides.

‘Stop him, don’t get him get out of there, block it, stammer, and use as many barricades as possible, place the skin-covelts and the giant water-barrels and the tiny tower and keep him blocked.’

A pump of blow could be heard from the other side, he was a titan that could not be fought under no circumstance whatsoever. There was too much power in his fists, he was too heavy, too tall and the force he produced was unncanily unmatched. A terrible, terrible thing drew on, a terror unlike no other as he broke through the door and revealed no emotion, only a slight dettachment from what happened to him prior to his coming to power.

It felt right, as he drew on and grabbed the first Carrion he got his hands on. With his grip being swollen, he only held the top of his forehead on as he started adding just enough pressure to crush. Desperately he fought, despite the decay happening all around them. Other Carrions tried joining him, but they failed as one of them suddenly began disintegrating by chance after his body could not take the disease any longer.

Despite the common neurotic defomity that could be seen as being reflected through the insides of the outwardly layered skull, the effect was finite and instant. As the pressure advanced through Rga, his brain began atrophying in a black powder before spreading through the rest of the body. A spong had come out of the various maldors his knuckles had excavated out of him.

Then came the immediate prowess.

Were they of another world?

‘I sometimes come to think that way. We’re never given any emotion, or something to work on. They’re all expecting us to keep our mouths shut and pretend nothing has ever happened while we were here.’

‘And what do you want then?’

‘Snap out of it Pox, snap out of It already, we have work to do now.’

‘I concur, now I shall join you if you’re so inclined.’

‘So be it, stranger, but, just so you know, we’re the ones calling the shots, understood? Don’t step out of the line unless you want to have you face smashed in.’

That much was settled, at least for what was worth. Neither of them would make much noise now, especially since they were in it for something more than getting their rocks kicked off. It was enough to set it off for one day, at least that’s how it worked. At the end of their work, their roots were swollen and they had allowed this Siskelot to come with them.

Pox drew near, he inspected the fellow, as soon as it was decided, they would not even get away or enact anything else than what had been their, a vision if anything, of despair.

‘Don’t worry, the fire will harm all of us if we spent too much time in it. Think you’d wager bet off against it?’

‘I couldn’t. Let’s go before we all burn.’

There was the desperation and the quiet. Soon after, they missed it before pushing on. Various tools were present in the mine shaft which prevented them from even coming close to suffering from more burns. It was all skin-deep after all, it couldn't be felt nor taken to the worth of the yelling that soon emerged.

'That's our thicket there, I think we all know where to go, shall we then?'

'Of course, when you're as tired as I am, when there's nothing we could do without, we should search for someone sane in the head to fix what's going on.'

'You're a sharp one, Siskelot.'

As he presented himself, names exchanged, hence the titles as well as everything else, he picked up where they had been tracking, only the most important trails alive. Here and there and just about the world, they shimmered with the least important thing, about it. Heat and flames had purged their deranged minds and now, all was too clear. Soon enough they explained everything which he had missed and with the piss on an eye, he took it upon himself to aid them. Slay the brother and free the curse his sister may have called upon his family line, or much worse, make sure there would be no survivor there. That must've been the call of Clot, he who only searched the lot. It was clear, it was near, past the farthest point they feared something might happen if they acted too rash.

'If anything, I think neither of you are as bad as I thought you'd be.'

Thence he had promised he would help them no matter the call and regardless of where they'd be. For now they went through the gates and went through the underground advent. Here and there, much abandoned, least of all, pushed, surrounded by giants, or parts of them which were being used to feed as many masses as there were possible. Without being able to control anything that went around, there was this instinctive fear they would, least of all be able to control. It was innate and it struck then. Inside some of the giga-maniac creatures, where their bodies had been carved so deeply that the mark of a strong fist could be seen inside one of them, which had only proceeded to create a chamber for the centurions that were set in, waited a looker. He had been tall, eighteen legged, arms that had become only extensions which liquified in the legs and the many faced of lost men, creatures and those who had been betrayed in the last. Prude was within them, but he would not be recognised, amongst which there was also the strange being known as Ogoth, who had another projection of his head which erected itself in the same was a deep sea angler fish would, with the bulb only growing to show the twin-strikes. Which they themselves were masses that attempted to replicate various sharp angled torsoe-like pupae, insect-like toes and many humanoid forms that appeared to have been miniaturized to the most uncanny nature. But they themselves did not look fully humanoid, or insect-like, instead they changed in color, appeared darker and sprouted eyes that moved to this moment. Out of all the dead heads and the figures in this one stalkish body, most of them appeared to be dead. Even Tom, and the boy named Oliver, the rotten face of a creature named Yyork and the peculiarness of Agamemnon who was there, grinning and laughing inaudible tunes.

He called on them there.

'Come near, I have some knowledge to impart on you.'

'And what would that be?'

The boldest of the three of them asked. It was, if anyone, Siskleot, who couldn't help it any longer but consider himself something else, someone else other than the tool of Clot. He chose to face the figure and asked it, what to rot?

'In what sense do you think you might help us? You've been stuck here for how long now?'

'That is neither your concern nor should it be your fear? I near a time and an age where my boredom will comply with the eternal will to destroy everything when I will have become death.

I've come to look upon the pettiness of the world and of the various races that sprout around the place and I have come to a conclusion. It is their time and their end which needs to be spoken to. On which cordiality and on which ends, the conditions should be told as well and when it happens.'

'You'll kill us all, won't you?'

'Pox, what are you doing?'

'No, no, no, listen. I don't know why but I can feel It, you know? What he's trying to say now. I doubt either of us has the power to stop you.'

'Intelligent being, but part of the knowledge that floats inside your minds comes from me and no one else, don't forget that, in part. You're influenced by me now, Pox, as long as you're close to me.'

He could sense the fear coming into him, just then, like the bird of destruction, made of mucus and the soles of innards struck in. For far too long had it pained him about the world, seeing it spin without disgrace. And pain could only tatter and murder.

They appeared out there, as he recreated the rooms. It was dark after all so neither of them could strike themselves down, for the scuffle appeared.

'We're in the residence.'

The Snake observed, with a minor alteration as well since the corpse appeared there for no reason at all. And the machines became even closer to being known, the strike and the mourning devices, large cylinders pumping in his back. Most of the other tubes and the carbon-fillings started fattening him about the spot. He had been of another disease just then. Clocked with the devices, an immaterial time-dwelling machine which drew on from his giant stomach, now retorted.

'Now that I have brought you here, I want you to take a look outside.'

For a moment there, he opened a wall, breaking through it just enough for a clear view to be made in the room. The three of them covered their eyes just in time to avoid the initial blinding light which pushed in. After the initial dousing of the day, they approached and saw a bump which had crushed the wall around the second residence, all of which conveyed the second hole. Another entry into the mourning of the battle, trashing after, the leviathan could be seen. Even if so vaguely, even though it was remotely there, and out there as well, as it could not be explained by no means, they seated themselves and waited for no interaction. It was damning, how they heard the fractioning of the ceiling, which still fell. But from where they stood, there was no barring, no telling who was down there.

‘Why are we shown this?’

‘It’s meant to show itself as a sign. I know what you’ve heard and what you might think about.’

‘You’re paranoid.’

Said Pox but the other two did not understand what they were talking about. For far too long had he wondered, with everything going around here, just what he wanted. And why he wanted to have it then.

‘It’s the Liver-kettle, I know you’re all after it.

I must say, that I myself have just found out. And though we all know of it now, I must make sure that neither Agamemnon, nor Agamemnon, nor Agamemnon gets it before I.

And I shall not have any primitive being make progress upon discovering it before I could lay my claws and infest the world in disturbing guts. I need it, for what Is worth.’

But then he dared not speak of the other. The dead-lamb, for what its likes could do and travel. It was a mystery to it as well, for all the power in the world could not take from it, or the knowledge. He was destined, he was shallow, he could not concentrate any longer or pry in, to the hollows in skin. Parts of those were missing. Out of every minute spent there, forming a speech he might impress them with, they still looked mightily confused.

‘No matter, for here what might be done.

Since you are mine and as my children or my servants, or being out of fear of destruction, I swear that I shall have you all taken and destroyed. Neither of you will escape unless you follow my ploy.’

So far it was as it said, without too much given in or out of it then. Fear and the mind faded, thence he wasted no second law of thermodynamics on the foul, taking them back, bringing them to the dark. Thence the lambs were set forth. The entity dissappeared but somehow remained for much longer than it was needed for them to set on.

‘I suppose we have no option but to carry on as if naught happened.’

‘Then so be it, unless we partake into it, something will die.’

The peculiar thing was that they found themselves down there, coming at a time where the opportunity was almost missed, and it hadn’t even been what it appeared, it wasn’t clear, they missed the shattering of the brain. It could not be conveyed by no emotion and no unfathomable class. But as they entered der underground local’, they found everyone present there confused.

The Satyr and Carpent were the first to notice.

Liorotha and Charlan were there in awe.

Joyburn and Scaffle were just as ready for a fist-a-cuff, with the exception that they could not fathom looking around. A rain of bodies, everyone inside was dead. Even the one serving, the waiter and the dogs, the creatures and the cretin brains. But the greatest lost was that of all the slaves inside the barrels, who could not fathom looking out of place. They had been kept for too long inside and appeared to have suffocated instead of prying into the joy.

‘What do you strangers want?’

There was a voice which did not belong to any of the people present inside the place.

Siskelot had dragged himself in, with Pox and the Snake looking at what appeared to have been a wasteland instead the local’s repertoire. No decency appeared to strike at them and they could not wonder any least. Less than it should be known, they were tired of asking the wrong questions.

Carpent got up, finally, he satiated his strange, yet peculiar desire to drink. Most of them realised how dangerous everyone in the room was. First of all, Joyburn and Scaffle had taken a hold of their firearms, as the two of them picked up on their railers.

The Satyr stood in his place. Charlan had no face, it seemed. He fell just like the others.

‘That one in the back out there, how did he die?’

‘He tried poisoning us, but apparently he messed up the drinking, poisoning himself instead.’

But that was a lie. It appeared that from the other end, from the point where the light extended, which was the offshot where people would be allowed to come, there came the flood out of. It spread and it could not be culled. Least of all the quiet told of something worse.

‘I see, I see, there’s a flood.’

He thought, wildly in the past. Scum had entered and soon enough he had died, as he drowned himself on purpose, making it so that the closest of kin inside this local died with him. No shame and no quiet, no yapping, only the disquiet would be pronounced.

Degenerate façade

Thence cried Agamemnus as they urged the spears to push through the thorn, with all the spears wreathing in and culling the wild forms that erupted out of it. At the other end, where they started creamating the skin, forming their weird skin-bubbles at the process ended. The advent of the turn, the flattening of the universe stopped as they came to the realisation that the Agamemnons had devoured its back, the body being impaled by them as soon as the spears started pushing through from afar.

A leeway of souls ended, neither of them uncanny or morose. It couldn’t be determined there, but they have failed. It broke, something in it almost leaped and choked out there, in a way it wasn’t supposed to. By the looks of it and how it started, the entirety of its sability faded and it was not just because its spears, who had acted closer to syringes, pushing the filth through it without the realisation that it had infringed upon its muck. Its filth only being deranged, leaping out madly as it tried drawing everything away or pushing it inside. All that matter, organic and inorganic started mixing until it could not be taken any longer. Such a filth-mixing thing it had been, there, in a time during which there was no shame. They grew like living lights, meat that took the form of flames in search for the ice. And the ice had curbed out there, in space, the faces were filled with warmth starting to leak in.

For fealty was treason, and theirs was space, and the faces of Agamemnon started flaking away as they each got a piece of the throne, eating and cutting, spreading and blotting everything that could even remotely come to sight. And they grew, to each end they grew their extra faced, blotched towers, sprangs and twings, and lepper wings and each of them delighted into eating and infecting the world that attempted to get out. From that flat space, from which they carried themselves out, moons and stars, comets and satellites could only lay, could not convey and little bit could they say. What the ether and the vasteness of filaments would matter. What the devouring of teeth would result in if they turned upon them when the space grew fatter.

‘Woe and behold, the thorn is ours, no fight could be as yet forlorn.’

It was a pitiful victory from which they got little more than could be expected. Darkly embeded in the mind, they sickened the world again as they alighted the birth of countless other generations that might soon follow. No marches would wallow and they could see, the destiny of the world was soon to be filled and rimmed in filth.

‘Lo, there, the throne is ours, but who do we hear there?’

The Grub did not follow. For he had been aware of what was happening out there in space, he who had supplied them with the means, he who had watched the spears had been afraid, unlikely to look back again at what was happening there. It was inconsistent with what trap, whatever had brought its mind back and the filth which filled every possible access point in life, they ended.

‘We have to bring in the new, we have to possess another body before they track us down and press.’

Into his body, he heard Dour wallow through. They both came to a humanoid, who had barely found out what was going through, or what was about to happen out. It was a mere agony, a missing sound, least to be determined by the traitors, most of them sitting inside the abandoned station, with no matter of feeling, yet the more morose they felt.

‘I think we may not have much time now, they seem to have progressed too far. I think there’s little I can do now, with my body being fattened, blotched and ready to burst out.’

‘We have to continue, there’s another thing I need to see here.’

‘Ah, I see.’

Grub looked at Dour. He’s been through so many changed as peculiar as he looked. It was hard to believe that he was the same creature as he had been there. Let alone anything even close to a human, yet. He could also not fathom what happened in space, as the victory was short-lived and too quick and something was on its way. From the looks and the likes, something horrible came to the sight of mind. It was them, and theirs alone was the strongest desire, the filth they had acquired in glory could not be stopped. In mountains they droned around and formed stars of their own, or similar structures that were brought with nothing more than their malignant woes. Faces like theirs could not bother anyone.

‘We’ll have to settle down with this then.’

He spoke to Grub. He was fat and tall and appeared to have finally been freed, like the giant inflated pale caterpillar creature he was. It was decided long before he took the chance that they would have to see for themselves. Who had survived of the original entity which had been him? Who could tell them if not.

‘The unit, that should’ve survived. I have no doubt he’s still somewhere around here in hiding or doing whatever who knows what.’

He pointed at that. Most seats were empty, not a single glass broken or cleared. A long time ago, from what he remembered, if he was the mind, if he was either of them, of the heads or the bodies, regardless of that. He still had the recollections of what happened here, even though they had been humbly, or somewhat queerly forgotten in the long journey that went through him. For what he had seen and remembered was this, so far, violent creatures bearing giant scissors, which had only missed him by chance and by the placement of his spot and his mind in this peculiar world. Otherwise he knew nought of what awaited him. Plain and simple as it were, they were vultures outside the station, waiting to get him.

‘Did you hear that?’

‘The sound of long-winds, I think. Something broke through the outer shell I suppose and for that I cannot actually think of a better way to look back to it.’

‘Isn’t it dangerous, I mean, there being a hole in the station. ‘

‘Not as long as you stay in. I feel like there’s more to it than either of us is being allowed to know or care for.’

He proposed they continued their journey. It was as much as they knew or cared to expect. Going by the minutes or by the glances from the varied in the stacked amount of bodies which filled the gaps between the gas-bricks. There was no structural stability around the holding frames. But what replaced the oil in the walls was It, the scatterings of lost men. Those who had been fed and those who died upon the release of the growing pluckor of corpses that could not be taken away any longer, in this they found solace, yet nought could be done about it. Spoken in silence, most would not believe what they spoke in there, especially since their minds were so closely preserved inside their thin veils. No such thing would remain for long. Briths sounded as they came in, shattered as the skin tunnels started moving in and out, disregarding the complete formation of the entirety of the structure they resided in while none of them were around. Drones came out, or so were the new races called. Most of them were beaten in the head and replicas, kept around. As soon as they came out, their skin started tanning out of the head. It made them more violent as it embded the desire to do harm upon one another for no other reason than the fact, they seemed mildly rabid in mind and wanted to murder because of the scum foliage which turned their skin that way. Satisfied so far, they started munching, breaking in some of the stone as if this way a quarry. On top of them, from around the walls, the skin-tunnels started dropping some of the osmosis-infested bloated creature, damned that they were, some of them breaking through. Deeper through some of their twisted cord-spines, more and more of them began battering the ill-ness that was being spread. Two anchored death man stood like canopy fields. The sight of green didn't come from them but from the dragging liquorish bath they started producing around them. And none of that could be gotten back, as they whipped and crack their spines all over away, in a desire to call him there. He wasn't going to answer it any longer. No word in the matter and no way lay there for him to get a word in. Some pulled out their eyes immediately since there was no way, there was no pain. Nothing which could refrain them from hearing it so loudly. There was no final destination, no attirion so far. After you watched them for long enough they were no human any longer. Not to downplay this place for what it was, a prison which was matched and falling over itself. Decaying as various palpations of the beating hearts in the structure went out of their way, swaying the fall. It was inevitable, henceforth, they had their fun. Since there was no one to be trapped around, it all went to shambles, a place that was being destroyed, a synopsis for the paranoid and those who weren't well in the head. Some had scoured the heat, others had plastified their feet until none looked well apart. It was even, but accepted, their face ended above the jaw and flattened in the long pinnacle of coffin-shaped thin plates they bore. From above the tunnel, more and more of the decayed fell. Some were even the citizens who used to carry on with them, those, those unnatural and the destroyed, the fillament, sharp-tubed, impaled. And after them some foremen came as well, at least a good dozen on them, with the hound-like creatures that spat their guts out. Some were to be carried even farther, as there was no pain to be instilled on others. Lo and farther, the Carrions arrived, and they saw this building cut in half. Those who went farther in, who closed and listened, and wallowed through the unnecessary grith found themselves greeted by a sad sight. It simply wasn't right, seeing it this way. But they would not approach, they wouldn't feel nor dare say anything about their repellant attitude, for what could be more worth than it? Judging by the pain coming out of those slits, it was well deserved, none said a word. Some looked away, each other's worths. Bodies were carried away for a reason, the fall looked like a candle that was running out of wax. From it, unable, they stopped.

'You need to kill him during his schedule, do you hear?

No excuses now, cross the street and between the eyes. There's no other direction after that. Do what you're told and don't look back.'

He did that, for some time now, he had become accustomed to loading and unloading his revolvers. Two on each side, hidden underneath the pocket cloth, but that was, so far, incontestable. He missed an eye, but not because it had been slwoyl pulled out but because it migrated a few inches below the cheek bone.

It was the utmost degrading, pitiful to look at beneath the cowl of the bowl-heads that followed him around. They were running past the hour now, but therere was no counter to decide, it placated the brow into the piss-surrounding. He would wage a gun to his temple and count the second, one in the barrel, missed.

Jason would live for now. Looking down on it, the gun grinned, but that wasn't part of its original pattern or the design. It looked that way because his face crawled off the front of his skull, contorting itself around the shaft and the trigger. At the same time, his very bone had extended so far as to become part of the rifle mechanism that entered his spine.

There were a lot of things he should've been scanning the place for.

His lower jaw pastified in his canine teeth. He walked like a cripple as one of his legs split in half, with a fourth one being made out of the broken tooth-bone.

‘Am I being lied to?’

He asked, without daring to wait another second and see what’s wrong. Were there women around him? Nay, they were gone, a lot of them only gravitated towards each other in the closest place they’d be. Drunks and left around swollen ceiling patterns in the flat-pointed treebarn. It pushed and protruded out of yellow dogs, small, like miniature puddles of star-foam. And they ran around their own tails, eating parts of the ground, choking on the sound of old majestic tunes from German army. They invaded, blooming as they took over the city.

Scum like Arson flowed in and out. He followed Jason around, provding him bullets from time to time, and nastily drawing in big dots from the ground, trying to scower through his gun. He wasted none and told him. Wars were won but something traveled in their atmosphere. IT was the first sing of the supreme breaking of the thorn.

Large bombs had been frozen in the air and held inside of them the planets of the winners. Those who had been given birth by Agamemnus wasted no time to spread the news of his supreme victory and the blasted thing that happened after. It was destiny, in its scum, to look around the place and see them now. For what they held in there could not be satisfied by anyone or counted upon. Dark, as it was inisde, they grinned at the fight, the one that ensued, after the insides were perturbed.

Instead of praying and soon after, they had encountered something worse, something viler, that thunder of skin that never defiled.

He, the Lapplander in the skye alone, the head of the unity, the facility which he had gotten after his kin devoured the necromancer and his servants, through an act of parasitic congruity, he earned one strike and a well earned time alone. As the comets drew near, they feared nothing as their heads erupted, starting to pop in pieces, out of fear, they all cowered in disgust. For far too many had become aware of the event and of the sight of him spreading to no ends.

Agamemnon, he, of all, had started, conflating his skin, enacting his body from within the worst possible sights. His grip upon reality had not faded a second more, through this elemental gore that had become his cage. Deranged as he was, he would influence them all instead. As Agamemnus’s whisper only traveled so far, had the Lapp realised that its mind was gone. Unable to reproduce or to face such a pitiful thing, they both gave in to the disease that had been the dance and the swoon, never to have been forbidden and lest of all, pushed through the innards, he called.

‘My children, my creations of scum-towers had come to a fruitless turn. You need be gone out of your way and destroy.’

There was no pity and no sympathy that would be given any longer. Only this could be stood against, and no decision could be as deranged as this way. In the time they had spent trying to push through, they finally released themselves from the effect he had produced and leaped into space. Through the worlds and into the pity, never to see the magnificence he had displayed, not to look at him again in the puckor and extensions.

He had trifled with reality and slowly it began fading, ever in the endeavour of the breaking. Least of all, they would be known. Least of pity, be it piety. In fading times, the thrine of cattle, the mass of scum-bottles had amassed. Dark though their bodies were, they couldn't help it any less than they could be aware. Some pushed out of human-kind and seemed to bear only the eyes of their formerly blinding lives. And as they erupted from the enigmatic races, they shouted from their bodies, which bore no faces:

‘Agamemnon finally descended in his mountain, to his core. He had prepared himself to get through and devour the world.’

It was a shout of magnificence, and one of dream. None could attain no mark and none might direct themselves back to the beating belt of skin that faded. Many strips being pushed afar. IT was the magnitude of skin-power and the muscle mass which pushed them into the ground, to fading into yellow pus, to the gas that spread from their insides. From various trees, as from the forest, dark, they spread their gases and numbed the skulls, the strength of men and everyone else.

Far and father, never to be called, they could not fathom living anymore.

Courageous, as he was, only then had he managed to wake up from the slumber and push himself into it before he could paint the sun. He yelled at once, to him and many, to less and plenty, had he wondered where they were.

‘Where is Squire and where is Prude?

For I am in need of them and they should near my sight as they ought and should.’

So much power from the pressing, never tiring had it become. But only when he laid in quiet waiting had he realised that nothing was as it should be, as far as he knew, whoever the mad landlord was, he could not fathom drawing away from destiny of taking, least of all, entranced. By the magnificence of praying, he had found some faith at last.

‘Chivalry, you said you had been called.’

But he could not fathom waiting or even trailing his own quietness from what was going on. As they stared and turned, they managed to see another island falling out of nowhere on its own. It could not be fathomed that such a thing would happen or that they would be made to look. Out of what went on, they were no longer entranced and could not fathom trying it again, as far as they had looked.

‘There, another piece of land is falling. Out of the pit, a pair of castles are once again lost.’

‘What would the reason for it be then?’

‘I say, my lord, that the lands are cursed, all and with and within, plenty rubble and destined bricks, the constructions and everything else that pushed through cannot stand still on a whim. I say, look ahead with caution and you shall find out for yourself.’

He had advanced once again and had come to lost it, with or without the blink of an eye. The dye of man, the uncanny land and everything that cursed the blandness of the mockery, none could see who watched them as it writhed in agony. Like a leashed fiend, a better blind puckor of misery, he waited. A knight that had been defended and covered only in anchoring masses of scum-muscle, never to be called to answer for the crimes he had gone to make.

Deeper in the ground as well, a force of many buried bodies enabled their rebirth inside the tress, the cattle of rubble which formed in blindling awe of those who prayed as well for the ones that hid inside the dell. Those who had become rivers and those who had become gaseous, prayed. To a single king of green air, to a yellow and an orange, white as well, the steam, the smoke and the remnants of many others who mixed into the ones he told to be the one solid. Split in many king-like nautres, he called upon the distant stars as he wagered.

‘I am only here for you, my dear king of all. Master who resisted the urge of killing the infants embroidered in the planet you have been buried with, instead of your own kind.’

He weeped with false drops of acid that could not even fathom themselves as water and moved on from the spot, never to retreat at that, a power unlike anything that even wagered itself.

It was simply a mystery how it survived for so long without any trace of humanity laying around him. For someone like him, this was merely a jest of the kin. He couldn’t look away, regardless of what went around in his head. Many a choice was limited because he was struck there, in the head. Armed on the side-walk, cars stopped in traffick, without the least of a conviction to spare. Jason was an offshot of the species, in so-far looking like some trick of a puddle, lost in thought as well. He was a hick that carried a green axe that melted through his skin, giving him a wild complexion from which not even he could get away from. So much power was being generated from inside of him that soon he would himself flimsily gnawing at his wrist to keep himself awake.

‘I had a mad dream once, one as if you would not believe. I think I was there on their bridge, in their court of gibberish. And they spoke to me in tongues, trying to convince me of something that’s not real.

Then I heard.’

At this Arson started prying in closer to the man. He was in need of a hearing aid since the old one had been completely incinerated from one of the accidents that shot him. He only wanted to help, but it never ended up like he intended.

‘They spoke of the dead lamb. They found out about it now.’

For some reason, both of them had immediately become uncomfortable, even to this point where they couldn’t help the strange engulfance that had overcome them. What was it about the lamb that couldn’t strike them and how had they managed to see?

Far, in-between the Lapp, the one that fell before Agamemnus. His mind infested, to which, detested, no words could make up for the loss. It was even and eventful for both of them to know it then. But they had been overcome by a moronic incision which in turn gave him access to the primitive race. A sub-human grace allowed him to see, there, in the distance, on top of the chain, where his mind had arked a single bolt that connected their minds together, always wondering, how and whence. Never to ask again of the perturbing turbulence of glances, or of the madness which continued after.

‘I see that I’m in need to search.’

Jason told Arson as soon as he remembered what Agamemnon communicated of the sight. Ignoring the degenerate images that flashed with him and those in the court, he saw the most important aspect. He saw them, stranded on their way, surrounded even by the gaze.

And the Dumnescunses, Seyokos, Pauls and Funskes spread, from the bottom of the barrel, in a short patch of land, taken as part of the disgrace they felt while looking around, thence he wondered what they might do. Soon enough, he could see it how he wanted to get inside the cattle-prayer, watching them stand still. No one knew when he'd appear or when the gates turned out of fear, as they were living yet they held, a single morbid light of meat that prevented them from opening to anyone who came through the sides. A vile thing, or better to pass it by.

The gatekeeper announced unwearily.

'Whence shall I go back and forth and how may I be able to call upon you and make it so you know my worth.'

Then only eight words could still be heard. How they remained thrown and out in space, their bodies stacked upon frozen dirt-like produced meat-surfaces, whence they never could get out of. '

'Why are you telling me all of this?'

'It's important, this is why I'm telling you it.'

But before he could come up with a great reason or any kind of explanation that would suffice, his mind confused him with someone who would die to take off and stay alive. Whenever they'd look apart or try taking it hard to brawn, they stopped to reconsider where they were going, father in, through one of the buildings they began pushing through. It was the least amount of pain they suffered.

'I know where we must go.'

Arson knew best, as what to say and when to do it, no matter how odd or out of place it had been. As distracting and as in-between he felt the ailment urge him to stop. After picking up a bottle of the nearest inflammable solvent, he spilled it on the floor as he tripped, it entered his eyes, promoting the flames to pop out and make him bend himself on a whim, of sadness and depression, tears unearned. Farther than that, near the street, way, or as far away from the bar, whence the progeny lay, there was also poor Anthony. Of everyone in town, to which he carried on a whim of the round wheels, he wanted this. A semi-normal wife, someone he could share his life with no matter what the canter said, whatever told him and whichever side came next.

'Lorraine, I need you to do something for me now.'

'What?'

Lorraine was sipping on her coffee. Compared to the other days, she was much calmer, least of all she couldn't have been the least, if anything, ashamed of what she'd done. He thought about leaving her but couldn't. It went on about for years.

'Can we have a normal conversation for once.'

It was indigent, trying but failing to light one of the pot-rocks. That was a bad habit she picked up from someone.

Anthony marked the hour, looked at his watch, then turned around to check on her again. The way in which the house was structured lay a great view of the outdoors, far away from the over encompassing view of the suburban area the city had to offer, leaving her with a sight of the Memory park Square. Between the kitchen and the rest of the house there was a fake-wall.

‘Shall we run along where we hear the clutter? I see no point in making the through the shatter of stones and bow down to the many epics of forlorn knights. Our plants are pitiful, but only as the land allows us to spread the heat.’

Here he could not focus any longer, he was mild, in the head, he couldn’t concentrate. He lived a few streets away from the old man.

Most importantly, he was overcome by lust, it couldn’t matter. There were days where he couldn’t stop it, and chase them around the days and span of lays. All around the village-town, unable to contain his desire any longer, he called to the Dotton. It was their commune was called. For a simple reason they had prayed for someone nearing a contribution, pleading for him poor soul. With all the faces floating in the air, he felt euphoric now, since he couldn’t tell, out of his psychosis, what went on. But the feeling contrasted that false reality and what was going on around him. She had to be somewhere near, she had to hide somewhere around.

A woman, he fancied a lot, her name was Jane Luster. He could not take his mind away, nor pray for the thoughts to go. As his muse, the lady, the pleasant dame, he tried pursuing her with parched lips and broken hips, the coming of days. Out there, she felt used, for all the talk of town and all the sights went to. No the slightest shame to her display, she could not control what went through her body or her head.

‘Good morning.’

Jane would cheer during the night, when the time was right, never to ask for more. But most of all, poor Bind could not look around for any other woman than her. Fair skinned, a beauty of her age, a haughty looker he couldn’t convey the prize, looming around a bitter demise. As they all knew it would approach.

Nonetheless, to fathom confessing to a woman like her would take everything away from him, even the slightest hint, or that which would not exist. The hint that she was interested, the desire that he would stop fantasizing day through and day out, even through the stormy night, a fleet which could not take him away, as he desired her more and more throughout her stay. Most vengeful, he spent too much time thinking of her feet, the arch through which it curved, no flatness but no remorse, for he had thought of licking and of scraping. Most decidedly, he would be taking her around his home, an even in the most disgusting places such as the outdoors where his urges couldn’t even fathom controlling themselves any longer because of the prowess she instilled in him.

A lioness that went through taverns, and plenty quiet after dark. Could it be, was it decided? Was the fact, actually enacted? Some reason might’ve been, for her whoring herself after those who treated her like dirt in a sink of dead birds and bipeds which made everything fall. Despite what common sense fortold him, he couldn’t help but want her once, even as destructive as it was, seeing her around.

‘Good morning, miss Luster. Would you mind telling me where might I find, oh but what was I thinking about?’

‘Did something happen?’

‘Of course it hasn’t, my dear girl, of course, my memory is only not what it’s been in too long a time, you see?’

I seem to be still dwelling in the days of my youth, but for some reason.

May you sit down with me for a while?’

‘Why of course I will.’

It was cowardly, just staring. He wanted to grasp in some more and take something that wasn’t his, a peep or something, more and more until she finally undressed.

‘The seeds, that’s it, wouldn’t say that we should start planting some trees around?’

‘I think.’

‘That’s interesting, Jane, but I cannot wait any longer, I need to ask you something. A favor.’

‘Oh, if I could.’

‘Yes, you may be of service of me if you don’t mind me asking something as personal as this. But you see, I’m not exactly a man just yet. As young as I look and plain clothes, you may not get this out of me any other time.

But that’s the point, isn’t it? As messy as this might turn, I want to take something out of you.’

Even if everyone was watching and a few Agamemnons were latching on and turning to the scenes, they knew what was going on and in some way, this almost felt human-like. That and the fact that they would see fit to kidnap her and make some more. One for each of them instilled, even if there was no need. To replicate the feeling of being human, now that there were no children to look after, it could either go through some or either, each way. No human would there be to judge any of them. And as hedonistic and degenerate as they were, this was the perfect opportunity for it, as well.

‘I think.’

‘Right, and I can understand where you’re coming from, especially since I know I’m not exactly the most experienced man there is, but at the same time, isn’t that the point of it?’

I mean, we all have to start somewhere, don’t we? And, miss Jane, Luster, if you don’t mind me saying, I had my eyes on your for a while.’

Even now, poor man was shaking. This Jane was robust, a hourglass but thinner, she was full and her chest never sagged. Nicely shaped, rounded, the face of a saint, but a body and mind bred for whoredom. It was sagacious, thinking of it this way. But he couldn’t fathom holding it any longer, for everything a man was worth and everything which went through his mind, he wanted to have her. No shame, absolutely no shame in his mind. When she was distracted, he would peek at her, from the wrongest angles. Certain signs seemed to make her uncomfortable but he was never good at picking signs.

‘My dear lady, but I haven’t even presented myself, have I? My name is Dotton, exactly like the town. You wouldn’t mind telling me now.’

But how could he concentrate with her pushing through his face. It was not intended, yet it happened. So many things would happen, even if she had no clue. What he would do to her would turn the scabies of lust into tiny hoops that cast themselves in blood. Days were better, even since, they would be so, if only had he tried.

‘Will you follow me into my quarters?’

This was no invitation, there’d be no intervention, nor any kind of escape. He pushed her into a corner and did as he pleased with her as soon as the door was closed behind their backs, the maze. The maze had swollen, and there was not a single way out. Looking back at it now, this was a mistake she felt she would have no control after, nor would she be mad.

A frown on Jane, slowly she undressed. It wasn’t like she had a choice, it wasn’t like she outwardly, loudly and clearly protested.

It is perfect. As gorgeous as she is outside, this is what I wanted out of her now. A grin came on Dotton, he started wrapping his arms around her. Despite his lack of experience, which amounted to none, his perversion took over him. Too much time had passed. In some way she looked like a crying dolls, soft and touchy, and he moved on and felt all around. Thing was, he didn’t know what to do and what those feelings were. How to proceed and the confusion on his face as well, which had been gotten by the fact, that in the midst of it happening, he forgot about the most important part. Undressing, as much as it sounded the least intricate of things, he hadn’t done it immediately, instead, he took his time do get down and look from every angle, like an explorer.

Such a sight was disastrously unforgivable, for all who watched and what they felt, for him who was the main actor, for this play inside his den. It was the noise she made every time, with every repellant manner in which he started pushing in. He wanted to make something out of this, as shy as he was, Dotton did not shy way now.

‘Turn around, I need to undress now.’

He read on various mating rituals, those were enough. Despite the different species referenced in the manuals, some things did not fit, and he was bug-bit from looking around.

Some hands would fly and others could break and stretch. It was not unlike he had imagined at first, where he could break and form her in whichever way he wanted.

A few hours passed, finally he was released. Yet his mind was still as used as it was before, perhaps calmer than it ever was, with the only key difference being the fact that he felt no addition and no attraction to Jane.

Was this always as deranged looking as it were before? Through the glasses, there were longer homes and the sky seemed painted on top of a floor that was just as surreal. Everything fit like the pieces of a puzzle, or some escapade of paints that trembled after he made his first disquiet call.

‘But where have they all gone to?’

‘Why can’t I see what’s happening around me?’

‘Son, you’re a man, now, are you not? Here’s a pick, head down there, to my house and kill the beast before its young go on and breeds with my daughters.’

‘Will I stand a chance if I go near it? And what kind of beast is it?’

‘As a father to his son, have I not been dead for long enough for you to know that there’s no other reason for you to do something other than the fact that I have told you so?’

That was a reason, hence the pick. As tiny as it were, that meant he would have to come closer until he had picked up on the strangest days. Picked from the tumbling of nights, he conveyed little to no emotion, sleep was lost, but he was a man now, spiritually inclined. He who entered my childhood home will die this day.

Door opens, he’s in. A mess is spread across the first room, as everything is way too displaced for anything to happen or for him, stepped on it, spoken after a while. It was just as they would plead for it, a matter of time. After hearing the shrieks he came to the next floor to see them inside the drawers, like perfect cutouts that had been stored inside. And the fiend was there in all that moving molasses-like tar which appeared to move along and draw everything it could in it until it could not fathom any longer turning.

‘Let go of my sisters.’

But he could not fathom what carried on there, he did not understand that they were no longer of this world, nor would they represent what went on. Through each head and each swaying, the hatred only conveyed no use. It was a ceremoniously caught tremor, a blot of many other anchored creatures which resided into him. Each came out, carrying one of his sister’s heads in the back, trying to escape before they were caught, while the big one remained the same, still a moving mass with barely a few arms being distinguishable from the rest of its body.

One head still remained in the locker and that one would be preserved. Slowly the tar become lighter and from in, there was one need to breed them all, through a secret method, stored in plain wood. Out of the lower drawer, his children came, as wildly as they were.

‘Maddening fantasy, why must I dream of breeding? Why can’t it be helped?’

Then came one of the faces, pushing through the ceiling as their metamorphosis continued to make changes.

‘It is what humans want, isn’t it? We were the ones who placed it inside, we only wanted to see you lust and dream of more.’

‘All of you are sick, sick I wager. How could I fantasize about my own sisters that way? I, who have been young and bold, I who.’

Has committed an unspeakable act which could not peak nor reign his mind.

Tyvallan

‘His room is gigantic, you could fit the entire army of Tyan inside of it.’

‘Slow down Can, I can barely keep up with you.’

Past Slough came Alma, right in front of the room, underneath the boiler where she wasted no second until she joined her brother. Both of them took a moment to satiate their stay. It was a simple room filled with three beds, a few ottomans, plants and an open view to the open. Not a single helicopter-bird in sight, not a single valved pigeons that grows alive every time someone’s making noises. And it was pleasant being there for once.

‘Don’t get too comfortable, I don’t know how much we’re going to stay here for.’

‘Hey, look, Slough, I think you’d like this. Come on.’

‘Can, I’m trying to say something here, don’t.’

He seemed out of it. After the long journey through the pass this was the least he could do. People might hear them, but it was safe. Only a few more steps above them passed a few treasury stalls and the market-horses bringing in the giant gaits in their armoured black shrouds. The steps of the guardsmen and the mercenaries could he held aloft. Nobles and peasants cheered while they were down there into hiding, celebrating with the cherry-juice that had been packed for them.

‘Will you come already Slough? I said I’ve got something to show you.’

‘And what’s that?’

All three of them looked at what seemed to be one of the greatest pearls they had ever seen, taken from the bottom of the coral-sea, near the dreams of summer, where days paced about and never got lost. Where steps that missed the sand-traps were never ruminating past the gaze, but what could the pearl give them? Here, the only opportunity they had so far was this entry into their looks and shrouds.

Can wrapped his hands around it and started breathing in. He could see the farthest brims of the sea below, the ocean-floor where the fish speared into the long passes, just like humans into stagecoaches. Time was nearing by the looks of it. As plain as this room was, this was somewhat reminiscent of their younger days.

‘All right, keep playing with the pearl for a while. I think I’ll go ahead and, I’m going to be missing for a few hours, if you don’t mind.’

Can, may I trust you to take care of your sister while I'm gone?'

Alma was still enamoured with the pearl. But it wasn't like her to be too off the mark. She'd know what went on by the time he left the room. Which only left him wondering just what would happen to them in his absence, but he would be entrusted with it. He was all grown up. At least that's what he thought.

'Don't worry brother, you can count on me. I know you won't be dissapointed.'

'I know.'

I know. With a slight remark, Slough left. It was as much as he had hoped for, the slightest look of confirmation from her and he was off. Work was rough around the parts, so he heard. Especially when it came to finding out the right connections, since they never went out of their way to show what was happening there. He wanted more from the world, but settled with this now.

'Hey, you're Gunther, haven't we met at that old town fair some time ago?'

'Yes, twenty days, if I remember correctly at least. You wouldn't happen to have seen my son down the way here, have you?'

I sent him down the round just about the same time and, he has a tendency of going around and going whatever pleases him.'

'I don't think I have, Gunther. Has he not returned since there? Could it be that he's been lost along the way?'

'Oh, dear me, I certainly hope that didn't happen. My poor heart would not be able to take another blow to it since the death of the missus. I should not be speaking about it here, in the out.'

His throat had been cleared way too quickly. After turning around, I could definitely see the reason for it. There was someone watching, blunt of armor, quickly covered into nothing else but the fine ware he wore around his collar and around his chest. If there was something to be drawn about the man, it was the giant lace he carried around, which was as rusty as the rest of him now.

'Stay clear of him now, will you? Don't go near him if you can help it. He's called the Demon of Byr, be weary of him.'

Gunther went away as quickly as he was done talking about it. He was not supposed to do that, since that Demon of Byr had an eye on him.

'Wait, Gunter, what about your brother?'

Too late, it was one step too late before he made it back into his room. The hulk of the houseboat was shaking. Something much heavier than got through, whatever they were preparing for out there couldn't even get close to satisfactory, hence they continued. One of the giant briges, with the magnus heads and the giant gargoyles holding it in chains lowered down. And every shake, every beat of the wing and everything could be felt around it. They were clear on the shake and got way too close to comfort. It started spilling in from above them, without leaving much to the case.

‘We need to talk.’

Slough’s hand had been grabbed. Unfortunately it was anything but his weird companion, which left only the strangest thing alive to happen. It was the nymph from the woods, who followed him here. Although her skin was pale, her face was nowhere near as pure as it was before. Her journey down here roughened her. It was way too clear that she did not intent to show around.

‘Come with me immediately, I demand your presence in my room.’

‘What? You want me to do what?’

‘Grow up, and listen. I’ve been trailing you for a reason, and there’s that.’

‘Him? I’ve heard about him, but I doubt he’ll do anything to us.’

‘He will unless we.’

She had no idea what she was in for but that didn’t matter. They both took the first left and entered her room. It couldn’t have been it, but there was no endearing way to make a pass for it and for whatever reason they were stuck on in, on this strange day. Nothing seemed to be like it used to. Not since they moved in their barracks twenty feet further below.

It wasn’t going as planned any longer. Though they were drenched in anything but blood you could see it in their eyes. Most of them were bloodied with the dirt-flatter, a batterment of bodies clinging to them as their hands started going everywhere around them. Three drops, it only takes three drops to turn someone into them.

‘Have I not invited you into my grand castle, dear Draskssil? Have I not clothed you, given you wine and made something out of you when you have been lost for so long like a mutt, grasping for bone-straws on empty fields?’

Perhaps you need to be reminded of the hardship a lone man has to face by himself out there. Perhaps that’s the only way I might be able to put some damn sense into you. But tell me this at least, if you don’t even want me to give you the doubt of your bloodline, to even think you would not betray me, I want you to tell me this.

What do you see when you look down there?’

‘A ruin, my master, I see nothing but a ruin. Where there had been a castle, now there’s nought.’

‘Why do you think that is, Draskssil?’

‘I cannot fathom an answer for such a question, my dear master. I have only been by your side for how many years now? Twenty? Ten, perhaps less than that?’

‘And what would that tell you of either of us now?’

‘It would tell me that I have been loyal for a great deal of time. It would only say, come to think of it that I have tried, relentlessly, as much as it had ben in my power to aid you and never leave when the storms abound.’

‘What would the result of that be then? If not for the obvios thing, I have lost two sons instead of one. But only one of them had truly died, while the other stands along with I.

How could I deal living with my dead son in such a way?

Look at yourself Draskssil, you’re not the same man I have rescued from the streets, I couldn’t fathom trying to live with you for more than it is needed. And for that reason you shall forever outlive me and inherit a ruin that shall bask in the name of some low-born such as yourself with a blasted blood line that won’t even got to live past you.’

Instead of thinking of the better times, of the construction, and of the various holds, the villages and the forests that had been raised in his name, now the poor Duke’s name had been wrought to ruin. A pity to poor Duke Azolk, who had his servants flayed and left to be picked by the dark feathered vultures who were an off shot and a breed of the crows. It was they who spoke to him during the night. Perhaps somewhere around the highest chamber, where he couldn’t helpt it but open the window, that he found himself listening to their advice. Be it well or harmful, he wouldn’t tell anyone during the days where his court was filled with courtesans and jesters. No one to be filled with the awe of ages or be interested in hearing him spake.

‘And I will listen to you, my dear vulture, for I can see it, against your face. Though your skull might be that of your kin, I see that your face is that of a man I could trust. I may not inquire of how you came about the look, of which transgression you have been cursed to be this way, but know this.

Whatever your advice shall be, I shall stand and listen to it.’

He saw no better and no worse a way. Since too many men could not be trusted nowadays, this had been, as they said, and as they spoke of it today, the only manner of getting information. This unnatural creature had been a defector and somewhat of a scoundrel as well for those of its kin. But nowhere near, nor had he thought, that even in the wildest dream would he be anything even closely related to an informat. For they were a special kind of scum not even their own could deal with. Vile and viler as the outlandish room had become, he comitted to it and listened to what this vulture told him now.

He was bloodied around the beak. A part of his face was falling down and succumbing to the most disgusting looks that could be drawn. The more you looked at him, the harder it got to stare. The entirety of the world became him and he was only laughing instead of proceeding through its canines, that of porcelain.

‘I see now that you decided you ought to take my council, but know that there’s nothing in this world that might ever stop me from contacting my kin, my brothers and eating you before you even get a chance to riposte.

But since you have taken the time, this malignant idea of yours, might it not be wasted on the blind, I need be weary of nothing less and make you listen to me instead.

Walk not this path of yours or you shall find yourself resting on a pile of corpses and one of bones. It is as simple as a dark simile, out of which not even your kind might be able to draw out of.

This fair warning is both for you and them as well. Those who are watching you need not be repelled for the darker glass that is to come. As the eighteen winters, they shall arrive as well. None might be well unless you leave, and never come to return to the plains you have come to call your home.'

'And leave my property? Are you mad?'

For in his wonder, he had been overtaken by it, this fright of living just like them, to judge himself as nothing else. He would have no chance to live in the wild and those who waited him out there, he could only think of them as soon as he had taken his mind out of the gutter knowing. It would be more than disastrous, to look out of the way. Thence he was warned, and afterwards, it only got worse.

'There's another thing.'

The vulture spoke of, as much as he had been used to received news of the dire, this would take and gnaw at him before he could allow more servants to cross the murky attire.

'Lo across the land and hide, there's something which might be blind and blinder, for those of them who know. A few of them, short and stubby might find a way to get your sow.

Assassins are there, a nation on the hunt, you need be weary of them as well, as much as I could do well to see fini.'

He, the creature then disappeared out of the corner of the balcony before the entirety of it fell around the place. It was a disgraceful reminder that there was little to no hope to get away from in and no fealty could release the reins, the promise had still sat there in vein. This Duke, for he had basked in shadows knew little and could not set himself out there unprovoked. He could do nothing to get his kingdom back, nor was he less than more forlorn. He had been completely abandoned, if not, he had killed. On a whim, he walked around the gardens and knew nothing more than what he had left there when he had been but a child. In wonder, he created this place, glory to it, as it floated beyond any peculiarity that might hail and fall upon him.

Thence the beggars, all strung up. Some of them were nastily caught off guard or thrown around the place. It was more than a disgusting look on their rotten face and the disgrace that had been their lives. If he were livid back then, he would've shown them the meaning of pain in all its glory and the marks. For he had settled now.

'I shall rule this place, not latter not before but in this moment I shall create a cascade of blood out of the cradles and the crates around my storage.'

That would do, it should show everyone that he had still enough power over everyone, as much as he would do it by himself. It was decided then, after careful considerations, after stacking them together, they saw his effort and drew on. Some of the vultures brought young children ready for the sacrifice. Since he had not inquired and he hadn't even the slightest idea whether or not he wanted to know, only this happened so far. A babble here and one there, it didn't matter, who was here nor where. All that it did so far was add to the puddle. But soon enough, it could grow and release into something to travel much farther.

‘This is what I want of you, since you’re on a hunt, you want me to release you from these strange bonds you found yourselves receding back into.’

‘Yes, sire, anything, say, state your command. We might be able to do it in the slim of a second when the vileness finally runs out.’

‘Bring me as many of them as you can and I shall allow you to rest in here by the time my last servant is dead.’

To which they accepted and dared not mutter or leave a crow. Drakssil had already bit one of the poisoned handles, breaking his jaw as it gravitated towards his gut, becoming nothing more and nothing other than some arched bow that was unnatural for the touch. Then he shot his skull through his ribcage, destroying himself in a matter of second before joining the pile of disgrace which had been his.

All that which had been ruined because of him joined the makins of the ruin. But the ruin didn’t matter. Nor what he had lost before, as there would be no compensation for the servants, let alone their families instead of what he produced here. He who had turned to faith was greeted by something of the making. Truly he was a lost spirit which could not embrace anything and nothing more, he was lost to his people and to his own servants.

‘Stop tormenting us.’

They said. For far too long had their sewages and their cities been drenched in the likes of their own children as they yelled.

‘You are not a Duke no longer, but the wretched evil which inhabits this world. You must suffer and be destroyed.’

But to the villagers that settled around him, who had prepared an army and got ready to take him down, this sight of a false cliff, looking from below, they knew fear when his chivarly arrived. Surrounding them in the days of the mad-danes, the vultures had been enslaved. Though it was unknown to them as well as they could see, he dragged all of them into a battle they held no ill content to be in. Vile he was and even more uncanny. Surrounding his castle, the black spreading forest coughed. Many of the men were unable to prevent the contamination that occurred from the brown, yellow, orange, green, violet and blue gasses that got released into the air.

No longer were the oaks green, for they had been colored by the decay of the gases as soon as they could grow wildly out of everything. They’ve been fed for far too long and now they grew with little to no remorse after that. IT was decided, that out of them, only ten men would be allowed to live. So far as they ran, most of them would be spared, instead of the tar which had been their bodies.

‘Go my first vulture.’

Though he was not a vulture any longer, by the looks of it, he had evolved. His spine contorted and became such as a disc would in the most unnatural form it could lay in. No wonder that the first contact with a man would do it such harm. As soon as they established a physical touch, the man stepped back and threw another torch around.

‘Strike at it now!’

It reeled in and started fighting back. Not only would it not allow him to harm it, but he could do anything but spare the shroud he hid in, leaving out all the pain. He was mightily deranged after the second strike had landed in, the beak taking way too long to clean him of the skin. From the side he started foaming not only with blood but with a putrescence which encased his head like a mask. It leaped out like a cubical sphere, dragged out by a pair of feet, while the rest of his body lost about everything it had been fighting to store inside.

He opened himself up, wasting no second as he opened himself to another attack, as he was still standing. Despite everything he had taken, he was still not done and the others knew it, as the villagers pointed their pitchforks and small knives in a pitiful attempt to stamp him out.

Everyone turned on their neighbor. Without control, their brains stagnated in some kind of tumor-rage which forced them to kill him as strongly as they could before feeding themselves the pain of force. More than that, gas turned their insides, slowly, into puffs of bile and of vermin powders.

And the elated vulture crooks its body and chuckled at the sight, as he had no care in the world at that.

Farther.

It was the ultimate survival strategy, bent in filth of the eye.

Bore stooped the lowest of the lost, unable to fathom the lust he had acquired while snooping around them. He had undertaken a brain derangement. Shaking all over the prospect of making someone cut himself with a razor made out of wide cylinders, with no other reason than the fact that it likened the appearance of dread in the eyes that traveled around him.

He was stopped from the stroll.

It was at this point he realized, regardless of the name or the being that. That he was sick, in the mind. He couldn’t control his actions any longer and no matter where he looked back to, there was no cure. There was no escape from it.

He knew what they were, he saw everyone, the darks with their criminal behavior, the ones that infiltrated nations with their disregard for everyone else and the lights with their superiority complex expressed in whichever manner they found fit. In the end there was no escape from what they were, no matter what kind of behavior was instilled into them, no matter what processing had been forced in their minds. There would always be violence, savagery, filth expressed in whichever way. And not a single one of them would be higher than the other. And not a single one of them should be seen the same.

He found solance in objects there, knowing that he himself was like them. They were pure, they were inanimate, sincere, never to lie or harm others under their own guise. Or they would harm them upon the will of others but remain free of guilt.

There was an old iron he kept around. Its teeth were barred shut. He was determined that the iron was the only thing pure in a world of chaos, out of the very fact that it looked the way it had. Completed by punching through the air, he felt only the hot wind blissfully pushing through as he had done it repeatedly. Here and there, acts of violence just about everywhere, no one bated an eye. It was tainted after all and no interest could be drawn from it.

Morose pipes

The same man was about to stare death in twenty meters in.

‘We’re going to chase the little man with a green hat. He looks like a frog.’

It was a call back to something else. Muck’s friends kept them around when he felt bad.

It was the only thing they could do there, to pass the time.

While he was absent.

Absent for way too long.

They were happy there, for a while. Even though he had them inside his heart, this was important. He needed to have this. He was met by the strange heads, him being one of them as well. Without a say, he looked up to them. It was only a little time they spent together, but ever since then, he knew that something was off. The reason for that was that they were simply different. Every single one of them was different and each of them felt something else. What pained him more wasn’t guilt. He wasn’t the only feeling it. But one of the heads, Lour, to which he pointed his brow at felt it. He was the one set on Claire, the one who remembered her now. And he was also the only one who almost lost his nerves and compassion because of what she meant to him and them. It was indescribable now, since he noticed that we were staring.

And from his pain, the contagion started dripping through the drain. It gave like to another unnatural creature, another humanoid, another beast, another sub-human, another painful thing to be looked upon. Though he was no different, half of his face a mark, born with metal barging brisk limbs that pushed into the ground like cutlers. He had only been the symbol, the monsters that were created in the absence, the world that was falling without him being there. Men being chased off and made to pay for. All because he missed her so much. And neither of them wanted to admit it yet. It crossed his mind long before it happened that there might not be a chance for him to ever see an image of her before he was dead.

It was the one curse that prevented everything from rightfully existing, his refusal to move on. The fall, if anything, of paradise from which he had lived, the one he was born in and whence he left nought should remain.

‘And finally you decide to open your mouth.’

‘We’ve been waiting for you to say something now. I didn’t think we’d ever get to hear you again.’

‘Why am I here?’

‘Stay, just stay, the reason isn’t important. We cannot, under absolutely no measure lose you again, don’t you realise that?’

It’s been months, years, more, since we waited for you to come here and look around with us. Like in good old times, search for something. Anything, to take shape, you know, Malt.

One of us, an explorer, someone who’s happy; but you’ve been out of it for far too long. What happened to you?’

He tried. Some time ago, he actually tried. It felt like the invisible knot in a man’s mind, or a child’s attempt to understand what the adults thought about. Another head remembered the abuse he had instilled in his brother and sister, while the other one became the gatekeeper of great happenings, one for the bunker, one for the hideout, or for whichever region and everyone spread around after. At least, so far, it wasn’t just a memory, as everything seemed to be happening at once. Yet they could remember, they could share and nothing made a lot of sense. Nor would it have to do, for what was coming over them compensated none.

‘We have to seek a way out. I think. At least one of us needs to find a way through this. Before we’re all forced into a place.’

‘Would that be as harmful as you’re making it sound? Think about it for a moment now. We could all live in the hideout, we could all live underneath the roof of it without ourselves as our protectors. It’s the only great way to be.’

In a matter of saying or looking at it, he was just as right. Some of them could not fathom returning to each prison they were stuck in. Since so many of them were so-alike, it only meant a thing.

‘You tried escaping too many times, haven’t you?’

‘Time after time, again and again, we cannot be as powerful or blessed as you.’

‘Agony for you, as you’re the strongest. Yet in all your glory and your false omnipotence, it has never occurred to you that we may be in need of being saved.’

‘I did not know about either one of your existences. Surely you cannot blame it all on me alone, my shoulders can only bear so much.’

Henceforth why he didn’t know.

Relk

Barn and Eerie never bonded, nor would they get the chance to show something that would make their worth. They set something there to pass the time. It wasn't much and it could be something of a stretch to make it seem otherwise. None the wiser, Barn took the reins, installing the suite he had converted out of the recycled panel underneath the cockpit and its battery-engine; since there would be no life support needed to ensure they lived, this was a taken. No explanation had been given to the lack of exposure, only the eeriness of the halls. The tunnels ahead and the strange chopping blocks right around where you could hear them talk from time to time. Yet they hadn't even concluded who those people were and what they wanted. Always in fright and never around, this much was what they did and what they could do.

'Send another mouse, please, I want you to do something here.'

The flashy lightings, perilous as it were, had nothing of the kind of them. A pair of mice-thompers succumbed to the delight they produced, an invisible light which could be seen and recorded by them.

While another pair was sent, one of the magnetic tapes was slowly being removed from inside their meaty brains. Another unexplainable thing had been this weird and peculiar fact. In the tract of the strange devices they had, these mice, who were nothing more but the robotic shapes they had dealt with couldn't and were not supposed to work that way. It was beyond extraordinary how they managed to survive despite having metallic shrubs pinned inside their brains and what now. Least of all, could it be said about the other deranged activities they had to deal with.

But they expressed the images in some way which has never been seen before, plastic, plain, almost like a projection of the forms that obscured the invisible light in the marches of the mice, to which no other race could do. So thorough was this rendition of the thing that they had nothing more to say. Those were real people just like them, and by the looks of the faces that all of the sudden appeared near the mice, they observed the wrongness they had to endure. Since they couldn't scream, they seen it.

'You're wrong, Eerie, someone broke its skull down there, I think one of them were killed in a fight, I can see it around the back of his throat. Something had been pinned there, and it's only gotten worse.'

Barn pointed, he had taken it in, allowing it to bounce and shatter. The image then came back in. He was still being bashed with a hammer in the back. Speciment number two, somewhat human. Bigger potato-top which had completely grown on top his chest, his arm going out of one of the ear-hole that stood adjacent to the rest of the body. From the reason there were not normal, his legs resembled tall snake-like figures which had completely become engrossed by eating two anatomically formed men. This would be his next victim. Another mouse stopped, another band was placed on.

It seemed like this went on for minutes or for hours. At this point it was way too obvious that they refused to take any kind of pleasure any longer, redeeming itself in acts of anger which only forced this process to go on. A continuation followed soon after as the others joined him. Similar in appearance to the others, it was clearly defined, they knew what was going on.

'Close the door, lock it.'

Eerie was just about done cutting the frames and throwing the mice out. Despite what was seen there, some of the mice were out there and they would come back.'

'One of us needs to head out there and kill them before they return while the other one stays here.'

'You can't be serious now, can you? Do you have any clue what's waiting for either of us out there? We'll take our chances and we'll wait.'

'So be it.'

Two hours had passed. Since they could not take this any longer, the opportunity of exploration had already been taken away from them. It was all so important now not to destroy their chances of getting out alive, or at least living a few more decades. For that reason they killed all animals present and ate them raw. Still munching, both of them drooled blood. But in this regard, they unmet life in a different way.

'Lights out?'

'Lights will turn out for the time.'

'Twenty sounds good?'

'Twenty it is.'

Despite this being something which would not be heard by everyone else, they simped and listened. Wrong as it were, they were desperate to get somewhere, a mind of dirt. Whoever was pulling the strings there was also working on the surroundings. One Violator ruled outside the living areas. It could not be that they were trying, at least not in the same way as they had done in the past, to preserve life under any circumstances. Unknown to them, the cockpits had become repurposed coffins on the outside, for those who had been brave enough to venture.

'Stick a bone in em.'

A singler cyber-creting came along. He was still somewhat reluctant to get too fast to the Violator, since in the maddening touch, he had obtained a greater taste than that of flesh. It was way too obvious by the likes of it. Needful, as it were, the creature wanted to disembowel the android and make sure every piece of him no longer has a trace of organic powder. But in the wake of someone who might define this rule of his, the Violator constantly bashed the walls and did as he pleased with the echo and the mad sounds that came along.

In the age of decadence, the Violator was the warden and the new God. Since the red pit that fellt from above got sealed off, he would show no interference until he did it out of his own will, at that. There was no sun and no wish yet, Agamemnon still remained hidden in the bunker, his vessel never fading away. That bothered no one so far.

Horn in the walls. Simple as they were, you couldn't beware of them. As the echoes of the universe continued, no one neared the death and the dark, the likes of the shadows that dined on themselves.

It sapped the body, it sapped the soul. Being there, unspoken on errands without the chop of a mound, a mouth that was unattached to everything else.

Circular and precise, it cut through their skin as they couldn't handle messing with it in the midst of their minds. No competition, no attrition, they spent the time following him. That one, in the bunker, going deeper, chasing and spreading ahead, like peculiarly deformed bodies that never stood a chance out there, to the caress of the men they entered. Mindless husks that they were, empty in direction and wonder.

Now came the Suppressors in their death.

By a stroke of luck, it only started above, where the citizens of the movers had already most of their lives taken away from them. Vertigo, pubisilism, damned to no direction.

The real threat wasn't what was seen, but that which could not be touched, not even by them, in the wake, the dawn. Soon they entered the bodies, unknowing of what would surround them or why they were all set so quickly on the ceiling.

It begins with them.

Mountaionous-calloused man one.

Mountaionous-calloused man two.

If not for the lots of widespread wild-life going into each direction, covering a great mass of land, unable to pursue an end or find out where it ends, the other wide spread imitations. Nothing going, always stagnating:

Mountaionous-calloused man one:

'Shall we start with the sap, the one that fills the rivers around them, without being touched by ants, the gross surroundings, the moss and the dirt?

I see that you have not managed to touch it yet. I see that you have never felt what's it like to be encased in it as well. Before the resin of men came to dragn and carry it to the other side of the land, where there's thirst and yet there's hunger in the regions yonder that they go through. Have you seen the air which travells.'

Longer silences led to nowhere. And they were not willing to discuss the sap. It looked like red amber after all, bloody guts in disgust.

Grain effects in walls, tall lanterns unable to be distinguishable at all.

A large compact solid shape, in the form of a cruiser that's been forced into a curvature that could only resemble the overly protruding spine of an elderly man came after, it drank from the sap, like a giant who was nothing like what he recalled. Soon the land was in its shape, as it only spread through the sap, infesting it with the sight of the veins.

‘As we were saying, master, there’s no way we could’ve grabbed a hold of him in there, not at this time, not any longer. He’s gone through one of the lower roots and succumbed to the growth. He’s destined to destroy it, making his way to us.

And once he’s reaching the point of no return, I shall fear no other fear than that of my life fleeing into the darkest holds of our paradise. Awaken, my son, I have to talk to you in the direst of sleeps.’

Risen from slumber, Mikailov sought no other escape from this sudden assimilation of thought his father had proposed. Likened to him in thought, he could only drowse himself in the pain and wonder, what were they to do after all? Within his sight, from one of the highest standing buildings in sight, he sought a ruin and he found it. A scent approach, that of a doming crane that had pierced its own eye in order to avoid the sight of fading men. No animal would endure terror and they were aware of that.

‘My dear son, you are aware of it, that I know. There’s an end to all good things in life, even in that which shall grab a hold of us in the past and in the new age that’s coming.

Look around you, and you’ll be quick on your feet to understand that this rotting cadaverous city shall be invaded. Our people cannot deal with the cold like they used to do it any longer.’

‘And what do you propose we should do, father? I see no reason to continue such a sad existence with the likes. Have you not sent out all of our servants to go and get lost out there in a land that’s unlike ours which may never be redeemed?

Is this place not foreign to us now since the sea of snow had turned into a bitter clot of blood-like growths? I see no reason I should stay, for I shall become one of them. Like our people who bent themselves and separated one another from faith, I see it now and I shall see it again when it will mostly matter and when none may call us there to the judgement of ages. They know we cannot fight for long. We can’t last without supplies, servants and workers in the lower mine-shafts and the golden searchers in the myre.

Those who don’t live in metal holds or buildings, mansions or those akin to our own shall be rooted and eaten, father. As long, as it would last, they had abandoned their faith and they cannot even hope to last in a world of heathens, filled with the stagnation of machines. Ever since their dawn and the rise of theirs, I cannot fathom their mad religion and how they worship something that isn’t theirs.’

‘Wait, my son, and listen now. It is not our time to judge them for having faith, not when we are guilty of the same crimes as they are, where we abandoned that which had always been there, but which had been estranged. I see something in the nearest of times.

A dark machine, a creation of manking that draws power from everything that ever existed and everything which shall be, as there’s a need for the organic matter to compress everything into the livid history we’re bred from. Without this machine, I feel that we shall lose even what we got left here and be enslaved to the devices of its enemies.’

‘And who are those enemies, father?’

‘Why, is it not clear, now, my son? Have you not looked at the signs yet? Perhaps you have but you chose to ignore them.

The worst enemy of all is not the machines, not the growths and everything that spreads like a disease. But us, men, who fight against one another, no matter what might be created or named, no one can satiate the will of another man.

I have seen something much worse than that, as better, more cruel and terrible creatures that call themselves human managed to embed in it. They shall try to make it human and in that process we shall be destroyed. No matter what you may come to think of me, my son, know that I have been made with only a scope alone.

So far I see no other reason to live as long as I will be brought to a world of disease that shall never rise from the enslavement it pushes out.'

As lo and behold, he was not wrong. But to point at that, thing, which was no machine, instead you'd have to look through waves, of agony projected on top of every reign, the masses always spreading through the trash-inducing fornication. Damned they be, the creature had resolved. One longer strip formed, and many other came at last. As it connected with the rest of the land, there was no reason to hope that you could prevent it from spraying itself with rivers of bodies, needed in order to grow.

Stagnation could only be avoided with the minds of men being taken away from them but never recovered when needed. Only recorded when one could get away from the sight. It was the heaviness which protruded like horns, whereas something that moved held no handle to those static forms. Lost after reach, each randition had been frozen solid and couldn't even hope to move in the peace of glances, meat was dry. Those who roted only joined each other in the song of the dye, which was produced from the supreme machine, the wonder of electronics that could not even be called upon.

'Cull the masses in disgust, I see no reason to call upon them now. If you see a fellow man in battle, do him a favor and punish him, killing his family before he gets stronger.'

Mikhailov said. He spared nothing more than was needed, instead of spending the little time he had left in this world in contemplation, he had decided that it was time to carry on his father's will out of the indentation of the masses. He'd drown the world in rivers of their blood. No longer had he felt numb about it, as he only chose to do what's right. Preach from his writing, cull the disease.

'We don't deserve to be living if it means allowing our minds to be absorbed. If it gets a hold of us here, I guarantee you that there won't be any reason to live any more, with the perfect man replicated in a machine, like a worm squirming and a dead-cut that spreads.'

First of those who wondered came praying. He had no reason to survive. And for that, whatever heaviness dragged him down could only be used now to take him away. His life pulling him into a hole that wasn't even as deep as it should be. Farther than this line, no hope awaited. Humanity ended long before it reached its full potential, but no one care as long as they were fed the lines. Bled in the blending masses, most of them moved along.

'I see you have become obscure.'

He suddenly pointed at one of the men who had felt out of tune. Both his life and the likes had been useless for it.

And let it be as clear as it could be drawn from the domain of the inside the metal spaces that were being transported inside the main region of this so-called HUMAN. It was glorious how it wasted its time inside its own castle-like form, as if the others couldn't recognise something as well known as Kovialat, but it should be pointed that there were others that couldn't spare a watch.

It was unconventional. The attack was unprovoked. First they tried breaking in, after seeing the murals and the song songs of the men which were beaten down by an unfathomable amount of strikes that were carving their chests out. Most of them were recreations, a way to make it seem like the machine actually cared about what was going on with them. But it was plainly fake, a false event. Outside they brought tanks, inside the grit grew thicker. More and more the walls expanded until not even their likes could break in for some reason.

They were of another breed now, or so it seemed. By that, they acted differently, without their normal jacks and trades, without trying to let their eyes get out of the way, this was everything they wanted and more than they expected.

'You need to move on. I don't think it's ever going to arrive.'

'Oh yeah and what makes you say that?'

Elegant looked at Last. He was out of the water, out of it by every possible mean. He was out of it, just like he had been before. Without a way of knowing what was on his mind, they loosened their nerves and loomed around, thinking of a way through.

Further in movers

A few more hours passed or not it seemed. They were wighing down the place for some reason now, checking to see whether or not there, for a while now. Without speaking for long, they were on the break. It was called so. Both of them had become way too deranged to do something about it, lost in thought. Something approached at wild intervals for some reason. It was a reminder that they were still not out of the skimmed water. And something would let them know, a reminder, so to say. It came at wilder intervals, the knocking, all until it had been way too calculated to be ignored.

'It's your turn Barn.'

'No, you're supposed to go there, Eerie, you know I've been growing sick of doing it now.'

'We both made a promise that we would survive, at least a few more days. And I don't think all those mice we crushed back there have any say in it any longer, do they?'

Of course she would go that route. It didn't bother him enough, as if she could make the time worth it. They've been stuck in there for far too long, with their valves tuned and the pumps keeping them going, preventing them from falling asleep. That was just another thing they had to deal with, constantly, and it was close to feeling a migraine pushing through the numb-nut. Check the door Barn, make sure Eerie doesn't notice it. There were only a few way to get through this at least, in the vein of trying, it was more than decided that they could do nought about the pumps. Stopping them, ignoring them or not even making sure they don't disable themselves from time to time would result in their immediate termination. IT had been their way out if they hadn't paid enough attention. And in they'd go and out of it, snapping back to reality, in the bubble-bath together. Sitting there for hours, watching how the water turned muddy. He had waited this for a long time, and if he had waited a bit too longer, his instincts might've kicked in.

Far too many times had he fantasized about her, especially since they were there, alone, the two of them having no chance to get out of it. Often, she'd slip, in his mind. That had been all planned, well said, well thought out, a plan to get her in the right mood, to get her water-ration spiked so he could get rid of the feeling. Barn made sure she'd hear it, when the walls were raised and when he was all alone. It was a constant she never dared asked about, but that was a given since it could only sound like an invitation since the two of them were alone all the time, no one there to stop him if he tried a little harder, or if he grabbed her around without telling whether or not she might find him.

It was the one miracle he had been thankful for, ever since the dawn and the destruction of humanity, from what he had expected to be a cruel life of experiments, finally Barn found peace. And there was no pesky neighbor to look back at him and no more play with the pets. Most animals would be done for in this condition, no to mention the fact that they had urges as well.

'Are you feeling right? You haven't spoken with me in a good while. I think it's awfully mean what's you're doing to me.'

Slowly he caressed her hair. His hands slowly curled and went into the realm of lowers. It was all too inappropriate, but she hadn't complained about it. Nor would that had stopped him from doing anything to her. He had an act to do it, he was born for it, or he had spent so much time in here, alone with her that he couldn't help it any longer. An arm reached even father in and started stroking despite the moans. Various sounds could be heard but these hadn't come out of pleasure. It felt disgusting but it had to be.

Another few hours were wasted that way. Then there would come the feed. From one of the broken black boxes they managed to rewire its insides and connect it with the food storage. It wasn't much but they were fed just enough at various day intervals to be kept alive. With everything rewired, they could feed themselves on command. Which immediately drew back to the silence until they were ready to sleep, most of the nights were similar. Or fractioned, like the sleep cycle of an insomniac who realised what was happening and spent most of the day napping. A clock was on top of the walls, it was an insert, implanct, interpolated with everything else. In other words, untouchable, clear to the ceiling and the eye, plain and simple as soon as it could be found and tracked down.

It was useless at the same time since it could never hit the right times. And most of the markings didn't make any sense to begin with, henceforth they were stuck with an irresponsible system that more than often backfired on them. Numerals always changed, but there was one thing at the middle, where the tongues sprouted from. The marking still switched, it still went along, the numbers still rolled down despite them not being in an apartment. Perhaps they shouldn't have cradled the hours, but that was it.

Eerie went into a depression. Some of the mornings he found her wailing silently on the floor, or she'd sit all silently, trying to harm herself somehow, awkwardly caught in. Boiled skin despite there being no boiler and the sound, out of everything she hated the sound that was forced on her ears. It was nothing that would even work, from the bottom of her heart and everywhere else, she wanted to be elsewhere, not in this new so-called home.

Mainly, she dreamed of the streets outside and normal lanes where children played, life, in other words, a life which had been unadulterated.

So much power had produced an effect that almost seduced the wilder, thrice as hard.

‘May I have a smoke?’

Past the portmanteau, he grinned.

Barren

Strange how this place could be so easily described, like the womb of a woman, who had failed in her frail attempt at her own life, swollenly enscribed below. There was something missing, for some reason, but that was wildly entranced. It was no easier than it had been before, trying to look after the young, even though they were missing from sight. It was below her own frail mind. It was even.

‘Two more, shall we start at it again?’

‘Nothing more than that, could we at least look for a way out?’

‘We’ve been dead for hours.’

From one burning corpse to the other, both of them were in agony. Burning men with no remorse for what they did before.

Who were they and what could they do? Since the dawn of this day, half-way through it, a scuffold in the blood, correlated with disease, someone pushed on.

‘Shall we wait for the old man?’

Agamemnon asked without being as delirious as he had been before. Where was it? There was no way of swaying. With everything said and done, the only thing that mattered was violence.

It ran through the blood and appeared to be the only thing keeping him alive. The heads that were present in the room. He suddenly started shaking in the advent of the memory. And all of the heads which surrounded him immediately exploded in an unfathomable spree of gutted blood.

‘I will not die here.’

Malt thought, as he did not despair. He could not fathom allowing his heart to die just yet, not when there was still so much to look after. And most of all, there was one thing they could not take away from him. Courtesy to the strange whirling shadow inside his eye, he pushed through.

A memory of abuse, that he needed to survive and get through no matter how hard he would throw a punch, or loom around. No matter how disgusting it had been, he saw no other reason to contest it.

‘Yes, we were talking about something twenty minutes ago, weren’t we?’

‘About what now, right, about the extermination protocols. Heard something about them, haven’t you?’

‘Of course I had, it’s the thing everyone’s talking about these days, at least since the war started, no one seems to be talking about anything else.’

That was Vladimir, he was Malt’s friend. He worked on the belt most of the time and appeared to confess to no thing unless it somehow involved him waking at every hour or making a point about something. And he had an obsession as well, always striking the clock. It was important that he had a look at the clock most of the time, unless skipping or messing the passing of a single tongue. About the place, there were twenty other clicks. For the eyes and the others, no one watched for too long now unless you had something to say.

Some brawls here and there conveyed no emotion, except the hardship they spread between them. It was obscure and hard to see.

‘We’re going to be overworked to death if we keep this up.’

So much trouble, he was in so much trouble and he couldn’t help it. He rose when he wanted and went back to his chair. And he kept pushing himself back on it. Getting up and sitting down, then getting up, then sitting back on it. That’s where he found the fun. There were four days, five days and simple ones. Mostly calm, getting calmer now, it was only going to get harder from this point on despite what the other workers thought. The main problem was the chief-engineer who had a wickedly turned eye on him at all times, trying to peer in where he did not belong. So far, so far, he could not abstain from work despite the constant need for breaks. It was unexplainable, to think of it this way. Some peering eyes could only stay on him for so long before breaking him, least of all could he understand where they were coming from. It had been plain and dark. Just about the place and everywhere around him, there was an echo which contained just about everything which happened outside.

Malt was here, in the post-death. It felt that way, the same manner a soul would go through once it reunited with the pieces it lost. And they trembled and moved along, choosing the next definite thing. No lack of intrusion and still no shame so far.

‘What’s going on out there?’

‘Stop acting like a child Malt, you know what’s going on. They’re preparing the wolf and the bear. I can see it now, right in front of them, with the largely feather hairs and everything else that made the others sway.’

What was he on now? Could he get even more annoying than this? It was cruel to ask, but even with everything that went between the metal breaks, there hadn’t been a single confirmation on the ocean breakers. Farther in the south, where the sea had emerged out of the lost peaks, they spoke of another coming. Troops were trying to frankly steep in and left signs of having invaded the place. Yet there hadn’t been any invader. As a matter of fact, there seemed to be no fight going on at all. Through some worse way, this was it. What they heard was real, for no other reason than it being so. Disquietude was the least of their worries. Farther in. His family was being taken care off, even though they had stopped communicating with him over a long period of time. It was largely expected, poundry and felt inside. There was no shame for no one any longer, as they had been driven to poverty. Still, not a man on the streets, at least not as well as they expected it to be, they made it through. No starvation. That was mainly the cause, if they were to be seen that way.

Fifty-fifty chance for something to happen, it was just about expected now. Factory, he was there, he was in the factory, she had been there as well. Though not at the same time, not in the same reality, not in this livid manifestation which could not have been lost, but somewhere, everything had clearly been placed. And every actor in this world remained barely formed, depending on the distance they had encapsulated or placed themselves, near his proximity. A dreadful image in the distance, where the land had been broken in completely degenerate sides, various people had their faces kicked in and could not concentrate any longer. Other than that, graves remained, underneath every wreckage that had been the forests, spreading and missing, least of all hissing as they made their way.

‘I propose an armistice.’

Came a voice from one of the shacks that had found themselves in the guttural world. It honed no word of its own, at least not unlike the many sprays, destined to remain. An obsolete man came near and took the reign. He was in the factory now, one of the few survivors. Anton had seen Nadya die, without any chance of survival, she had been lost. To think she would die in the prime of her age, he cowered no longer and approached that slim entrance she had made. It was outside, no, closer in, or through a way out, a road lay barely formed out of the one corners that lead through the factory. To even believe it otherwise would be a mistake. Damned though it may have been they listened.

Both of the strangled men, the dead-scouts, which had been completely made out of the bodies of the men which had been stretched out of the belts, it was a sight of abomination, those who had found her body and managed to make what they willed out of her. In worse cases, he might’ve known something was off.

But Anton was out. He was desperately trying to find Nadya, for some reason, going as far as to hide in one of the weird bricks, trying his muscles as he started pushing out of his feet. And he was thin enough and broken to get through. Bleeding even as he forced his guts to change in shape and size and be taken by the eating stone, the brick and holes appearing side-ways in his brain. Would he be pained? Nay, that did not matter in the least, after feeling their leashing eyes.

‘Where have you come from?’

Anton wondered at the peculiar beings who had kidnapped and had taken away their lives. He simply could not fathom looking back into a world like their own, which was fair, where men would be light on their feet and working. Stranded no longer in a world that did not fathom looking to their needs alone, if there was such a thing, he was a dreamer.

‘Eat everything, every molecule of her, make sure nothing will change.’

There was a simple difference between being pained out of something that happened and this. This was different, it was a sight which would torture the weak of heart. Expanding on their own, they could not fathom looking.

‘Stop.’

Both of the abomination, which at this point looked too bulked and elongated to be men had given way to no interesting mutation, whichever that be. Dreadful and unsanitary, lost to the bestiality they showed. Shameful that they should turn and reveal it so, as there was nothing inside them but a conundrum of lost guts, a fresh drench, trenches that were dug inside. And in them, they held large bone-cylinders upon which they rolled the bodies of the people which succumbed to them. Incommensurable, as it were, they remained, silently unconscious. Feeding upon the pain that bloodened the world. It peaked at a lost sky, it bled after many tries. Lesser pucks appeared on the sky and agony threw itself forth. A lost within a sight, was lost within.

‘I have ordered you both to remove any trace of her and every other human that has been here. No exception and no lesser satisfaction could draw away from them. Make sure you won’t pray for the taking as long as I say.’

Whoever gave the orders could not be seen. But there was something about him which only made sense from the bottom of his throat but not above it. That so far was the worst sign, thinned dryly until it had become nothing of the kind. Blasphemous, or not, he pushed back and came to greet him at last.

‘Malt, isn’t it?’

Cried Anton, after having taken a leap between the dreadful sight and the ones that had shaken off this world. It was hard enough trying when no one listened to you talk, but here he was out of his element and could do nothing of the kind. All the eyes were yet averted. Malt could not be defended here. Not while he was still messing around with their lives. And every moment which simply passed meant that there was something which hastened around the place. It was a disgrace he himself could not fathom, at least not alone. It shone and made him feel unwelcome.

‘I think you need help.’

‘From you? I don’t think so. I can handle doing this by myself.’

‘You’ve been trying to get off that chair for more than an hour, Malt. I don’t think you’ll make any progress any longer.’

Allow me to help you, will you?’

‘I already, kindly, declined. Do you mind not staring?’

‘I can only do this much.’

He took a few steps away, trying to go slower on the devices which made the belt function, only so he could give an example on how easily it went. So far, this was working, even if forever bolting. On a metal river, rivets would melt. It was concise, the way he tried to piece everything together.

After living so much in the dark, after spending so much time in that one dark corner, Malt chose to stray his hand, pushing himself out of the way. It was hard, trying to make it out of the cave because now everyone saw him. They could look at him. There was no personal space, no privacy any longer, and they could all see him at times. It was almost as if shame had taken a new form in his mind and it disturbed him more than he could believe. Worst of all, there was the crying, prying in a kind of business they did not belong to.

‘Finally decided to join us, Malt?’

‘Shut up, I was only warming my arms.’

He thought so at least, or so had he tried to justify it. Now there were no helping wings, nothing he could borrow from them. And in the factory, everything seemed too calm, almost like a court. They were only turned into the servants present in a court for a reason. It was because they were there. Distantly lost, Suppressors aligned, winged on every side and just as deformed. True, their forms were darker, eyes were shady and appeared to have bags underneath them, but what else could they do? It was a mystery as much as it had been a choice, otherwise, their minds could’ve been lost and would’ve been traded at the cost of fewer days.

Spend one between each class, push one atop the panel and you’d understand what was going on. This Anton, the new-comer, or so, as he had appeared to be, had been in this factory for far too many years to be accounted for. If one were to make the difference, he would forger, or ignore. There was no reason to pass away without pacing. It went slow. Another set of simple commands could somehow do it. Again, there were many eyes which were prying in. They didn’t belong there. It made him feel way too uncomfortable. As a matter of fact, this was the most human he ever felt in a long time, which was the sole reason for him not enjoying what was going on.

No lust and no rage, nothing too deranged. Perhaps it was something much worse than he could ever expect it, but for some reason he appeared to enjoy it as well. A guilty-pleasure of his own.

‘That lever should be higher and make sure you turn the second crank around that red area, between twenty and eight.’

‘What’s that supposed to be?’

‘It stands for diameters. Don’t worry about it, that should move on its own for each set of plates you’re carving. Just make sure that you don’t overdo it, all right? Keep in mind that it needs to be in the same area and never leave that red spot under no circumstance.’

‘I got it.’

He reassured himself that everything would go fine, at least as long as he expected it to. Perhaps in a few better days he could’ve reached a point where there was nothing he could not do. For now he waited and considered the following.

A few heads which resembled him exploded, they should be destroyed. They looked like him but acted queerly, in some way he could not disjoin himself from. If he were to look around and choose to say, what was in his mind vaguely resembled them. And they had been around for some reason, trying to make it through. Larger than expected to the point where they projected themselves in. It's been a ruse, somewhat, their dissintegration or complete destruction. He felt unlike no other man.

'What's wrong?'

'Nothing, I was only feeling a tiny bit out of the water.'

There was shark-bait in the ground. He saw them there as well as any other man would've, if they were in his place. Today, weary, tomorrow, nay. It was something every man and every woman would know. Life in here was torture, under the regullation of some masters no one knew who they were. What was that weird vision he saw? Why had he felt guilt when there was no time and no reason for it, other than to waste, to let it flow out of his ears and the fading days, he convinced himself not to pass through loner tassles. He knew he was there, near a house, a distance on in the lanes where every single one had been enclosed and down right locked. And the malformations that were human-like still existed, for he had no temptation to let go of them or put them out of their miseries. A missdemanour of thought, he lumped himself with everyone else.

He was here but he was there, both in body and in thought, split again as he's always been, unable to control it, or to whine on the whimp-looking stranger who had waited for him there.

It was death, the inevitability erased itself, a maw appeared. Out of nowhere, formed out of a sickishly looking peculiar pair of curved teeth that could only be seen from around the sharp point and the edge of his inner-side, the frontal region and the peculiarness which only dragged on as the many bobbing necks started emerging from the unnatural body he produced with him. Many so other-worldly being followed and they could not fathom resting any longer because what followed was a supreme show of destruction, an unconcentrated act, the fealty that no one else felt.

Agamemnnus:

'I who have finally emerged have decided that I am owed this universe and everything in the cosmos for as long as I live and as long as I shall force my way through.'

To that no one in whichever manifestation could stand to decline, or to prove him wrong, the fiend of memories, the blotched dead body of the creature who had looked over the Duke had been forced to manifest for no other reason but because Agamemnnus willed in there. Thence the quiet ended. No more fear, no more fear they said. But they could not be denied any longer tha it happened. A part of them had dissapeared and it was the simply truth. So many of them had been forced to get away without and beyond their complete comprehension, it was the static and the mad, the thing that could not be saved. No one dared talk back, not a second as the winds emerged in space. Gravity was foked upon all, then Agamemnnus spoke.

'I desire to have him found. No matter what you may think of that liver-kettle and all those fiends that are after it, he is of greater importance to me.'

He desired the Tongue-Agamemnon, he who had denied the sight, and he who had become the Colossus despite everything being tied to him in the worst possible manner. It was a battle against time now, trying their best to get as far as possible before being caught by the lack of rest and the disquiet. A virus of ages had attained their bodies, many losses and disgraced, plots of ill-sunken sufaces emerged, yet he could not be contained, no longer.

There in the distance in a universe lost.

Jackal-men, within their tribe, they saw no reason not to die. In their peculiar syndrom, in which they had spared no one from the sight of the vileness tha surrounded, they had all of their stakes spread inside the mansion, deranged by the evil of the hunch-backs that came running. After many destroyed days, after many other people who had taken onto them to die alone, and feed the pups, the dogs of evil started blurring out. No existence would suffice for them, as they were punished before they could say.

‘I hear your message.’

Thence it happned, in one of their peculiar shrines, they could not have defined the margins of evil and whatever else they’ve done. No longer could they wait for their God to arrive, they had to search for him. And as they had, they realised that they were sick, with the distress coming from the plague of the islands. A dye had taken over their bodies and they could not forget it, back. To the days when they had been so savage, they remembered what happened when the rituals gave them life. It was a day without hope in which they started coping through whichever way they could. If they stopped now, their race would come to an extinction, a supreme kind of agony that could not be perceived. And every moment spend without him, and every moment which resonated at last cast a shadow upon their hearts from which not even they could give up. Go on, on thought as he spared no life of his own.

There was dread in there, screaming, the shattering of vases, fires and plenty of deranged activities and most likely the fear.

‘We shall die if we let go.’

But unaware of it, this wasn’t his own thought, but that of Agamemnon, he knew he could not lay in hiding. And if he gave up now, he would lay forever in obscurity, leaving all the degenerate races to fend for themselves, never trying, never lying, never to be cried for. Tied around the many ropes, some lay hanged and couldn’t even hope.

‘I see that you have communicated me the grand instructions, what am I to do with them?’

Without a doubt, there could be only one possible reaction that lasted, whichever that might be, it went missing, lost on the obscure plain. And then it came up again. During one of their times of peace, where the Jackal-men gathered around their groove around the mansion, in the isles, one of them, for no reason started foaming. It was a countenance that none may do for. And none may care for what happened there. Fear had not contained the best of them, it could not reign, would It be so, if they were in pain, but he would not falter after.’

‘Fear, I fear there’s something which might go missing, there are spots in the universe which need to be filled.’

Said the Jackal Osur, who had started peeling off his hair, only to reveal that someone had been living inside him for far too many days, to which he started growing, chumping and yearning for the break. Once the chest erupted, he was free, of all disease and of no prize, a memory which could not be denied.

A memory like that could not be dealt with easily. If one were to pray for less, he could not get over the distress of losing everything which made him a man, one which was anything but deformed, as the creature which moved out.

‘I, the servant of the king have come.’

He was a creature made out of the peculiarly cut bodies and the manifestations of the infants from the planet in which he had been exiled. He knew something of the many lays against which he had been placed against. And here, on the island, this was known. A message had to be carried, through which none may know what best of it might be taken for granted.

‘Say what you will.’

And the Jackal men listened.

‘I, servant of Agamemnon have come to carry on this vile message to you, oh, dear fiends and friends of evil and of vile. I see the tile of space ending, and the thing your vanity has betrayed.

I see the bleakness made you dumbfounded and to no other day might I say this. But you must kneel and throw off your search and never look for a liver-kettle for as long as you may come forth.’

This was disgraceful, even less, more so than it was needed, to be accepted, what had lain around. They were dumb-witted, lay in quiet. No more to be called for, never to be pushed around, everyone was confused as if to know what this was for. As not a single soul knew of the liver-kettle or of a being known as a dead lamb. Even more than that, they could not stand the reminder and which stopped them, and their hearts. Many of the Jackals died, taking their Jackal-headed axes and cutting their own throats in quiet, leaving pools in which their children swam, never to be bound for, never to be frowned upon. The pain of the loss could still be felt, even by him who prided himself erect.

It was just as I hoped, thought Agamemnon, taking from this what he could, as the first signs of pain and warnings had been given before they could stand the chance to get away. From as many spots, and as many wonders, as they could have been dragged upon, they knew better but to act the role of beggars. Pray with them, if you will, but never listen, as they might reveal the fealty and the end. Time was being bended, erected and thrown into chaos because he wanted to do so, even more than it could be dragged. Pain could not be lost about.

Then the silence, even so.

A vile pocket started popping, it nested itself in the distance, trying itself before it could be lost.

‘What’s happening?’

‘Pin it down men, before it erects itself back into place.’

‘Let it seethe and make sure it won’t come down its feet again, do you hear?’

These were strangers, even worse, they had only come upon the encapsulated evil and could rest no longer, let alone fight back. It was a gig not even Corelo could deal with, as he had managed to push it within himself, throw them around and lose whatever quiet there was there for him to take. He had been mad and danced. So he did it again and again until his feet were somewhat lost to pain, numbed as he looked in glances. They were in town, the glances.

‘What’s happening down there?’

In the middle of the square, where the fanfare emerged and they had almost been greeted as the heroes they were. There was no possible satisfaction, everything was contaminated somehow. No one could trust one another any longer, because what had seeped out. A trail of smoke still rose from it and they could not believe what was going down below their feet. Such power was not meant for them to settle upon. Nor would their blades stay themselves, let alone their hands and arms. Bulging after that, unable, not a moment could be forgotten by them. It was just as expected, if they dropped their guards, they would die by their own men.

‘Settle down men, settle down, we have a priest in town.’

He had his nun following through. She was blessed enough around the face, carrying a grace unlike any other. He had been pinned down, unable to look anywhere else. Corelo knew, that if there was any stronger force that would drive him further, that was his pride, to make up for the loss of time.

‘I won’t put down with this, I swear it. Hear me, I may not be a knight or the distant cousin of a lost guard but I’m not going to pin myself with the wolves.

I know my limits and I shall not dare act cowardly, especially in front of a nun and priest, as God is my witness, I shall carry on as I were the son of a lion.’

Hence the fear that came after, for his life and that of theirs. It didn’t matter what came after, nor what they could get from him instead, only this and this meant only fighting. Where had he belonged?

‘I shall face this evil and get out untouched.’

He could only go so far as to know that his deathwish could get in his way despite everything being lost. IT was through mild effort that through effort alone that he managed to get this far and no one could deny his strenght, even as the poor-sops and the chicken-pushers and the oink-draggers had to admit.

‘He’s not in the wholeness of the hay, that man had stung his head too hard against one of the anvil-deads. What will happen to him if we turn away and never look? ‘

‘Don’t throw the quiet, just watched.’

Another villager came in, bringing his entire cottage out, his family had to have the greatest seats after all and they could not fathom standing there no longer. It was the piety which shared. Given and given time after time, again and again with no one to watch and listen to the thicking of the latches and the broken clocks that had never been repaired. Stone as they were made out of, as the light started moving like a peculiar mirage, they knew he was destined to die. Then he approached, and dug his nose as deep as he could dive in. We had no hope for him, soon after.

He had decided that life was not worth chasing for, without giving in to the tower in which he woke in, stranded upon.

‘But where am I?’

‘But where am I?’

The echo mocked him as soon as he had realised. Everything here was surreal, even taken as he followed a peculiar blind man that tried escaping down the stairs. Someone was outside past the hollowing walls, trying to get him through one of the disgusting turpentine-like chilled grates.

‘I shall find you.’

‘I shall find you.’

‘Whoever you are, show yourself.’

‘Whoever you are, show yourself.’

Was he the one who said it, or was he the echo? He could not say. He after searching his memory now, he realised something about his real name. Lor Eco, had he been called, it was something not even his childhood self could be able to pronounce without making a case out of it. And he was pained, to have spent so much time wandering about, in quiet, only to finally decide to settle down and follow the figure in flight. He took away some scrolls and ran. Lor’Eco took out his blade and made it about the outside, where, to his surprise he found none. Yet some peculiar, breathing light, almost sun-bright fire started spreading around. Everything looked so shiny, as if he was fish-eyed in a sea of diamonds that began reflecting just about the world.

‘Is anyone there?’

No echo this time, but still, there was no one in sight, at least no one he could make a proper eye-contact with, no one to share his suffering and even fewer men to talk with. It was starting to feel like a parasitic paradise which only made him fear castration, not that of his manhood but that of his soul. Be damned you who made me enter the pocket, I wish there was another way. He conveyed no message and appeared to lust for it, something he had conveyed elsewhere, in a land where the morsel was thin. And thinned they were, time after time before they could convey emotion. Elated in dust, they cost nothing and nothing was given, nothing traded. But Lor could see that there was something happening in the flames. Tiny white purely lighted globes, as small as pearls could be seen just about everywhere, with or without his choice, he mattered even less for them, despite the fact that they could show no joy but servitude, uncanny.

Then they came out, light-pure, barely shaped people who had been betrayed. Some of their own people came out, following through and stabbing him with a long blade of pure white. It flashed as it pierced his heart. But he couldn’t fight them, at least not here and not now. Since he had been undermined and showed even less to suffer, not to know. It wasn’t a matter of surrendering, but what pained him was the fact that they knew and they spoke, in perfect accents, like that of Mylidranos, that his ears would know:

‘We know why you are here and you have made a perfectly grave mistake. Cower for your own sake and they might pull your body back into the living.’

‘No, I cannot do that any longer, you know I can’t. If I were to do it, I would lose what made me human, I would be.’

‘A coward but a coward that’s alive.’

‘But what about this place, may I not feel welcome in this world of pure light?’

‘You haven’t realised it yet, but you’re here and there at the same time.’

A lime of green, a putrid thin place had been the resting place for his other layer to sit in. Though he was just as putrid and corrupted as everything around him, midly acted, he had known something of true pain. He could not behave, nor vehemently be thrown into this evil jail of putrid lands. Decay would soon follow, but here was his court, as if he had been enacted into the pool of gas.

The green-gaseous king had arrived. He was still in his prime, supreme, a survivor of the ‘Cong. He who carried their aroma and their scent could not convey any other emotion but that of a satisfaction that would only draw from others. Days be blessed, not many left on this earth at all. He had appeared, after all, after a while with nothing but a decaying sword which bore the runes, which documented his journey, extending into the grip and the hilt which staffed the blade into a spear. Near the other end, there being a missile, a nuclear fat one, a miniature which had been grabbed. Of course he had his destiny in hand. If he willed it he could destroy the entirety of the land and never lay claim onto it ever again. Unfortunately, everything would be lost if waited for. Not many sharp-heads would know what’s happening. Or why were the innards of this decaying, peculiar side of the light world acting in this manner.

This was the belly of the beast, which held no sky but the inverted fleshy walls upon which they stood, acid between them that did not burn. Acid constantly dropping from atop them, but Lor could not be hurt by it either. It was uncannily strange, how they had to wait for no result. Not a single man could fight it, nor would they know of better ways.

‘Why have I been brought here?’

‘Is it not clear that you have been chosen to suffer?’

‘And what treason would that be?’

‘Has your memory already given in today? Could you not fathom looking around and praying any longer of the lost, bolder days?’

You chose to come in here and chose that mightily wrong. This sitting that might grab you, this realm upon which I seem to dwell upon and master is a prison of your doing.

I am here while you’re there. But I’m also elsewhere, spreading through the winds of blotting, destroying and accosting holds. I who govern other others cause only a sign of pest and have no control over the actions of the rats I govern upon.’

‘And what is that, opposite of your blade? That thing upon your staff?’

‘Would you not like to know now?’

He only seemed to pair himself with a laughter that brought only distress, but he knew better, much better than to reveal too much, too fast, he could only commit for so long. 'Excerpt of the lost.'

A lost thing that had been taken from it, alas.

I know it's selfish trying to intrude, but this is a special occasion.

'I know you're not supposed to pray out loud, especially not at moments like these, when they mostly listen to the ones in need of real help, but I cannot help it.

But, if there's something I could really ask for.

It's not that I haven't thought of an alternative and all, but if you're actually real.

Please help her, I know it's not something someone should ask for. It may be a bit much at times. But, I know she knows well. She's about to go on with some unforgivable act which may hurt a lot of people in turn, nothing suicidal, but. I know she means well.'

She looked sad last time I saw her. Not smiling, looking back at her father, a big man, mean-looking fellow, not in her best interest. Left her alone, it's something a man shouldn't do. It's not about him, this' about her. And, in some way, I can't seem to get away from it.

Always mean, she never says anything nice and after a while it's getting really hard trying stand by her. Especially with a good memory and all. It's never easy trying to please, to run errands, to do what she says, you know?

And worst of all, is that. She's never there. Someone needs to stay there, near here at all times.

Can't leave her alone, can't leave her at all, or it's back to living with him, where the alternative is much worse. No one wants to help.'

And there was still something in the distance. Something dragged on as Lor turned his head around the side. He could feel the presence nearing its end, there, to wonder.

Then there was their problem, trying to get through.

They were showing some burden through and passing through the sparse land, in a cluster less deranged. Pained by the looks of it, the illness yet progress, there a stronger hand, unmany, filthy and the looking through the uncanny, they had arrived, they came and would not bind their tomes. They took the patches out and listened.

'Alan is lost, he used to be in some place, I think, but.'

'I know, perhaps I should look for something going on out there.'

'You should be more careful now.'

'I am, I mean I will.'

He managed to get on just well enough. It was pleasing for the eye at least, starting at the ground again, there was a curve on the road which rendered them walking on the ceiling and paying up the throttle. Through their toes and below the mark, lying on blank floors, they could see the surrounding paramount devolve into the touches of the silken bonds, the uncanny paying no mind. Not a single soul considered cooperating for no other reason than what went on. There was no reason for any of them to be present in this place. It was a disgrace which could not be resolved easily. We have not even expected this to happen at all. It came out of nowhere and acted like a tiny maniacal veil that refused to go away when asked for, if there was one certainty, that that was the very fact that they didn't leave. It was ingratiating, trying to stuff their broad-knees inside the scum-plough that started crawling in their guts. There was no means to and end, they all lead to a dead-path, in turns and cradling stairs, in this homing tower which fell upon him.

'Lor, you know there's no way back.'

He smile knowing it was true, through cracked teeth and scars, he turned through the sinew that pumped out of its body. It was the insides one of the glowing creatures that followed him around. He could not think of any better way than this. There was a time and a place for everything happening there and this was neither of those. It was clear what he wanted to show him, and poor Lor had it in, being all over his head. There was an intimidating force that only showed itself when he couldn't help it.

'I don't know when I became so disgusting. It's not something I'm particularly proud of, but I think I get it, in some way, you know?'

It took me a while to understand it, but I think I finally have. I should've known better than to waste your time.'

Lor turned, he didn't take another moment before looking around at the place. It saddened him, more than anything he had ever felt before. This wasn't his intention, it had never been so and there was no way to take it back. Outside that chasm, that giant cauldron was foaming, being kept in place, prevented from spreading around. Instead, he couldn't help but die, as his chest wailed with every hit against it. He showed no sign of life, which saddened the villagers as well, who did not understand it. This wasn't an act made by a stray, or by someone who tried himself not to cower.

It was his escape from pain, the realisation that there was nothing in the world that would make him happier, no matter how hard he attempted to pursue it. Hence he was there, stranded with the most peculiar of beings. A traitor to no one but himself.

'Keep pumping, he's got to breathe.'

Each hit was hard-felt, but not in the same way he felt. It could not compare with what he had went through. If he had waited a little longer, he would've died without a soul, not the physical manifestation of it, but the art. The flame, the gem, the beauty, the only thing which made him happy. His torment, his damnation, his lack of wit, this dumb thing he had been trapped in, his prison and the likes. He was there, and he could never come back at the moment when his heart had stopped.

Lor looked upon the light, as it slowly faded. What came after was humane. There was nothing in it, and nothing would come to fade and pass with him being there. They mocked him constantly but he had lost his ear.

‘He’s gone. This about the right time to bury him and take the children away, they don’t have to see this happen.’

It fell on the land, they had to bury the soundless cask as well before more men got affect. Before more of them plunged into it, before the flashes could lead to a more distant place, though the same feeling seeped in. Regardless from where it had come from, no matter what distant place in space and time, the winged walls, the spikes and the plains of the degenerate land. It resoanted just as well with every man, wife, lander, and those who watched him being slowly taken away without any explanation being given, that was the tar of head, their sunken days which made them wonder when eh might return.

‘Dig a ditch, right there, men get the shovels. Make sure it’s deep enough for not a single knot to breed through. And don’t make any fus out of it.’

Little to no conviction in his throat, it was a clever way, the way he felt it, somehow. They both stopped. The two petty-dragglers, they decide it would be a great opportunity to take care of what was going on in there and enter some of the most vulnerable houses and take what they can. It was a night of wonder which had everyone in the village stranded on top of their toes, unable to deal with the conviction that they were deemed as being cursed by what was going on in here. Something was missing, a song of lust, the locust-mass and something which had to have crept inside.

No worms had been hanging lower, no one grew stronger by looking and they all acted weakly. Upon the face of a man who charged into it and died, Lord had left his mark. The pocket could not, by any means be destroyed, it could only be contained. And here, it could be moved no longer. Hence, he, met, by the king that rotted, the ones who changed in hues of organge, green, and purpl-beings that erupted out of him in the same gaseous forms had realised something of himself that he could not even fathom looking back through. It was a broken glass which almost cast all the skin into a pit of shame. From it neither of them could turn from, nor breed in pain of the loss. There was no way for a victor to emerge, as even the king’s existence was a fluke or amassed pain from which not even he could prevail.

‘Then, we shall accept the only truth in the matter.

The man died. He has to be buried with the pocket, the way he lived. A man on a peculiar street:

There were flutes, which were jolted around, the ground was even, he was boud to look around for action. A street lay not as far from stray, twince the clock, it conveyed blood that gutten up the alley, a valley of distress and pain, they could not fathom getting away. In twice the twins, the wonder stopping. A smoke had come out of a perilously hard net, of blades. He was in a terra-cord, surrounded by crude car-plants, all of which had been shaken and placed around, chosen for the strapping fellows that looked in wild surroundings. Organe-yellow, dark dust, everywhere around. They were messing with the destroyed panthers, the ones that had rotted away in the sun. Near the desert base.

Two men rested on the outside of the domed-floors, those that were behind the corpulent walls, those in which the flimsy wasps made their hornet nests. It was crucial, in some way to allow them to live under every possible circumstance possible. It was the only thing which made a key difference between the plain people and the cattle-men.

Speaking of which Keyringer Wardboe and Filler John rested during their shift. Every instance got repeated a few minutes on, or worse than that. A few seconds out, but there was a quick shift between the silence, as in, no one wanted to approach. Outalndists, their groupd was call, bandits of dust, carrying their wives with the vibes that were keeping them alive, in check. Various wheels made it so they were constantly kept awake, so no amount of sleep debt was acquired by no means, it was the way of the invertebrate.

‘See something around that bush of is it me?’

‘It’s you, it must be you, I don’t think I ever saw this cornfield melting.’

If he had, there would be signs, pops thrown everywhere around, even in the spots where the brain forgot to function. Decisively, spoken as the milliata return, they came in out of nowhere, thin from the concelead malnourish, and entered the main gate without having to show their ID’s or give any explanation. They were exempt from the rule, strangers, who were in the making. They raked the ground in search for hold but found only solid oil, the tar of the masses, that thing which only crept in the eye after being left for too long. To scuff at them, it’d be a painstakingly morose mistake. As soon as they entered the base, they were greeded by a silver-line of machine-men tha bowed. Only one of them was a creature, made out of completely painted organs that were fited as well as the human king would tell you.

‘He’s hiding there, again, burn his innards, freeze him off, throw him into the pit of far, thaw him in acid.’

Or just about anything else, any method would do. He always returned and there was no way of prediction, not a sigle way to carry through. What would he do next and why were there so many rooms inside the base? At least eighty one of them were used by the scientists and they had undoubtebly ruined everything, down the slightest hints of humanity that were there. No one spoke about them.

If one were to be inside one of the rooms, he’d see the flashes, gone by. Darkly and unlit the walls, reddened as they pushed in. Through bone and sky they’d see it fitting to become part of it.

And there was that insinuation. This was the reality. Outside, they weren’t in a desert, but in an abandoned frozen sea-side, near a shore. The base had been long-abandoned, the generators still powered a few doors and lights. It was time to explore.

‘Careful now, I don’t think it’s safe.’

There was the first mistake, since he had lost his hand only twenty seconds ago, looking at nothing but a stump which lumped into a few bodies that had been hanging from the ceiling. Various blades managed to pour in their surroundings, making it so they bathed in a peril smoke, the smoulder of the uncanny vowels the serpentine-folk married for. None of them had legs, only tails, though it was safe to say that some tails broke in halves.

It was a disturbing read on the area, trying to make it less calmer than it was, and take care off the amount of distrust traded between them. The calm had long departed. They were both there on a mission.

‘We should convert whoever lives here, or at least whoever’s still alive, don’t you think that’s at least one good thing we should be after?’

‘Of course not, I see no reason to do it, at least not without a way out. Wait, did you hear that?’

There was a pause, finally they were welcome.

Keyringer and Filler stood there in awe. As thin as they were, both of them had been confident on the fact that they could take anyone they wanted out, if only they wanted. It was calmly produced, the fine-finger coming out of the case.

It was simpler than expected.

A man with a blank expression crossed the gate. There was no door to stop him. Then he dropped flat on the ground.

Keyringer thought about it. This was his code-name after some long deserted suit he had found on the ground laying in this abandoned place, immediately putting it on. Dressing had taken something out of him and it was hard to think that it had only happened a few hours ago. To think of that, he had lost a soul. No one even knew what came after.

He fell flat on his face and broke his skull immediately after. Though that was not reflected at all against his highly peculiar face, as a matter of the face, his body had become a mattress for the tiny silverfish to gnaw on. They were largely undisturbed by it, but chose to sway.

‘Get into the other room now!’

‘I am the man of green decay and iron.’

He said in a hunter-gatherer’s voice, which is what he was and the reason for which he appeared like a ghastly apparition with a surreal mental condition. Strength was no given for a man like him who happened to lay dead in the room they both entered. It was clearly benign how he appeared without a sign of fear, to move twenty eight of his unbroken bones. Some of them were clearly pushed if not swollen with coffee. And that had only been recent, judging from the tropes beneath the sulken dead-head.

It was clear, from the badge he wore on the uber-suit that he had been strangled and killed by the implanted divine inside his neck. A false sign of idolatry forced him to sink into a kind of ill-minded disease, a faithlessness which suffocated him until he felt the carbon that invaded his neural paths, creating a plain hell in the last moments he had been alive.

There were marks left around his neck, which calcified within the acid mark. Clearly, the despot sailed on top of him as well as half of the room. Despite having been choked out, there were signs of a battle having taken place in here. A wild-shit which managed to be endowed with passage, to the point where he had suffered a lot from having his liver crushed by the intensity of the weight that had been projected on top of him. What solace had he found in his heart?

Now they both turned towards the corpse, having noticed him as well as the missing part of the ceiling that trumped his knees, the body and the rest of the crowd. They had rested into the breaking point between their level and the next floor, creeping in only now when there was no other hope for them. Slowly they dripped in like ceiling-sand. Piano keys could be heard, it was all too satisfying, nearing it, checking it out. Some of the signs of the struggle could be seen not only on the corpse but on Keyringer's face plate.

It was an explosion which left him charred, but on the bright side, they all came a long way. Every piece of evidence found a soulance on appearing on top of his face, always creeping through when it was needed or longed for. He had been satisfied to know that, despite the telltale signs, the man had died before he had a chance to suffer.

'We shouldn't disturb the dead if you don't mind.'

'You sure about it? There could be something here.'

'It ain't worth it. Whatever we're after won't be on him.'

Keyringer was sure, but just to make sure Filler knew what he was talking about, he bent over and appeased his curiosity by pulling out what appeared to be a small crucifix. It was charred, from a sign of heat and heaviness but that had been expected, if not reciprocated. What reassured the man was the pressure in which they bobbed on.

'Hey, didn't you bring us in this room for some reason?'

'Of course I have, I think it's better if we dispatch any suspicion here, if you don't mind. But I think, I think we're safe, aren't we?'

He drew back his sleeve, revealing a tattoo, it was degenerate, just the presence of an inmark itself, but it was needed. Otherwise, they could never have entered this place.

'I undertook it after all. Only to be sure I won't be clean enough to be claimed.'

It was a simple thing, a charm of the kind which only dragged on to grow, in sides, it was plain to touch. No false direction, nothing that would go on for too long without making a chance, or placing a stain there. But there was a definite plumpness to the skin on which the needles worked. He was disturbed by it, as soon as they appeared on the corner of the hold.

'Shh, he's here.'

They both missed it, almost, parlay. He simply stepped through and his mere presence, the steps drowned them in pain. It was shattering, how much force had been pushed on them, how heavy they felt, how easily they got to see the ship erect itself in the same place. Those were only the first signs of the taking. Raked through the ceiling, flaps dropping, this base had been once enclosed.

There was a cold feeling, the frozen wastes outside. Round domes of glass on which dead suckers rested. But it was beyond them, for now they were safe. He walked away and appeared to have concealed his body.

'He won't be last one we'll see.'

‘I know, you don’t need to remind me again. I’m just as bent on getting out alive as you are. There’s the olives.’

He hadn’t referred to actual olives, but the skin of the twenty-company people that went around the room they were in. Most of them were indistinguishable because of their head drops. A higher branch of their hair-tops forced the bone to bury itself into the jaw, creating a pseudo-wreathing jaw-dropper that only wanted to eat itself more than it should. They had no eyes, mostly hair, no weapons, only tight rods of wood which had exactly that, hair pushing through them. More so they lacked the uniforms, bearing some visionary suits, outlandish by the looks.

A fight ensued outside. Without a chance to carry on with their investigation, they simply resumed cowering down in order to draw as much information as they could or at least as much as they should in such a situation. First fists came after, which ended the march. Both of them were surrounded during the match. And a batch of them had been dispatched as the referee. For someone as disorganised as they were, this all seemed too calmly set. There was nothing set for too long in any case, before the hair started plumenting and caressing itself, pushing out, broathing into strange octaves. Songs of hair growth, never to be bore out, they blocked the punches or prevented them from completely obilerating their heads.

More blows were traded, then a knee came out of nowhere, but not on them. It managed to hit Filler, who left out a single loss of breath. He almost choked on that.

‘Are you dead?’

‘Is that you first concern, father?’

He could only think of him in whichever way. He was only half-brain and half-minded after all. It was clear that there was no intention to make sense of it. It was almost melted wax-like soft, ‘specially around the head area, where they had penetrated their ribs. Each blow carried the strength of heavy-weighted sledgehammers, through and through. Even by definite standards, their fingers had been bullets, long, sharp but blunt as slugs. And they appeared to be released with each blow, burrying themselves as deeply as they could before starting in again. There was no pleasure watching. But pain ended on either side.

Filler signaled Wardboe that he stopped feeling pain. But Filler didn’t know that Keyringer was Wardboe, nor was he thinking of what was happening around them. As soon as the fight stopped, they fell down, just like the rest of them, flat and bleeding, dead but burning like tiny poptards that were filled with gunpowder. Carbon dioxide started inheriting itself into small pouched in their heads. Of course they started thinking about what went on there. It dragged on for too long for now, and then it came, in dawn of the day-light hour, they spanned around the room and got out on the other side. Clear view of the emergency sign, if that meant a thing. Constany flickerings of light, chimps and dogs, and cat-leppers were stuck inside their cages, well kept, subdued, sad-looking, alive? It was a given. They accepted this and widely approached, sitting down for once.

‘Everyone died out there.’

‘It could happen to both of us, if we don’t take care. Just don’t get in a fight, will you? I couldn’t stand losing you, Filler.’

Real name taken from the lie, it was the reason for them being there and having such dry noises. Their voices were giving out just enough living echoes, less than others being present there. It came near one of the noises. Fear ran through, but that was enough. Half an hour by.

May-through July pass between the span of two years, which was spent in the emergency area in the company of the pets. They weren't disgraced by the fact, this was a given, an acceptance for the mere fact that despite the passing of time, they knew when to take breaks and breathe in. Atoms of air held water, food, servitude in them, even mental neurons that did not belong to them.

Hence the second encounter soon approached them, despite what was given and said. They could not fathom waiting there for too long without facing any kind of backlash.

'Here he comes.'

Firs the announcement, which came as they have, without a clear definition, he was staring them down now. It was for the first time that he decided to flow through and lend them just enough of his composed nature to draw this out.

'He's not a hallucination.'

Even the animals cowered. They felt sickened, to their very bones, expressing it by the mere force through which they began ripping their hairy clothes and arm-pits from under their very own broth-paganistic marks. It was a landmark of mad achievements which appeared to be stranded forth in a tiny blood of pis under them. And then, in the passing of a second, some of their heads disspeared only to reapper on different sides of the same cage they had resided in. This had not been forgiven, because they all lived.

Peering in to them, a photo was taken.

'Where did you get the camera?'

Filler looked at Keyringer, who assumed he had pointed the lenses at the one in the walls. But subconsciously, he had moved his arms in a different direction, blinding the animals before they could have a say. It was largely lost on them, the disquiet, but ill received as well as plain. They died within the hour.

'He left, you can put down. I want to see what you recorded.'

One after-image shocked him, as it clearly showed the animals out of the cage. But that hadn't been all, as a matter of fact, it was never meant to happen in the first place. This singularity of mind, this blotted thing which they both missed, the camera wasn't supposed to pin down the dates of the photos. Nor could it explain where had he attained the device from, as soon as he had gotten a clear view of it, he was no longer in posession of the device. It neared the moment where he had stopped questioning everything and only took it to himself to get away and let the pictures simply melt through his fingers and be eaten by the floor.

Various voracious feeders appeared, but the presence neared its final stop, it turned then left without making too dull of a case out of it, that's the only thing that mattered, fear of what flooded the place. A billion questions and a few years which passed after in that room without them realising the passing of time and the timber which had been the bars.

Wood couldn't have replaced iron. But there was a man who yelled decay, somewhere, somehow, some time ago, perhaps years in the making, of which neither of them had been aware of. It was time to go. Both of them checked.

'Still have it, but if I remember carefully, you've never showed me your matching tatoo.'

A few more marks of ink, Filler finally revealed it. He couldn't know now, there was no way of knowing if he had gotten it before they entered the room. It was an uncomfortable test of nerves. How long could they survive without stopping? By the time they were out, half of the first compounds, which was an alteration of the base had been crossed by them during their flight. But there was no stopping for air.

Something happened before this.

Perhaps that was one of the few mundane moments when he had feared, somehow, somewhat, without being able to act on it immediately. He cherished his wife the most and in perilous moments like these where adrenaline pumped in his throat, he chose to stay and give in what remained of them together. Two men broke in. Thug-looking fellow, chained around the neck, only one of them had a knife. They were caught by surprise when he showed some skin. He didn't cower then, nor would he do it now. Not whilst the lady was there and she was there after all. Both in mind and present during their run, he couldn't shame her if he wanted to. First the man advanced and tried getting his knife in. Blade fighting was a foreign trade, he almost missed it, trying to defend his dame. She was crying, desperately approaching that nod off the head. He punched the man, and tried to fend the other, keep an arm on his, trying to stop the blade from pushing in.

His maxilla had been kicked in with the butt of a tiny blotted fist-knuckle which had been completely removed like an iron bolt. Hence it made sense, thence the iron came into view. Both of them were out there, in the area where the uncertainty began and reality faded for some reason, for another, looking around, there was no brother to dismiss what was going on.

'Matthew Alundo, that's who you are. Surprised that your brother Spherelinger, Slinger, name, name, what was his name?'

Of course only she could remember or hint at it for some reason or another, mostly because it didn't bother her at all. It was a hit and a miss from which not even her could understand what she was looking after. Despite the presence being there, everyone was calm. In the class-room only two of the windows faded and behind them the sight of two of diamonds and a king could be seen, but that had been no culture-king, there was no such thing.

They were focused on the board, or had been so for over four consecutive hours. Here they taught the inferiority of some cultures which only existed to leech off the superiority of the one true kind, the one which arrived from the masses, fought for and enacted when the people were one. Bonded by common feeling and a desire to rest when everyone despised them, it could only serve as a reminder and a way to prevent any other disaster from happening.

‘Remember children, if we give up, if we forget, we’ll be damned and our history and who we are, those things, our values will be disposed off and burnt off, thrown into the masses of marching strangers, men who don’t speak our tongue.’

And the children only nodded their heads, bobbing up and down as their oblong hands erupted in disgust. A foreign exchange student had been brought forth. Carried in a cage, dressed in his tribal way, for the inherent reason of him being who he was, a hint being present here and there.

‘Eham, cham, as I was trying to say, I brought this feral child for a reason. He’s been locked inside his house for the entirety of his life, under lockdown for a reason. As the previous generations before him could not adapt to the customs of our world, the punishment had come with a choice.

Either they would depart to the world in which they belong in, or the same prerequisites as his land demands shall be enfoliated in an encapsulated womb, in which he shall be forced to live the rest of his life in.’

Thence one of the children raised their hands and asked.

‘But ma’am, may I ask something?’

‘Indeed you may, Mary, and I’m glad you asked so politely.’

Chimney, Cherio, she asked.

‘Is that not considered cruel?’

But what wing would avenge the answer? The spans of days and ever after could not fathom to move on, there. Disabling thought, there was no response. He was a shock for the whole class, since he had managed to disturb everyone from what they doing. It was the neggs of the eyes, which only poured down, he looked like one of the blind-folk of the blind-race which was only a given effect taken from the fact that he needed to eat through those access points.

His mouth was sewn but he was dripping constantly for some reason. Speaking of which, it couldn’t be applied.

From this confusion, another student intervened.

‘Why are the iron bars eaten?’

Strange, there was no iron and no milk, either way you looked inside of him, he had a deficiency of the bones. And tiny thorn, in the paw of the meta-lion, scrawny and weak, he was a contagion. Where had all the iron gone?

They did not shy away from asking.

‘I can only answer so many questions at the time. But I’ll do my best, I don’t think, it’s.’

‘Is it cruel ma’am?’

‘Of course it is. I’m not going to lie to you child, but you need to understand that sometimes you need to be cruel in order to care for the people that make a difference in the world.

Somehow I think you’ll understand, I hope so in any case. There are times and places where it’s acceptable. No matter what your feelings might tell you, no matter how ill-considered that might be, we have to take action, we have to make it before they do.’

‘And what would happen if they did the same?’

In that case, she only had to point at the same bars for everyone else to realise what was going. It was this show of power, this exchange which made the creature look less human and more of their kind instead. But the bars looked less like the wood and more like them. Of course they understood what went on now. They could not question it any longer. They were reaching now, extremely so. And it was getting way too hard to justify it because no one wanted to say a thing, children were put in their place, but no one wanted to admit the fact. The children were extremely intelligent. For some reason they started analyzing the features, most of whom had been completely inherited by long, yet distant ancestors that had no racial continuity or congruity to be held in place. It was degenerate, to no end. But if there was something branded, it was the scum-sign in his arm, the depression of a face.

‘He needs to be put out of his misery.’

One of the bolder students began.

‘That’s not a question.’

Their professor retorted.

‘There are components.’

Which shall not be named here, for as long as that mattered, they could not point, rightfully so at the distant, yet inaccurate anatomical features which blasted his encased organs, he despaired, bowing down as a servant would to his unsettled masters. His fate was just about as doomed as any man’s would be if he had suddenly been freed without conviction.

‘He has a medieval bone structure which is unacceptable, and now that I see it, there’s something I truly cannot explain. It feels as if there’s a platinum-ashter dust on top of him which will eventually force his grows to grow.

Class, I want you to pay extra attention to it now, you needn’t miss a thing if it’s feasible. As much as I could pain myself to look around and ask for a volunteer, for now I’ll take no more questions and see for a way in.’

She stopped protruding and asked for the child, it was the eight one on the fourth row, the one wearing an extra pair of glasses, crocodile skin-flays and a pair of legs that weren’t exactly his but that was what he reminded himself off.

Not a single child was gutsy enough to try it. Henceforth, it was up to her to make the animal suffer in front of the class. It may have been unearned, and felt through the resonating glutton of a third of an eye, but she'd do it anyway. No matter how hard it seemed to be, she had to make an example out of him. Otherwise, the children would not learn. And another inferior culture would prevail over theirs, which had been the prime of humanity, the model piece, her mind was set on it, erected like a flame and an imbred pregnant moth.

'Look at how I'm doing it, how I'm taking care of my poor creature, the maddening of features can only push so far. I want you to see what I'm doing here, no matter how long and how far might I got, no matter what goes through it. I shall know.'

But she had lost it for a moment, the grace she had, the winged spans and just about everything which turned her on.

'It's set.'

The teacher made a small cut and from it, to the supreme alteration of their moods, they realised that he was bleeding iron as if his body was the body of a great river.

That's what Filler had in his blind. And to that strange creature, he could not deny the rabidness which carried through him. He knew something about the presence and why it was there trying to march through. It appeared to be its one and only weakness, from which no meaning of pain could be derived any longer. He was strong in the least common sense. Punching and pushing through one of the cartilages of cages that were present in the composition below their scents.

'I can smell it, can you?'

'Please, I know what I'm doing. I don't need any indications.'

Foul thing he was, he expected me to somehow boil down to a few touches. Keyringer was selfish in some way, but perhaps that was easily explainable by the fact that they were, undoubtedly trying to diminish the falling grips that were somehow the least affected machines or actors of gravity. In some way, it was all too serene and dumbfounded. Unlike the art of the taking, he lended some of his pain-killers, reflected in his face.

Keyringer acted like a conduit for his friend, that was too obvious. With one touch, he took away not only his pain but it painstakingly obvious that he was a gem of a man. He was bad at it, faking whatever stress went through his body. As soon as their hands connected, through bone and matter, a few puncture-hole appeared on the metallic encasing half-a-mask which obscured his features. A blow to the pride, they were on the right now.

'The presence is gone now.'

'So is the iron.'

He withdrew from the wood. It was all too convenient that he managed to get off in time. Without a way of knowing, it was what it was. He couldn't care less about anything else. It made him think.

'We can't keep going like this. I'm getting tired of running.'

'And you think I'm not? Filler, I have to feel the pain.'

He would see what remained around him. Both of them appeared to share the same memories and intonations, the same beings and features. With the exception of the weird mask, but that was no half-a-mask, it was only his blunt-hit face.

‘Again, there’s the piano keys, do you think someone’s doing it on purpose?’

No answer. A dumb-lighted room came over them. They didn’t remember passing through, but they could see the wood behind, it was of a long-distant forest. No one bothered or cared about them, nor of the steam that pushed around.

A dog lay somewhere in the facility, still in the encased compound.

The compound was much more different than anything that existed before. It was half-way through the mad-looking asylum, parting ways, half-way through, molded and contorted, mixed like a maze. It simply did not make any sense, structurally speaking. The only to describe it was through a certain overlapping, confusion, stacking, constant replacement of doors and rooms, paradoxes, or anything.

But if there was one thing which was consistent, even though it was only for a temporary period of time, that was the peculiar presence. It could not be denied that it was the one who was changing all the rules.

It was a good enough reason for them to be there. In the facility, in the surreal-palace, in the spot, they were not.

Filth of the ages, they both recalled the strong.

Sharing wealth that’s unearned is degenerate and wrong.

Seventeen feet ahead, there was a sign that said no long-people allowed. The oblongs had been turned to masses and appeared to have cut below the knees.

Eight stages, that’s what appeared to bother them, no matter what came to be in the few moments they spent together, they could not avert their eyes. It was troubling, wasting time, listening to the disgrace which had been spreading the lies to the various listeners as they bypassed it. In one of the open areas there was this one, tall, yet peculiarly set forth, it was a marvel to see, just out of curiosity since there was no saying what it wanted. But it prided itself with being so similar to us, in every regard, even though that could not simply be explained.

Snippets of information appeared to be contained by it and cited, at various intervals when it had been left alone. Otherwise, there was no telling of what crept in its body, or why did the vein of metal all of the sudden disjoint itself from its surroundings. It was getting heavier, with every second, but there was no possible way to test it. More so, it had been a hunch of the sort, which became clear to the on-looker when he started admiring the various patterns below it. Some of the sizzling, yet turning strokes against the plain alloy had changed. The reason for that was the fact that it started pushing it in every side as the metal almost melted, softened or curved because of the pressure the anvil was producing.

It was somewhat bizarre, not trying to be rude or soothe the lickers. They were the ones responsible for it. Long tongues, but relatively normal, their eyes were completely green on the left and blue on the right.

That was just about all, at least everything they had observed before they went out of their way to mock them.

‘Wouldn’t get too close if I were you.’

‘Is that supposed to be a threat?’

‘Not at all, I’m simply being concerned with your safety, that’s all. You wouldn’t like to have an accident now, would you?’

There was no way to know, or to figure it out, but the anvil seemed to have a mind of its own. It stopped talking by itself in those weird intonations, and I swear it waited for us to finish talking to the long-tongue before it could begin. Some evil hand signs had been exchanged from one side to another. We were surrounded after all by these lickers, even though they hadn’t even come close to be dangerous.

An extension of life appeared to draw on from some of the cords the anvil had on. Time hardened, the anvil opened. A hole could be seen above and below the anvil, yet it floated in the air. As the cut started appearing in its mouth, a giant crystal could be seen popping out of it, glowing, producing an unfathomable light that could be anything if not indistinguishable from its surroundings. Its putrescence showed itself as soon as everything around it started drawing in the color. Below and above, there was the clear space, and malignant dead stars could be seen in the distance, distantly showing as their light and flames spread everywhere around the open spaces, the patches of dark, the insurmountable excruciating sign. It was plain and vile, seeing the crossed-out base twist around beneath and above it, as the evil started receding below.

It was drawn out and in some way it could not resist what it was going through. Too many variables of skin, too many bodies had thorn up everything around them. The lickers hid behind whichever pillar or mightily peculiar corner they found themselves in. As dreadful as it sounded, the morose peeping through, there was staunchly set, pair of crystalline stairs leading below. It was only going to get more dangerous if they went through.

‘Should we see to it now?’

We might not have the chance to return if we actually head down there.’

‘Is there anything to return to?’

Think about it for a moment. We lost so much time here and there are so many of them.’

Not a presence, but more of them, hundreds peering out of the walls, even if they only pulled their heads out, clear danger could be seen. And just as a matter of will, they taunted us with their ill-intent, the bodies they hid inside their veils. Eaten as they were from every side, they couldn’t be distinguished from severely burned, or acid-mourned human beings that have suffered of acidic rabies. They swirled and attempted to walk, these pseudo-looking beings could only fathom looming around for seconds before they would die, agonizingly pushed around and seething. Mourning in some way, unable to decay properly, then falling below their knee-caps into pools.

‘There’s no crystal below us, only the cosmetic appearance of kicked-in fighters.’

‘How could you tell the difference? They seem so colorful in some way, glass-like, unlike their shattered counterparts.’

‘Trust me, I know what I’m talking about and I fear there might not be a chance for us to look around and see a way in.’

‘Are they going to come then?’

Keyringer thought for a moment, he even considered drawing out something of a flashlight and pointing it at them, for no other reason, other to establish something, anything that would even be remotely fair. Not only had he no sense, but he saw it fit that Filler went first. He was disposable after all, unable to deal with the stress at all, he followed through, seeing how this very room was being crowded. Neither of them liked that feeling, not to a single bit of a time. Pressured to release their unquestionable woes, they took their very sweet time to look around and take in the shallow march.

Slowly advancing through, never listening to the songs of sinew, they came upon an enclosed space. Of course everything was maleable here, to the highest stock. Hands were brittle as they came after going down the stairs. Some stains could be seen, filtering themselves through some of the greates in the dirt. Around the edges of the pseudo false-platform upon which they stood, there were pieces of stone, like small miniature cut black rock mountains, hills and various geological stones. Seething, were we?

Twas the one and only thing it boiled down to. A laziness, an aspect of scoundrelry, the scum of ages and the falling light which merged from the stars and appeared to pour down on the platform as if nothing else bothered it. Within the hour they would know, waiting to see what happened. No reason to act decently around the gray surroundings.

‘I think we should head back, they should be gone by now.’

‘Why were we here then?’

‘Ringer, I think you know why. It’s not stars, I mean it’s not the stars. You know what I mean.’

‘I seriously don’t, please explain.’

‘They’re painted on the flat walls of space. They’re not real stars, that’s what I meant for you to see. I think you should see them from where we are.’

It was a leftover of a distant age. Perhaps it should be clear that the flatness had left its long, and distant traces wherever it went. A thorn had been pulled and abandoned, but they refused to disgrace one another with waiting. Shimmering down they looked for a way through, and a need around the courage, the crass being held. There was no reason to sit still now.

Soon they returned, and acknowledged that they should not speak of it any longer. It was way too obvious that no one paid of their lip service through and left. It was their only way out and they enjoyed praying on the dust-monkeys, every single one that ran around. Going back was simply a mistake they could not repeat, repent for long. It was evens, they were daft.

It went through their minds, window blinds. Farther away, the clumps.

Sickening how they began pouching the flowers, some of them were ill-clustered in the wrong places.

There was all the more reason to sit on the side. Each day could be counted on by. No one should be on the fence for too long.

‘We should go, I don’t think I like this place, do you?’

‘I don’t think I like it either, there’s something wrong about it.’

It was too clean afterwards, way too quick on it.

They would tremble and hear it go.

‘Father down the baskets, there’s one thing going into each direction?’

Said the spokesman of the long tongues, with a sudden sadness in his voice, he was just as weary as they were. It was the loss of a light that came after him. Finally it popped as one of the distant generators kicked the power back in. There was little to no remorse left for either one. It was the lack of emotion which was shown.

‘They are trying to mock us.’

The world took on them, right as they made it past.

‘Shall we proceed then?’

There was no pigmentation after a while. It was after those so-called presences left. You could still see them after a while, walking, slowly enacting something vulgar, as illusions that were trying to mess with the extra-sensory terms, the dancers mourning their nerves. It was inaccessible for the longest duration of time, maddening how they refused to die. Plain as they were, they felt the same.

‘Ringer, can you hear me?’

His voice was slightly off. Now it came to him at last, where they were, closer to the off compound area, and nearing the point of the locked gate, the part which had been outside the bunker, where the cold sea emerged. Though that area was off-limits, or so it appeared. Within one of the closed doors, there was the zone where all the inmates imbred like mad-men. They were off the hook and blunt in the head, too many of them suffered of the strange fragmentation and the wilderies. It could not be dealt with, the supression of thoughts and the wild stop.

They both stopped once Filler refused to answer. He’s done something which was largely, yet uncomfortably unforgivable. He was wearing another man’s arm instead of his. That, if anything was the worst affront he could be taken for, a treason of the highest kind.

He was posessed by the beings, BOD and Grub.

It was a tiny factor that achieved nought, nor was it as important as they would make it seem.

Spears of teeth appeared to pierce the insides of his mouth from every possible angle. It could not be calculated just there. They were a dying breed, both of them, mad pollution and at this point. As a matter of fact he did not feel well. Not too kindly now, had he retorted to the previous folk, he would've known what was going on.

'I seem to have been taken out.'

That was the last thing he said before he fell down. As is from one piece of the skull, crackled, a piece of growing lumps suddenly came out of place. Filler had died immediately, being unable to contain everything which had been happening inside his mind. He would not be remembered.

'Damn you Filler, we should've been more careful.'

Life slowly sipped from his eyes. The long-tongues laughed at both of them. But if there was one thing he noticed, it was the fact that this man he knew, Filler, had a pair of different eyes that did not belong to him. Shouldn't have bothered now, but this was not the same man he had entered the base with. No solitary advent and no soldier could sprout from the walls.

They were all alone now and there was no amount of quiet that would make them realise what went on. So far they were only trying not to breathe in. Pulmonary-people, scum of the lots.

'Leave this place before he comes back to life, you wouldn't want to see him in that state.'

'I think I'll take your advice...for now.'

Keyringer couldn't help it. He looked back, holes closed, stooping lowly, no longer lost from the looks of it. But the anvil was still there.

Time of the lot now, there were families which were unadvertedly clocked.

Down through one of the bars, a reminder, something unsafe.

Unsanitary for the longest duration, they were ready to dissect one another out of them.

It would not happen, not now and not here, thought.

Keyringer had to remain sound, even though he continued alone.

'Need some company?'

There was one short-term like emotion shown. He was Alder, and he was there, out of the company, he was the lost one. The one man with a railer in his arm and half-a brain still on.

'You from here?'

'I only arrived here just now.'

It was the nervousness of the two which gave them away.

Plain wood in his face, there was a turn.

Both of them walked miles. Not a single word could be trusted.

Alder was a goner, he run away in a mad direction, driven wild by an unquestionable mind lapse. The skinless hunt, that was what they called. In dangerous days, when the advent of men had left only the pass, they ran on milk and some wild quilt which brought not justification. Everyone stopped, they saw the signs of a crime.

A few other dead people, or soon to be dead came into the room. They were versatile, somehow, even though it didn't show as much. As they hours passed, most concisely put, it distraught them softly.

'We're too common for this world, aren't we?'

So far so good, without a doubt, he was the only one who lived and who made a case out of breathing in the gas. There was a constant leak which could not be bothered to outlive them. No lost cause, nothing appeared to be out of place, not a single thickling flavor as it drowned the shot. But there was a shot, even though it could barely be felt, its big head reared in and made itself present, he had to repeat to himself.

'I know who the criminal is.'

'Who would that be then?'

They always ended up in the same place, waiting for something to happen. Before long they realised, the long-tongues had been hanged by their own protruding tendril-like mouth lickers.

'I don't understand what's happening here.'

Keyringer came. He seemed to see something in the midst of the dead. One of the various peoples who were present there, flat as they stood were still not responsive. They jerked each other down the neck-trottle and waited for him to begin talking again. Despite being where he was, there was that one immediate change. It only came comically uneven as they jerked their heads over in order to stare at him. No matter how peculiar the room appeared to be, regardless of the condition in which it had been, there was a clear disconnect between their minds. No one could, by no means make up for that.

Whose wife was she? Despite what happened there, with the generators being worked by someone inside the bastion, this complex, this surreal torture, there was no explanation as to find out who was manipulating the strings, who was drawing him in, or her. Who was she?

Ringer came near, he decided he'd ask. As convoluted as his mind was at this point he had come to recognise something in her no one else should've been able, especially when it came to a total stranger. Or someone he knew.

'I'm supposed to know you, I think. We shared something together, haven't we?'

'I suppose we have, sometime, in the past, but that was a long time ago.'

'Suppose it was. What's my name then?'

If you're actually whom I think you are, that's the least you should be able to tell me.'

But there was no sound argument to that, no reason not to be estranged by it. There was a clear dependency between them, which could not be dropped. She felt almost parasitic then despite being victim to the presences. Though there was nothing he could make out, her features being as muddled as the memory of her, he warned himself of what might happen. Don't trust her, a mind of his own said, it spoke silently but the same echo that could be heard outside might still bounce on top of him. If only they knew.

'I have my bets on him. He'll take her.'

It was settled so far. They knew where to touch and how to make him feel uncomfortable. It was a mistake, the assumption that any key difference could be made if they tried. Only through some direct intervention, repeating his words backwardly by mouth-reading, were there results. His every action was predicted. Hers wouldn't even be true. Neither of them knew what was going on.

'See that spot? Could you, if you don't mind me asking, make up for the lost time and take a hike?

Only a few steps in that direction, if you can, I'm not asking for anything else.'

'And after?'

'We'll talk, I promise. I still don't know whether or not you're my wife.

You're as beautiful as her, and I believe this is the dress she's been wearing during the night we got engaged.'

'During or after?'

'Can't be told.'

She did as she was told, a Marryonette.

'Antoinette, that's what you were called before.'

Damn that, it actually wasn't. He missed calling someone, he had to make up for the time despite being there. One stroll and it would all be answered, but he wouldn't observe her, if anything, he's done everything in his power not to do it. Everything was confusing, most of the time at least.

But he could see the name that was carved in her back. Self-harm, various signs, deep cuts and most importantly, no blood to show it. Only the frame was there, and it looked as if it pushed so thoroughly that there was no more signs of there being an ape body hidden inside. If there was a human there in the room with him, that would have to be Filler. He was dragged in as well.

Same signs, at least from what he was aware of. There were some things no one wanted to discuss.

After she came back, this would be it. The deal was that they would talk. Not the same woman as she was before, but the body was the same.

He couldn't know by any measurement of the day, but this was the head of a woman named Eileen. She had been dead for some while now, but that was not known to him either. As a matter of fact, there were too many uncertainties to count.

'Can we count on you?'

'You're not my wife.'

'It doesn't change a thing.'

It was hard to stop and way too difficult to punch it over. Tiresome as it all was, nothing fit together, not the ground, not the ceiling, not the world, not the people. And it he who had to make whatever sense there was from this point on. Either or way, it couldn't work.

'I'll do what I can, but I need someone.'

My friend just died.'

'Sure he did, there was no mark of ink on his hand. And there were some things that could not be discussed or accounted for. That's simply how life works. You know it, I know it, we cannot actually move away from it.'

Someone was still playing that damned piano, it couldn't be ruled out either. An omission would mean something close to death, which was his choice. To simply go along with it or move on, but he did choose that. Away he did, there was no reason to wait for a replacement. Reason? Bad feelings, thing that didn't click in with him, too many bad memories and this place only getting fatter, from just about every corner. There was only this reason, this place keeping him together despite his eye sight falling apart.

If I keep this up I'll be blind. And there was another thing, a production of serotonin, which was beginning to poison him. He was irked by what was going on. Damaged good which fell on his shoulder and refused to give him stay. Twenty more minutes, in a corner, he waited.

'We can't force you to work if you don't want to, Keyringer. Accept it, you're too tired to continue, too bothered being here, troubled in every sense of the word and meaning. That can change, as long as you turn around and return where you came from.'

'And if I do, what then?'

A simple life, that's what he wanted. He knew that would be the answer he would receive as well, payed for, by the word, to get out there, to return. Alone, for another year or so there, the camera appeared in his hands. It was just as unexpected as everything else that appeared to haunt him. Someone had to take the evidence, a dead man, serveral standing. Near which there was the Foreman. He did not leave, he stood there the whole time. Too close to comfort, he had obscured a few shots. More dates appeared to be set with each picture he produced. Everything was too damn convenient and there was no one to guide him or take charge, until he came along.

'I'm one of the Foremen. I don't think there's much I need to tell you about, but, there's this place we're in and I'm in need of an assistant to help me around it.'

‘I don’t think I’ll be of much use.’

He couldn’t think of it from any other angle. There was something wrong but it could not be explained. Ringer rolled up his sleeve again, no ink.

With the loss of the dawn, there was only sadness left in a man’s eyes.

It had to matter for something.

There was no winner any longer.

He chose to walk.

‘I need a rest.’

The Foreman followed.

There was no coincidence any longer. It simply happened because it was willed so.

As strange as this sounded, Ringer seemed to remember having met the woman before, in a strange room, whilst checking one of the computers in the terminal he was searching through. But before it could be clearly defined, the period struck him as being unevenly set. It either happened there, in his youth or in this compound. He fantasized about her over the span of a few minutes, which was fairer than any treatment anyone there could be given.

It was the first time they met. The room was simply too well-structured not to be considered a masterpiece by any account. Only by carefully measuring the dead end in which the only door that lead to the corridor would you be able to make something out of it. Because the room looked convex as it drew towards the dead wall against which it started. Though it had another smaller chamber in it that was enclosed and that’s where the devices, the computers, the terminals and the rest of the electronics were stored. That’s where Keyringer had decided to work for a short period of time, but the small details, those he could not remember, or decide on.

And there was another thing, gaps, strangely placed, like square-like depressions left by giant cubes that had been placed at every corner, then lined, whereas the convex profanity that was the end of the room left a strange feeling of purity. And the depressions had patterns on them and made the walkable area which lead to the front of the opposite dead-end wall and the area surrounding the chamber, look like a strangely malign bridge.

Each depression, which looked to be made in the style of brutalism had a peculiarly set power-like cells which were used for storing power, drawing away from distant generators, which was, at least in his mind the dead giveaway from the fact that, while this place had a certain vulgarity to it, this seemed to be the same compound he found himself walking in. Yet at this point in time, Filler was gone. Strange man that he was, he didn’t do anything to signal his absence nor was he too obsequious.

But they were there for a reason and even their light was somewhat incandescent, protruding, strong, way too euphoric for it to be only a kind of light, more so-like a prism of various shades that came at different intervals but they were not meant for this purpose either. They hadn’t been placed like neons or lightbulbs, stage-lights or anything of the kind, it was only an after-effect, a side-effect as well, of the various types of electrons they were receiving. And for what purpose? Not even he could tell.

For some reason they gave him the impression of acid pits and pools, though he dared not take it into consideration. A whole system appeared to remain in place. Timed after a pointer, for which intervals, the machines came into play in their malignant interaction. He wanted to prod further but stopped, entered the room and started one of the computers in the terminal. Not a single one of them was locked; it was plain, solid, a combination of a submarine, nuclear base, moon-landing combination of apparatuses which gave the stolid impression of this being more than an abandoned warehouse. It was strangely plain from the outside. Hence the reason for him thinking it as madly as it were.

‘You’re here, after all, I didn’t expect to see you.’

‘Were you waiting for someone?’

Strange woman, again not the same, as one would have to look for her from the sides in order to get a good pointer. She looked Turkic, almost, slit eye, but only as a pseudo-kind of appearance, nothing too vulgar or had on the eyes. It would still be hard to distinguish her from any kind of fair-skin person, in the midst of a sunny day, when everyone squinted. And the room only pushed both of them together, like a match that was burning their skin through a tan unless they moved closer to one another, as if to approach.

‘How did you get in here?’

‘I got lost while searching for my brother.’

‘And what does he look like?’

The fourth encounter.

Tall, bland, weirdly set, not asiatic, wildly speculative, made out of a tin-arm which appeared to carry on a perfect replica of his body, which was still, frozen, unable to be moved in any angle. Fingers, hands and everything else, even the bobbing head set. Everything else appeared to be tied together, like cords that were trying to mess through his jugular, that’s where it connected with the weird machine he was carrying. On his back there was also the rocker, which appeared to resemble a giant, yet solid backpack which was completely made out of various regulators. That main-regulator was not reflected on the replica, instead, it appeared to feed him through the named jugular.

It was this tendency of wild parasitical relationship that helped him orientate around the complex. Truth be told, it was hard to miss, or to get. He was her brother and a name was not given for him or to her.

Keyringer’s wife, or Filler’s, or, had they shared it? Nay, that would be too much, plus, he would’ve killed the man before resorting to such a disgusting thing, perhaps even in the one of the cruellest fashions, as a mere thought, as he speculated on it, he found himself being filled with snippets of rage and confusion. If he were the one doing it, if that wasn’t his wife, no, it was inconclusive. Neither the head on top of her, neither the original woman, nor this one could be his wife. If he had one in the first place.

Yet, strangely though it seemed, there was one aspect that bothered him, this brother of hers, who was very much real in every sense of the word. How could this happen? His face was torsion of convoluted skin-melts, which degenerated in a harp-shaped spear.

There was something in the power-cells as well, which turbulated the entirety of the atmosphere. For each of them bore a dark-skinned tortured soul which appeared to taint the light, which in itself could not be accounted for any longer because of the amount of skin-gutter cutlery which had accustomed itself to cutting every organ inside of them, creeping through.

It was inescapable, the turmoil that started pouring out of him like pudgy blots, and tags of mold, they were suffering inside their tiny cells, but could be heard by the man who was pressing keys on his keyboard, feeling their vibration as the long bones which worked them succumbed to pain. It was delicious, delirious, hatred for them.

Tiny wife-petals, pops, of round-eaten, spoils puffed out like spore-shooters, in every direction. But they were dark and they appeared to carry something from the days when they had masters. It was a painful smell, as it triggered a wild reaction that piped in.

Given that they liked staring, they saw a slither of humanity they did not want to accept. The cells felt too real and they could be seen acting up through the pressure-proof windows.

‘Still can’t accept it, can you?’

‘I can, but it will take some time. It’s weird, isn’t it?’

‘Watching those drop?’

‘It’s not that, but trying to make sense of the delusions.

I’m here and I’m there, then years pass. Then he’s dead.

Now you’re here and by the time I snap out of it.’

‘You know where to go when everything’s wailing up, don’t you? Take a turn, go back home, sleep on it and by the time you decide it’s time to return.’

‘It will be gone, I know, it’s exactly what I would expect to happen. Still, I can’t shake off that feeling, no matter how I look back on it.

I took it too far.’

She nodded then, she understood what was happening.

‘Shall we go back then?’

There was a single hole in the panel, just around the edge of the long-stretch. The keyboard snapped almost immediately before he could push his eyes through. It opened like a trap from below, from an angle where large simian fingers threw themselves over and crossed each side, forming a strange triangular support which allowed for the keys to be held in a tilted plane. That almost managed to distract him from placing his finger in that hole, close to it but it had been a failure. He almost came too close to doing it, having second thoughts before pressing in again.

They're of a different breed after all, and every rub inside the hole meant exploitation could be made. In every one of the cells, the painful puffs could only push and bounce before not being able to control the various contrivances that pushed it past the limit, blandly sprouting when it was more than convenient to stand still.

'Standing still?'

'Who said that?'

'It came from the intercom.'

Another entry and a few more keys should confirm everything, despite how plain it all seemed to be. Here and there, never watching, only listening for long.

'I can't move my feet.'

They were battered in a contest and satisfaction could not be achieved any longer. Was it always going to go that way?

First time's a charmer. An insolence was met inside the communication box, it extended and tried pushing in without making too much noise. But now the wife and Ringer were set on seeing the program unfold on the screen. It unwrapped, charming, like an ideal box of codes, numbers, commands, all of which were unfit in the back. Erroneous taps managed to put some of them back through, like the cattle, like the pox-battle that happened.

'We should go. I think I had enough.'

'Won't you stay a little longer? You know I can't leave this room now.'

'Why not?'

'If I leave it, my brother will find and kill me. Could you open that panel for me? The one under the main, right, that one.'

'So you're planning on sitting there until something happens.'

'Until he leaves, not until something happens.'

'I'm not planning on something happening, I want to get out alive.'

'But you don't want me to take care of you out there?'

'You wouldn't be able to stop him from harming me. The only thing you could succeed is endangering yourself and him.'

'Why?'

‘Because as soon as he kills a man, he will die as well.’

‘Wouldn’t that mean that you’d get to live?’

‘No, as I said, he would find a way to avoid killing you. My brother worked as veterinarian, he’s supposed to kill animals. Dog and.’

‘Bitches, that’s where you were leading to, I see.’

He carved the way for her to hide. Despite not understanding it entirely, he simply scratched the surface and made sure everything was comfortable enough for her stay. It was a time for both of them to endure, making sure it was a fair deal and a fair stay. She stays, I live. I stay, she dies. We leave, she died. We leave, somehow I die, she lives. She lives, I live, he lives, but no one wins. There was no way to test it, he would have to listen, at least for now.

‘I can’t help it but feel bad for you.’

‘I know, it’s simply how it is. Just another lost girl, you’ll forget about me before long.’

‘Time to go, get down there, now.’

‘Already?’

It couldn’t wait.

I don’t know why, he thought. Why this happened, but all of the sudden, he simply considered what it could’ve been that day. He came so close to dying, on a sole night in December. He wasn’t alone on the bridge but no one acted on it, at least not on an impulse. A young man jumped over, it was a long drop on the river, unexpected. It flashed like a bird, like a camera shot, akin to a chimera of light. He didn’t think, he simply leapt after the man. Going as far as he could until his legs gave in, and he submerged. Before the water could reach his lungs, he grabbed the young man and drove to surface. It went far, getting shredded by the blade of the sea, by the fish, by the various trenches the waves had become, all the while he was dragging the young man towards the shore, where he belonged.

His strength almost gave him, but he was breathing again, resting. Opening his swollen eyes, almost blindly out of question and pouting from the watery prison he had been in.

But he knew of the little disregard, he didn’t know what happened, or why things were how they passed. The man was Filler, and he lived. They were in the present, trying to make it.

‘Ink on my arm, see? My real arm, there’s no replacement.’

‘I know.’

He breathed in stillness.

‘I don’t know why, but I doubt she has a chance to live.’

‘Can’t argue with that now can I?’

It was the laughter, which always kicked everything off, it didn't feel too human-like to be taken out, without a sway, without prying in for too long, they were set. It slumped the knees while grabbing around the waist.

A moment of weakness costed him, perhaps too much. A second chance would not be given if either of them slipped on the floor. It was musky, wet, for some unknown reason, a peculiar sponge had been stretched beyond limit.

It was done.

The message was planted even though they were not aware of it just yet. Clicking like some weird somatic parasite, it started wreathing in disgust. But they could not see it. No matter how many times they had seen the walls, regardless of how many times their eyes bounced against the cradle, it was too late to see what was happening in plain sight.

Subtle changes accounted for an unforeseeable fate, a blunt yet disgusting march that only now began acting upon their vibrations.

'We're alone. Surprised to say, I didn't think we would make it so far.'

'It wasn't likely for either of us to make it so far. Honestly, I thought I was a gonner until you pulled me back in.'

And that alone could be seen as being reflected below them, on the floor, where the mark and the touch counted for something. Either way, there was no opening around there, no quick path, only the ones that were listening and were trying to move their abbocks in, sharp tools, taken around each frame of the door, each window being pushed by their crane-like heads. From a side, it looked like they were eating the metal or at least managed to get there. Slowly they worked their way out of the metal frame and came into the air. With a plowing motion they began construction the cells, refurnishing them. The motions would discontinue until they would no longer be needed. Something had to be said about that. They were construction men, but in an unnatural way. Drot-head, long-bowed, sunken and too wide in the back, sledge-like bodies that appeared to function with too many limbs to count, most of which being a combination of ape-like mandibles, arms, legs and strange tendril-like cells, which were being fed on by the generators.

'We need to find one of the generators if we can.'

'What makes you think we'll be able to do it?'

'I don't know, honestly, at this point, I think we're just aiming in whichever direction a toss a coin lands us to. There's nothing else I could think of.'

Everything looks way too similar to the previous walls, the floors are checkered or patterned in a similar fashion or what not. I don't know if we could find it, but we should keep an eye out nonetheless. You know, in case something does show up?'

'Now it's supposed to move or something?'

‘No, at least I don’t think so, but there has to be a trick to it. You wouldn’t nodd at something like that without losing your grip to reality.

It simply does not happen.’

And there were unnatural lights being produced. He feared something might appear during one of the dark flashes, wehre the light was still on but it produced an infantile pus that covered everything in sight. That was not right.

‘I think I hear something.

‘Filler, you don’t need to do this, we made it past that room.’

‘They might come for us if we don’t deal with them.’

‘And how might we do it?’

A few steps had been taken behind. It was just far enough to see something happen. Just peering around every corner of that area, enough biting marks and holes had been revealed that they could not fathom looming out. It was undiscernable, a shy-bite that ate and devoured the channels, the spills and the tints. Metal strings had been attached both to the corners, tools and specific areas that were in their control. Whatever power there had crept around the place, it seemed like that came from one source, the broken lantern which illuminated the place.

These tool-mechanics, as they appeared to be shading themselves off from their eyes, were thin. Almost as eaten as the metal, but not as a consequence for what they were doing. Instead, they appeared likely to have erected themselves in the most peculiar manner. The reason for it was became most of them appeared to pass a simple test. Since they were mostly eccentric hunchbacks, their spines would either contort or missalign as soon as they began setting themselves straight. Others had their complete bone-system putrify into a jelly which started sipping out of their bodies as fast as they could prod out some of their empty hole-makers inside the lower sides of their basins.

One of them approached. Neither of us knew what to expect from them, especially since there was no question any longer, they were queer, in the most disgusting manner possible. In some way they were no elated, instead some dragged to their simian cousins, trying to drag any kind of false-hope inside their putrid skin, features thin but there. No eyes and bodies that appeared to have rotten away underneath a muscle of mold. And it could only communicate slowly by granting itself access from inside the throat-box, in which all the sounds and all the voices had been perpetually been produced at an unfathomable rate. Faith could not guide the man who looked.

The second one around him prodded through.

‘Could I at least’

There was no time to explain.

Both Keyringer and this architect started a sparring match. Outside the hallway, where everything moved juttingly slow enough for something to be said. It was only a matter of trying to resolve something between them. As the spatial adept revealed, there was some muscle mass hidden beneath the strange abode it called a body. Strong enough to curve the blow, they unrolled the sleeves or what appeared to be a rolled-up curtain of rolls and started with a few jabs. It came to him that there was no easy way to take this bear oer' man, who fancied himself a rebellious boxer in his youth, as he thrice-a stepped in one direction and landed a blow to the side of his clearly mushy skull, which in turn began pouting and sipping everything it fed itself with.

There were no clear victims here, only those who came to bet. Everyone appeared to have stopped the production in order to make as many mild cuts as possible, at their wrist pouches, bloody-coins looked rigged. Some of them were unappealing as they were filled with the same substance that filled their veins. Worst of all, they were insecure about their mindless drots, as they themselves fancied ending themselves in the disquiet. Too many motions were repeated, not a second jab missgiven, finally a hook appeared to bring some closure.

'I am convinced you are dressed in clothes made out of swomen.'

'Sowed around the ankles, how could you tell?'

Some signs were shown but others lost. A metallic head-machine came flying on, bleeding real blood out of its mouth. Most of them dispersed as soon as they saw it. Filler and Ringer stooped low and made it for the first corner. Foreman was waiting.

It was only a matter of time until they would be thicked off. Too dangerous to loom for long, it was getting out of hand already.

'Get down, now!'

His shout broke the nearest acesses of glass that loomed around the spot. It got close. Twenty millimeters at least, a part of the wall, a concave hole that hadd been rounded for at least two meters deep like a trench which shot in both directions and an air-tunnel which formed a gap in its surroundings had been formed from the chemical slither that shot out of nowhere. It was plain and deranged, obscure how it came and left, deadly, but avoided.

'How did you know where it would end up shooting?'

'I don't know, I heard it, I think.

Or I knew it would happen before hand. '

'Are the two of you done now? Shall we make our way out?'

The Foreman did not wait another second before pulling them back on their feet. From where he stood, it became clearer that he showed no amount of fear for what happened, nor would he be delighted to know that it was still out there. Whatever shot in their direction, whatever it was, there would be no hope to avoid it.

It already began affecting him. They were off the chart and madly looming in the fantasy land. They were off it, off and a' go. It could not be it, the shot, eating off the floor.

‘We killed a man.’

One voice called, but it was neither one of theirs, as a matter of fact there was nothing which would even draw in close to cheering, the peering into the bloated creatures that dripped out of the ceiling, forming their black bodies like pudges or pudding, forming, large antennae penetrated heating lots. Blocks of crane-like, spider legs, protruding mechanisms pushed out, making the noise of static, guiding them to eat and devour their fellow men. They listened out of not a single compact tension, deranged by what they heard that day. It would pay no heed to listen. Fear was embedded on the lock.

Majesty, of mold, that it was, they were trying to push in. Alas, they started peering through, it couldn't be that fear seeped in from the dust-strides, skin lies.

‘I want to eat some more of his jaw, they need to creep in and listen to us as we cut through their headless maws. But not to listen, not to pray, they could not happen to come upon it again. Fear would not satisfy.’

But who was speaking, they wondered. As they turned their necks and bottled their heads into the nearest hives, they started peering through their legs, which had been switched for other limbs, longer, more protruding, many fingered, less headed, disturbed from the sound. In less than any time today, the creeping vow, they would say:

‘Cretins, you need be stopping from the act of cannibalism. It will not reflect well on your bodies once you stop and once the taste kicks in afterwards.’

They could not fathom thinking after that. Soon after, they would retreat, back on their feet, although their bodies had been folded into creeping rising floor-shapes. Thralldom to their kin, for those who followed were akin to be hanged and left about the place, uncannily to wonder.

Neither of them was strong enough to oppose. One of the devices started yearning for it to happen. By no means could they explain what happened in their heads. As they rolled away in time they saw it happen, once and thrice, like a piece of cloth that was being reeled back in by a rod at an unfathomable speed, destroying everything in its path because of the sheer weight it bore. Before it lay all the pieces of granite-sand iron which had been spread around and thrown to give. An impression of wonder, how it happened for them to cheer in and slip through the cracks. Ashamed, I? How could I be ashamed of it? Filthy disgraceful creature that she was, implying there was something I wouldn't do. We were not animals, made out of scum-bolts, being shot.

Four sticks held his head on top of a corkscrew-like spine throttling pin-needle that came out of his throat and belly. It was dreadful, shameful and battering to the knees.

‘Get up.’

The Foreman had disappeared again, leaving them alone. Mandibles crying, both of them swayed. The criminal had entered the stage, standing a bit too close for either of their sight. Two barrels could be seen from front end, from the sides and apparently in a circumventual curve which dragged itself over. A few slugs appeared to be vaguely lodead through.

But a blimp-fatness could be seen from behind the barrels, making it seem like I bore something close to eighty shots at the very least, all of which had been loaded and crept around. Almost missed, as a metal prick almost landed, it filled two thirds of his mind with brittle poison. Two joints left out, but it was uncertain who shot the dart and who was hit by it. It couldn't be guessed. Another pair of seconds, all of which had been too tempting to grasp at, least of all, either man could expect something.

‘Get up. Step away from him or I’ll unload everything in your heads.’

‘Make me.’

Keyringer had a death-wish. After being struck in the jaw during the fight, cheered on, guts filled with a dead man's decaying corpse, he finally got half a sense. It didn't last long, it was unclear, as to see where he was nodding. Notes lay spread around the compound but there was no point in trying to chase them off. Two of a kind, another pair came out, everyone was wearing rain coats. Eight more followed until they had been completely surrounded.

It was just like before, when the troops did not know how to signal and what to say. A look of the deprave, it came back. Ringing in the ears, both coming from the barrels being knocked together and by the sudden heaviness of the way from which they came. Every step left a foot-print which was still as hot as iron, and after each of them, there could be nothing drawn but the slight paranoia drawing them back in. A bastion of questions rose from the blocks of steel.

‘Get down, it's coming again. ‘

This time, from the angle the two of them saw what it was. From below they could see the bulk of a ship being completely formed but still deformed in a peculiar curve. It was the axiom of pain, trying to figure out what this image tried conveying, and how much pressure could be gotten from around each drop. On another count of heavy objects falling, they saw how close it had gotten to killing them and came back down. Surveying, staying, but half of them keeping an eye on the two cannibals, only for a few more days, but that wasn't as important since thirst was satiated with blood and a peculiar power of the mind had been pulled out through the hole made by one bullet. As strange as it seemed, a surreal psychosis started pouring out of Filler's head.

His skull had only been slightly grazed, but from a tiny, insignificant slit, his brain started pouring out, filling the air with a strange scent of colors. Red bore the smell of a wild leaping spiced pepper, blue for the forlorn moisture of crude sea paragon of clam-iron prude lookers. It was hard carrying on top of a broken leg. It was still quiet. They prepared for an execution. Some lickers were present there, and apparently they bore the same faces the anvils had, in the same shape, with a slight, insignificant alteration, it couldn't be explained. It was painful, trying to pass the time.

Neither of them could move because they had been completely caught in a prison formed out of four moving hardened anvils. At all time. A small detail which could not be completely forgotten, nor could the joy be passed away, day in and day out, spend trying to look for a single gap they could get some fresh air out of. It was a dead end, for all of us, plenty of walking.

Various thoughts flew through the shingle. It was inappropriate, through and through. Less than expected, all around the making, with one of the visors being broken in the eye, there, they erected a morbid statue, on the plain moons, eleven of them taken through.

Catching up dead-ankles, broken from the impact, it seemed like they stopped breathing for short periods of time.

‘It is a dead cause.’

‘There is a man wearing a red shirt.’

And they went in circles, unable to define the parameters of the world outside the peculiar cage they were in, not that it mattered, though it made everything way too confusing and doubtful. Marks of electric laceration everywhere around, laying in the circumstance, not a single head bobbed.

‘We shall receive the first witness, as to find out whether or not a crime has been committed.’

But there was some doubt spread around, mainly bred out of the fact that most of the guests that showed around were blind. But in the wild metallic river, the tributaries which were lost, on a diseased turn from around the barren building, from the top of the sparrow-head cyrst, there showed up Joathan Rot and Muck. After all this time, they were still the prisoners and the ones which mattered. It was slightly less jolting, to look upon the clear water. Drawing in around the pace, stalking morbidly upon the faceless silk. Torn apart, yet no one winked. This connection, this morbid lack of wild affections drew them forth. Worth of the gore, bitter dead people slipping forth, it was doubted.

‘Who shall speak first then and enact the speech of the cattle? Who shall take the decision after luster and lose himself after?’

‘I shall come and say my prayer.’

Muck had jolted his legs as the chains were not to be filled with mildew, sickened by the rum he had sipped in the snow of the spine, the dead man was tasted! Yet they had not become aware that another man committed a crime, and out of everyone who could’ve possibly done it, there was no way to share the blame or look around. Bastards praying, never swaying through the moons, there was no way to see them now, but all of them opened their wild eyes at the date the judge mourned the coming of the end. No procession, barely determined, a saddened expression appeared to haunt his sight. He couldn’t believe what he had gone through in order to come out of the maddening fright that carried him through pouring gates, the falling stones and the mild despicable floating jolts. Quiet after the shorted while, Ivanoe could not deny that he hadn’t the slightest idea what was going on there.

Woe to those anywhere, as he wondered what might be due to him trying to sway. None of the others could convey the slightest emotion, the missing tendril and violation of the missing lights.

But if there was anything he had held from them, it was the fact that the person they had been eating from, during all this time was his friend. And he had gone through way too much trouble to preserve him only to arrive here. It was dreadful, trying to count the days, even more so to think of the chance through which he might come to prod and lost a knot inside his head.

My dear Roscowaff, your heart is sinking, there’s little I may come to draw forth. One day, I shall look upon the sightless wonder and I may hear.

Nothing happened. Nothing came to his mind, he couldn't justify lying to himself here. It was done for, the man's life had been taken from like, no laurels would do, nothing could prevent him from rotting and even if he were to bring him back to life, it was pointless, it could not be decided. He was a man of too little worth to count, and he couldn't care less for anyone other than the broken cords, the brother missing.

What neither of them had been aware was the missing link, that of which was little in the eyes of a destined man, and the lack of a mind, passing. They were unclear, they had been beaten in the head, no wonder they spoke in their highly accentuated voices, a worth of fewer days, he said. Hard, thought it might be to ignore it, soon enough the generators started powering the lights down. And in a moment of agony, the mahogany turning blue, bearing his large nails and the second projection of his body now floating in the air, just about the first one, right between the space through which the overlapping devices came to make the noise, there came the brother of the Wife, him being the only one heard.

A heartless man might look upon this den of his and wonder less at what he might do. He gestioned to the countless cluster and saw the dirt come passing through. Some of the mild corpses broke as the sand started dripping from on top the ceiling. One of them opened its mouths. A single signal came flying yonder. He should've been called.

'I seem to be confused again. There used to be a question. But where was it? No one answered the missing tension.'

Various walls appeared to be missing and getting through. A type of extreme courage had called the swaying, least of all, might it be known, the trunks of skin being pushed through the false snow that slipped in.

'Thence came the strange mutants, make way for them and the prisoners uncanny.'

Many of whom died on the spot, dragged on by a pair of spiked chained chords which couldn't help themselves but slip in and then the dragging.

'Will we have a moment of quiet one day? I can't think of a single moment where I could rest my feet.'

Keyringer checked it again as he said it, making sure there was still a splotch of ink. Surpassing the need for skin, it started dripping on the floor. Some air molecules hardened. They started reflecting themselves around the peculiar plain. Plain, plain, it was all too plain for them, walking. After seeing so many things happen, the mundanity of life could not be conquered any longer, not when it mattered, not against the rhythm, the illusion that they were still there, when another drop of ink fell from his arm.

'He drowned.'

Keyringer thought. He was still distancing himself from where he was. It was the dead century now. One man trying to make his climb through the heavy desert. Half-way done, through the bile-pile of tenacious boxes, the man with a slinshot managed to set his surroundings on fire. That was enough to warrant some noise being made. Flashes of light made him feel uncomfortable after a while because he could never tell what they thought.

Now there was a time to sit and listen as the silence emerged, everything being too calm. No way out instead of pouting around the place.

But the light kept flashing on somewhere out there. It would seem rather pale, it happened in the dot.

Life would be starving underneath the ground, or so it seemed. Back in the place where he had been buried, Lor could not fathom staying there for long. He had been alive, but souless, only a piece of dirt which crept.

Twenty-five meters above the first of the eight set of dirt spades creeped out. They were moving uniformly.

The dirt had been shoehorned out of place by a few of the villagers in the time-span of a few days, when the whole event got completely swept underneath the rug. Whereas, a few of their shoes managed to scrape some of the soft part of dirt off the ground, leaving the hole area, which was eighthundred centimeters both in width and in length and the peculiarly bent over the head leg which managed to create a tiny airgap between the cauldron and his shoe, which managed to create a tiny bump of dirt in the road which would sometimes recede, flatten, then pop right out signalling that there was still something going on through his mind. Although Lor was still gone, out of it, out of this world. Barely standing, in a world of light which would not spare, and then after.

He was greeted by a giant fish which walked like humans would on top of its tail. It had a pair of human eyes which were protruding out of its deeply-set fish-cave, inside the cavity of its side-chest, right below the gills, around the crown that surrounded it, which was made out a net of hooks which deeped through it.

But it could not be. He couldn't help it.

Ringer got knocked about the place, unable to see it fit any longer, despite the moisture on his hands shimmering with the blood that came off the ceiling.

The Foreman returned bearing eight tiny knives. He shot them through his chest. After a while they began pushing in, but no bleeding had occurred. They pushed out of his back, through his clothes, then began growing the chunks of meaty hardened strings that stood there, like hibernating convex arcs, which appeared to bear pumping organs at each end. After a while, he yelled at Keyringer.

'Do you want to see a real show of strength?'

As they pumped, becoming more and more active, they started drawing out the muscle mass from his legs, chest, other arms, the grease and the lumps grom around his body, carrying them through the arched shafts in his back. Then all too quickly they had been delivered to one strong arm. He stepped only once then punched a hole through one of the nearest walls.

Foreman strode around the broken flint. He made sure Ringer got a good taste to what was about to come.

The deranged noise alerted everyone in the opposite room. As soon as they figured out what was going on, they came out, ready to surround them again.

Just like before, Ringer thought. This time around, there would have to be no witnesses.

The Foreman didn't take long to switch the knife-pump and switch them around. His arm increased in width, its muscles barged.

It's quite simple, how it all went down. He appeared out of nowhere, charging through like a mindless falcon. He couldn't comprehend the amount of power which could be regurgitated through a single strike, which began softening the bones and the muscle mass underneath the cowl of brittleness hidden in between the hindered legs.

Gravity worked against the man, as the force had been completely uncovered through the reverberations that kicked in and out. He couldn't scream nor call out for help because of the weird sound compression which had been released out of his body as soon as the fist made contact. What had been worse was the fact that, despite all that power he tried pushing against him, despite his fists and arms bearing completely set as if to guard against the blow, the raincoated falcon had half of his body completely obliterated in a matter of a few seconds. Not only so, but as his back contorted as a drunk would hunch over with both of his arms grounded around two planks connected to a long fence, so had he become completely immortalized in the structure of the room, being completely melted in by force. Like a mold or a man made out of soft water clay which had been heated too sudden, caught in a permanent deformation which would not get away.

He lived as well, through some unnatural appeal, the lower half of his body sealed itself and appeared to grow a large layer of cartilage which completely altered everything anatomical about it. There was no doubt that his twin had been birthed by the strike. Not only that, but as he finally caught himself in this trap, he had managed to rake whichever amount of pain he had or mind of his own. His mind split in the peculiarly tainted embryo which migrated in the opposite direction. It could not be doubted any longer, the strong sensation which had been his, the obliteration of the mind, the split which had occurred. And then, despite both Ringer and the Foreman slowly moving away, there was a quick innate display, the lack of which could not be fathomed any longer.

But there were exact replicated, which could not face one another, being distinctly inverted, like normal card, though neither of them could see it either because the second half-a-body was inside the sack which was his disjointed chest, which, at this point in time was no longer hard but softened, up to a pulp, the point of no return. There was something to be drawn from it. Highly precise movements, strike, feeling of the mold, he would rot there but at the same time he would be preserved.

In his eyes, multiple overlapping prisms of bodies could be seen, as if projected, deferring from growth, caught in a perfect loop of purity and perfection. And if there was an action to be taken, it was that the sight of the fight could be seen in it, like the reflection of an old VHS footage stock, caught in the prime of his mindlessness and the inability to cope or keep track of what was going after.

'We have to go now, before any more of them join us in our little riot.'

'A warning would've been nice.'

'I just have.'

‘I was referring to what you did to that man.’

‘Of course you were.’

‘Can you at least help me walk? Or do those beating things draw in your brain as well?’

‘Course not, otherwise you wouldn’t be breathing now.

So walk, I won’t be your crutch.’

He was intimidating. At least now that I had a good look on his face.

Worst of all was that Filler was left alone in a tight anvil box. The sentence had already been carried but not by the executioners. The man was clerly wet, it was a water basin, in which he stood. He didn’t make it any better by being dead. Not that he could either complain or make it so, they kept to themselves and chose the markers on the walls. Red paint, the mark of a lipstick tainter, of course there were disgusting, undignified signs which brought them closer together. It drew nearer, the way they spoke with conviction. A rabid feeling appeared in all of them at last.

‘Ivanoe, you’re the judge, it is time for you to attend the court.’

‘Shall we move the man then?’

‘I do not know.’

A snippet of a lip appeared to have been bitten off. Rightfully so in any case, just in the same way they had been touched. There a scraper in the eye, a Rhine that was made out of wood.

‘We ran out of iron again, that’s a bad sign.’

They would trample this world and not focus on anything else which didn’t apply to the various governing growths.

But enough of it, there was no general consensus as to figure out how things would go. So far, no one knew what lay inside the give onset anvils, or what had become of them during the exhausting process which set them on that path a long time ago. Thence he chose to check himself.

‘It isn’t wet any longer.’

‘What’s that?’

‘The ink on my arm, it used to be wetter. Now it’s dry. I can’t actually explain it, but something happened along the way.

I suppose you wouldn’t like to hear the alternative.’

‘Try me.’

‘If the ink begins dripping again, something will definitely happen. Can’t explain it, but it would simply happen to go that way.’

Thence there was no reason to talk. Not as far as he was concerned. He exposed his sleeve and revealed that it was a dry as shore-stone in the midst of a summer-dove, whitened by the heat of its feathers, burning as it started singing in the songs of bitings. It wasn't a pleasant sight in the least but that wasn't the point of it.

He was sure they were listened. The terminal had confirmed as much, and though the man didn't know it yet, they were heading towards someone. An eight chamber in the agram region in the compound, fifty meters away from the general straight direction on the road both Ringer and the Foreman were going.

It was closed, though it had four ways someone could enter, and all four of the doors were locked. Inside of it, there stood two weird machines which appeared to be under a relation of symbiosis.

Part of it had been composed of two giant rhombus-like expanding cubes, which hoistered every rotational device which appeared to be set in motion by the long extending cords from the top of the ceiling. Around each edge there were triangularly-curved pointers which appeared to mimic small spiked spheres, yet they were completely covered in peculiar surfaces which receded back into more primitive forms on the part of the cube which came back it. As these enigmatic coal-puffers extended, the acting mechanism resembled one of the old vintage cameras, of which lens appeared to release a long cylindrical feature in which a man had been finely preserved. Yet there was a key difference between the anatomically set features, which set the bones minding on the march of a grinder. It was caused by the many deformed wheels which contorted its evolution, the growth, the whole being.

Yet it didn't matter any longer. It stood there, looking at a mirrored tube from which nothing came out of.

It was empty and it was making a peculiar sound, an ambience which only deepened as it went on. It was undebatable whether or not the creature had been driven mad by waiting and by squaring the various areas around the walls which refused to go on without mishap or wood in gallons, melted oaks, in wine of cinder thinned skin-lapps when they walked on ceilings, in another drawn out dimension.

Everything was being dirtied and messed with and there was little hope in the matter. Various particles were being bred in the head, then came the master instead, he who was the presence, faded only for a second before entrancing himself in the pucker of the swollen moon. He was hallucinating dark beings as well as any other, but his were normal and they were stricken in the swoon.

Blood disease, pumping through, it was a necrophiliac's tail. Around noon.

Twenty to eighty power strips daisy chained around each moving miniature platform. It was slow going, throd-plowing around each corner of a corpse. More power strips appeared to be plugged it. The administrator, the man who was supposed to watch it had died of a self-inflicted gun wound in a lone wooden chair in a simple dusty room in the complex-square, inside the compound. There was one thing which didn't appear to bother him any longer, that was the simping out of his brain, which poured out like a strange bluish liquid that started becoming cold gas. It was simply hard to look at his body after the passing of a few hours, since there was, without a doubt, no chance he would come back to life, the passer grimaced at the sight. He looked like a spike cone, longer than usual, these peculiar, long and sharp.

This bloated creature of strips and cords immediately started moving on its own. It was still connected or stuck in the process of connecting with as many adjacent of hidden outlets as it could in order to survive for as long as it managed to. There was the lost sight and it came. A pair of teeth, wild addition, but it couldn't be compared with what was going on around them. With the eight of the lone hanging mourners who had managed to get entangled out their necks.

The constant bobbling and the peculiarness of the dead-watches on the walls always hitting the eight hours, close to midnight on an old corrupted Gregorian calendar, there appeared only one dead hand which protruded out of the wall and sang out of an open second hand, third arm, bone protruding out of it as well. And from the bone-eye and the bone face which replicated that of a normal man, it spoke at last, which the outlets connected to it, drawing power from the dead-men inside the outing. As they appeared to be completely connected to a strange, out-of-this world outline of many bone-insterions, all of which would taint each other in the dark, touching could not be denied. A man tried approach but he immediately fell, broke his skull and left all the rotten guts crawl inside. Drawn to the power, an electrical cord shot, turning his skin into a patch of coal, melting as it rose, from the peculiarly shot, enfolded domes, and it was the lack of quietness, which gave it all awry. It was the lack of a tongue which made it seem primitive, despite what it was made out of, no matter how many times it writhed in disgust. Regardless of the animals, tools and bodies it attempted possessing by replacing all their guts with cords, but not the brains and definitely not their structures, it could not achieve humanity.

It could not speak with conceivable words, only some peculiarly animated static which appeared to be nothing like the real thing.

'I see that there's a spider looming, I am mad.'

A boy sang within the flint. He had cut a one of his fingers, the index one to be precise, a piece of his thumb which was sagging, only to be replaced with the arachnid's eggs as they would rise and shot and leave him yonder. Walking fewer paces, unable to figure out who was stronger. Either the device or the machine, the outlets or the stranger.

Within a few moments, it would all be decided. Ringer would enact only the first and foremost of the shots, he had a revolver on him after all. Special occasions, but the barrel was completely filled. It would not pay to wait a while, dastardly caught within. Large corners, jumping out of coal pit. Burning because of it, the pain and torture paid for.

'You're overtaken by paranoia, are you not?'

A gauge around the needle-rack, it retorted his legs into the plainness of a straddled-antler. He couldn't believe the fact that he was being taken away by force. The tour would strangle him, the noise did not end.

'Think about it for a moment.'

Roughly eight hundred forty six men died, out of an electrical encephalo-kyder power surge they had received during the electrical haze they got through their heads. A surge-oven and a furnace started embroidering the mountains of appliances, all the cord worms threw themselves in. Through one of the openings below the surface they stood prying on, gnawing on themselves as they melted in.

One of the outlets was pushing out long-meat-like sausages like meat grinders would. From inside each of them, father into the wall-extraction there stood a single long, curved, oblong pipe-like rotating unit which appeared to be cut half-way through, from which a few other pipe-tendrils, smaller in diameter fit in. Each of them carried meat in closer to a revolver-like device which was connected to the filter. The filter rotated with the revolver-spinnder, in that tiny area in which the meat which came from every pipe tendril mixed. Despite the strange appeareance they all seemed to bear, there was no doubt about it, everything was spoiled, raw, tainted. Unheated, untouched.

But the cut in the middle was important, since it was a modification made by the mad long-man, as peculiar as he seemed. Long curly fingers bore nail-like sharp scalpers of bone which had come out of its finger-nails, gnawing in the skin and pushing out of them as the rocky eyes only took a nature of their own. In was a strange sight, trying to peep in.

It was hard to spare a single moment chiming in, without pouting for longer than he needed. It was hard trying to hang there, since most of the weight fell upon his four shoulders and eight completely swollen arms which came out of the slips. And there was nothing he could do about it, from the looks of it. They fattened with each second, its lower body was a growth which contorted in the back, like a giant sack which crawled and landed on top of him, holding all the weight.

The sack of organs was volatile, as the large, plump, strick life-cords, and the other bodily function orators inside of it left their purple, domed, outwards puckors which seemed to shot from time to time, against the wall, various cold mucks which would spread like tar-wine, which in turn stuck itself against the surrounding areas and made it easier for the weight to diverge.

Various long-necked container-like bottled humans came out of large cyllindrical live-tubes, such as the ones which were used in the machine room, with the only difference being that they were closer to being organic than their nearest relatives. Even more contrived was the fact that they had been born without the legs and slightly deformed, despite there being no wheel-mechanisms acting on them, like the peculiar pseudo inorganic replicas in which their natural habitats were being set.

From an angle, the creature also looked to have an unnatural amount of joints in its limbs and no head, despite the presence of a functional brain unit which split in halves, stacked on top of one another, where the soft part of its brain lay lower than the one on top and the one above it being a false copy of the second one which hardened even more but appeared to resemble a helmet. And beneath the helmet there were long rope-like wedges which poured in, dropping even further until they had completely taken over the rest of the cognitive-tunnel through which small globular, man-sized cells which had been so hardened that they could be used as cockpits dropped. They were limited and appeared to have the many faces of man in all his expressive nature and all the peculiar fashioned senses that he attempted to go through. He bore a viral ganglion long-necklace like pair of neck which curved and appeared to have no end which connected all of the cells, allowing them to pump constantly as they were being brought back to their original position.

And with every division they went to produce, their spots in line dropped by a few centimeters, but they pushed back as soon as they made contact with one another. Not because they were deformed, but because they were humanoid in the making. And they could not fathom being so close to another, that being illustrated by the fact that they began fighting as soon as they made the first contacts. It filled them with some kind of despair, being lowered over such a long period of time. Maddening as it were, something filled them with the sight of the uncanny curved sack, the insides of which twisted them around, forcing them to bounce against inner walls as they would be twisted in them. Sometimes, there would be rest, but only at the mid point where a flat, floor-like surface stood there.

When that had been reached, their hands felt around and appeared to have taken to themselves a quiet-like desire to hold and to stay. Every formed arm and hand attempted, to their hardest to grab a hold and never let go, but it was simply something they could not do. After a while they would be dragged from behind, then lifted, seeing the next batch being connected with them by some peculiar umbilical-looking cord which spouted out some acidic feeder they had all licked against the walls.

Through the tube-like transparent section they were pulled in stood a breaker. It hardened as to prevent their development of sharp features and dentures, only to avoid pouting and pushing out. If they had, they would've interacted with the dead-like organs which floated everywhere around them. And most of them were stuck in the process of hibernation. Everything went slow outside.

He would be the strange capillarious cutter, the one in charge, the new administrator, with the key difference being the fact that he misused the machines. Instead of trying to ease the lives of the human beings beyond the wall, it wanted to make them suffer and the best way to do so was with the chaos it created and spread.

This was a call-back, a hit against the wall by one of its many clefted shins and ankles managed to trigger a peculiar sound which alerted the Keyringer of something.

It made him realise that there wasn't much safety to be had, not while he was there. He could paint the ringer around each ankle but never fully make it out. He was disturbed by something, but he chose never to take it out on his partner. His new partner.

'Is there a chance I might find something about you?'

'In time.'

He would be given the chance, but not here and definitely not now. He only crowned the vowels with everything he had come to promise but never came back on them.

'See that peace down there?'

'What do you mean?'

'I mean, that dead man, isn't he peaceful? Aren't the circumstances in which he died peaceful?'

There aren't any signs he suffered.'

And he could attest to it as well. It was some kind of guilty he began manifesting, even though he couldn't talk about it. He expressed it in the most peculiar manner he could. It was the only way he could make a case without losing more than a finger's worth of trouble. But he only stood there enacting a word-play in his head. Line for line, in which he could not fathom trying his fingers around, he was stable, he was rather obscure and couldn't handle them. Not while touching, not while trying to handle whatever happened to be there.

It was missed, the subtlety of the man, as they passed him. He had received a proper funeral. He had been propelled to a new state of living despite not being present in mind. Beneath him there was a target which bore all the air-filled wires which pushed in and appeared to control him and the complete functionality of his organs. They were pallidly stricken. Nobody spoke unasked.

But they were responsible for both the murder and the likes of the possession that had taken them back.

'It used to be more decent here, I know you wouldn't like to believe this but it's true. I sometimes feel like the sea of coral had spilled.'

A moment of silence broke in. Before anyone could affirm themselves in front of them, this broke through. It was strange, yet flabbergasting, how they found themselves there.

A knife lay on the floor, it was similar to the one the Foreman had picked up. He knew what he had to do. It felt like he had to make a choice if he wanted to waste no time and save his friend a second time. It was less dangerous that it seemed, or should've been so. Let some light come in through one of the bricked windows, a single thought emerged, twenty steps away, which were kind of sweeps but walked through tasting the floor. Ivanoe looked out of a rising portcullis. He saw what lay on the other side, a peculiar pattern which looked the shell of a snail, which slowly crawled into a piece as it attempted to shape itself.

It was almost animated, like a cradling toy. He approached it. Neither of the raincoated men tried stopping him.

There was a lone voice somewhere in the distance.

Not in the uncanny slither of molding metal, not covered by dirt, but there had to be a chance to keep going. There was still a chance for him, despite how sickly it looked.

'No one wants to consider you human, little creature.'

He had been stricken down and punched through. A hole lain through his body and petals of robes flaking through him. Torture was a reason, living would be treason, a cancer would be drawn alive on a slightly bent crisscrossed trench.

'Cliehnulmnuonose.'

A voice came, largely extended, melting as he walked, only an eye from the exposed skull and from the looks of his mouth, an unnatural kind of virulent disease started pushing through his guts, plainly as they stooped low. Uncannily thrown inside his ankles, he walked upon them. It was clear that this disaster could not be looked down upon, it was determinately diseased. A distress and a lack of peace came to his mind.

Gravity pushed the soles of the inside of his bone-traps in.

The compound has degenerated too much, or so it appeared. It was the clear hand of the Foreman at play, he who managed to convey no emotion and pry where he didn't belong. Madly, had he known, he would've thrown a tantrum and lost himself to in thought. But at every turn and every side, there was a clear struggle, no one rose. Walls began pushing out, stronger by the looks of the malignant roses that were growing in their heads.

Compliance stopped there, once it had begotten of a lost man, in search for the ship.

Somewhere, in a place where the land had been smeared, battered and lost to a mindless creature in the looks of a blob which started hardening before its time. In it there remained a piece of his mind.

The ship had landed too long a time ago. Thence they couldn't fathom looking forth, unknown.

A sailor came, named Rod. He had looked below at the fall and rested asured that there was no possible way for him to get through and lost his wit and mind and call. For any help would not do if he slipped, as he had no pretty sight to look after and get lost, back on his feet.

Rod turned, looked for only a second at her and tried getting himself to stand.

'Who are you now?'

'I am the lady of the flying sunk.'

It was a reference to something he couldn't have fathomed to search for or look around. He kept quiet for a while. Around him there would be no other mess to direct her at. As a matter of fact, looking everywhere came to naught.

But that could not be her either. She was way too deformed, and the doming carcass on top of them all appeared out of nowhere, being completely shaped out of the walls.

Koov saw Rod and called on him.

'Come on, take shade.'

'I don't know what's happening any longer. I want it to stop. I want it to stop.'

He repeated it again. There was no answer coming his way, but he was determined one way or another. It was just as clear that no one wanted to say a thing any longer. Obvious reasons being stricken by the side. And there was one distinct shot, a plain thing that never made it through them anymore.

But he failed to see it and walked away. Out of his cave, into another and the entire platform upon which they stood, and the floating city stood to fall with everyone there and their lives.

Not a second closer would they find it, nor could they stand to look after their wild and peculiar dreams. There was something incredibly putrid looming around and no one could make up for it any longer. It was quiet and docile, trying to make it through. And after the lightning, after the dream of the dead lamb and its lurid liver-kettles, the blunt strike of the fall came again.

He had no other reason to look back, he had not shown any interest any longer.

'We shall make it through before the blood sprint ends.'

‘What is the blood spring?’

‘You’ll see.’

That was the entry. Without a way of explanation, he would be damned if he knew. After all this time, there was still nothing to keep him in the back and nothing to make the noise while the biological skin-machine started pushing out the pouting lunges. That could be seen, looming around like the strange leppers that leaped, outwardly sculpted like putrid mads, the lurid saddened creatures that they were, bulked as their large bodies emerged, no longer kept in place, but erect as their doming one chair-like leg pushed out the faces. Each would come out at a multiplied retractor, an anchor which pulsed with skin, spreading it around as the faceless wonder appeared.

He was hard, the figure of a large convoluted man without arms but two large rounded, broke cyllinders coming out of him signaled something in each dirction. Akin to small red lazer-pointers he marked the spots which needed to be filled with skin. Yet the Foreman appeared to be missing, out of question, in no direction, merely trying his luck.

‘Blasted man, that imitation of an ape had made it through.’

‘Where is he?’

‘I couldn’t tell you, but I know, that I can tell you that he’s up to something.’

He relented, without asking or giving up too much, the pain would make itself known otherwise.

Can’t count the objects, at least not without some difficulty, he’s thinking of something now. Clearly, he’s almost set in deep thought, even though he doesn’t want anyone else to know it just yet.

‘This is getting sad already.’

The Foreman confirmed it. He couldn’t compete with him or with anyone any longer because of it. He was old, too old and frail. And the sounds of a piano ended now. Would there be hope? Little could be said about it. For the time being, it was too precisely caught in the mood, the whole complex was somewhat quiet. Too quiet for anything to happen, that’s when they took a break from walking and they simply stood there wondering whether or not someone would come. In some way that had been the closest thing to a wish they had.

Escape could be another.

But at this point in time, Keyringer had already made up his mind. And there was no point in trying to do it all over again. Enter the presences, which all looked way too clear now. While, before they had looked somewhat veiled, as much as they could be held there, they were suddenly revealed to them without any explanation.

It felt as if they suddenly got released of had gotten a pass to get through it, without having to pay any explanation for what was going on any longer. Thence they only scared the passing, trying to entrance the missing points inside and carry.

They looked way too exposed for any comfortable person to approach them. As a matter of fact they only this appeared in his mind.

He had a pencil on him. Ringer wasn't focused on what they were doing, more so, he was only trying to set himself for the failure his life had become. He couldn't even afford an ink pencil and that bothered him the most, it deterred him from asking, seeing how the pool of ink coming out his arm was making faces. It was almost too clear that someone was messing with him both against the surroundings and against his being. It was unforgivable, trying to get himself standing again, especially since he was about to be taken down again.

Foreman may've been far away from him but he knew better, though he asked.

'Are you hiding inside the pool?'

It was so tiny that he could've missed it. Ringer had been shown the chosen pair of teeth assailing his senses before coming back to the missing worn-out boots he had on him. No one wanted to help it. And they were all heading to one direction.

Calmly they began dressing again in their skin of veils. He missed seeing what they looked like. Before he could turn back to the ink blotch he missed that as well, without having any reason to ask.

'Have you seen by any chance a face in the ink pool beneath my arm? '

'No and you shouldn't be looking for one either, bad things seem to happen when you do. And that, you should trust me as well as you can. It's something you won't like finding you.'

'So you do know something about it.'

'Of course I know, I had the pleasure, if you could call it that, of meeting him. This is what I can actually tell you, stop it immediately, it's not worthy it.

Whatever problem you have, take it out against the walls, but know that there's no return to life the way it was after coming into contact with him.

I know, this is the most I showed, but I couldn't risk giving you too much. You show a man your teeth and he'll hound you off forever.'

He paused, then sat down near me. For a second time he revealed the habit he had picked up from some abandoned place. It made him think a lot more than anything else. As a matter of fact, he appeared to be smoking some kind of disquieting organ he picked from around the place. If I didn't know any better, I could've said it was.'

Again, no question asked. I saw it, the blotted mark which stretched with a single cord before going out around it. There as nothing he could do any longer to make me feel right, after seeing the cable shake against the walls. Nearing us, came the worms. We moved immediately before any case could be made about it and never again had we spoken in quiet.

Background noise coming from the echo of one of the saw mills that was being worked on around the place, as weirdly as it sounded, it was indeed a test of wits. We both failed it. Moved on and started hearing it again, without getting our chance to get back on track and without the glory of knowing what was going on.

‘They won’t allow for a change to happen, you know that?’

I couldn’t understand where he was going again. But I had done it by then. A single cut around the lungs, Filler would survive, despite the struggle. I wouldn’t be there to greet him in any case because I could only do so much in such a short period of time. It was a struggle, not of wits but wild surroundings, and all were present, twenty unfortunate meters forth.

‘I don’t think this is part of the compound.’

‘Does it matter?’

For what appeared to be a few meters forth, there lain a single court, in which a bunch of veiled faces stood there frozen, no longer in use. Both of them appeared to be waiting and asking for something, trouble of any kin, anything interesting, even the worst aspects of the vile stars that were striding by, never to shine again out of the very shame they appeared to set themselves in. And with that they made the noise, like large spatial nose machines which couldn’t be helped any longer out of the peculiar access which had been lost, out of question, lest of all would they be deranged and ask.

‘What shall we do?’

‘No, that’s not it. I don’t want to have to deal with you any longer, I want to find out who threw my friend over the bridge.’

It was so, that he looked back and realised that Filler didn’t jump over. He didn’t come with him in the complex either by chance or because he had been called upon his request. Both of those actions were mirrors of him forcing him to do as he pleased and now, all of them witnessed it. Then comes the judge.

He wasn’t bluffing, when he called upon it or tried making it seem like he was doing something. It was up to him to make order in the court.

And Ivanoe looked just as furious after looking at them and finding out that what had happened was because of them and not anyone else, not that it should be counted upon. Or they held accountable any more than any one who killed another man in self defence, yet he had to know.

‘Why have you eaten my friend?’

Was the first question he asked. As soon as he met their gazes, he stubbed on a foot, curbed his elbows and his both of the statues on both of his sides, breaking their heads, which shattered and came off the floor without crackling out of the power of his fists. It had been the only show of might and strength he could come up with. But it appeared like it worked.

The Foreman got in a defensive stance, trying his best not to give too much in, but his knife-organs were clearly exposed, even pumping as they rose from their wild spots and went at it again. He was being prepared now and he couldn’t help it. Clearly, something was going to happen and not a single soul protested.

‘Can we not resolve this in any other way?’

‘I’m sure there’s something I could say or do to take it back.’

‘Unfortunately for you, by the time I looked at my friend again, he had been almost completely eaten, past every possible direction and way through which the culprit may have fled towards, I could only see your hand and footprints on the floor.’

‘But how could you know it was I? I couldn’t have done it, there’s no way you could check for it.’

‘There is, Ringer and I see your red stained hands dripping still.’

They had been doing that for a while and looking back at it, he realised how saddened the man looked. Even more than that, he had done something which could not be contested. He killed him in cold blood and took everything he could, even the gallons of blood. Foreman stepped away from Ringer. Now the two of them were left in the hall. This was the reason, though it wasn’t said here, nor would it be drawn upon the quiet. Listening through the cracks.

‘I won’t kill you here. I think I would come to regret it.’

He still dwelled on the regret of the many years he had spent trying to fix the man. Not to mention the long journey which had started dragging him through some peculiar underground land which couldn’t even be quantified or placed on any map. Nor could it be detected or sought after, played with or listened to. Nothing would do, only this, as it passed through some cut ears which appeared out nowhere. Through and through, he listened to the signs. Nothing could’ve made it through stone.

They had been met by a dead end at the hands of a small group of survivors who couldn’t accept the fact that there was no escape. No way to bring everyone to life or hope to repopulate everything, even the dirtiness of a road in a world doomed to die.

Why had this machine brought them here in the first place? There was no explanation for it. As a matter of fact, if anything could be taken any longer it was the fact that they spent the last days of their life together, loathing the man who could only bring this one man back. What a loathsome creature they saw him as in the end. Compassion couldn’t be shown any longer out of the fact that he wasn’t even considered to be alive any longer. Related to the touching and the lack of emotion he showed, he felt nothing for them and it could be felt as well.

Looking back at the torn hands, they never appeared to lie no matter what their deal was. Whenever something stopped, a cog or a key, those were the dead giveaway that something was happening. He was to blame.

‘You’re doing this, aren’t you? We were doing just fine before you showed up Ivanoe.’

‘I’ve told you for the eight time that it wasn’t me, I’m not the one doing it, I’m not responsible for this dead end. ‘

‘But I know it must be you, there’s not other reason but.’

‘Calm down Arla, this is not time.’

‘You’re right Ascott, this is the place. This is the right place where everything needs to happen. What else it there, after all, look.’

The cables had been chewed off. It was this tiny detail which shook him off the most. It’s almost as if he knew it in some way, how it would either end or how it would happen in any case. That had only been a matter of time, trying to get through without making too much fuss.

‘That’s why it hurts the most, I suppose, I knew the man for far too many years to simply abandon and give up on him. I know he didn’t have any intention of living through this world or being brought back against his will but I cannot help it. He was a brother which will never be replaced, not by any placque, nor by anything else.’

He had been an object, for him to turn to. As, after so many time he was brought back, he appeared to be more dull-minded than the last time. He was suffering of a brain fog which could only come back at the most horrible times. What this man had witnessed inside that elevator had been dreadful and uncanny, as they could not fathom trying to reap the pain they had caused on themselves and chose to slowly bleed in front of him as if he were a god in need to be pleased. By this sight, he chose to not waste another second, least of all was he curious about what went on.

With each blink of an eye Roscoe saw fewer and fewer people alive in the shock-cabbin they were, nor would he ask after all a while. He simply was and that disturbed him the most.

‘May I try to explain myself for one single moment? It was not my intention to eat him. Under normal circumstances, I am a normal, strong-headed functional person, but now it just happened for me to.’

‘Devour the body of my friend, I know.

The same man I had intended to bring back after a while. Unfortunately, I seem to have lost my thought, I can’t seem to find it.’

What did I intend to do with him? That couldn’t be answered any longer. He ran, just in time, out of the court, in an opening which had been clearly made by them. All the presences embolded in one, just like before. Days passed, rightfully into decades, spent trying to scourge as many walls which were filled with the least conceivable creatures that appeared in the way. Foreman had a great act, he could simply end anyone he wanted to, yet he chose to spare me.

We ran, as far and as fast as we could, knowing that we could be caught in any second if we chose to stride out of the way. It was clear, where we were heading. Into the bowels of the hyades.

‘Thences, it’s coming, the sea of marble, I can only walk slowly here.’

He didn’t make sense, but he was nearing the age of senility and couldn’t take care of himself, as far as he was aware of it. He lost a pint of his mind and chose to get a single foot in the way. A single door got caught it. They wandered around it, the room was clean. After walking for this long, this was perhaps the most dreadful thing he’d ever seen or wanted to encounter.

By some account, he couldn’t see it as a real thing. It simply wasn’t, he couldn’t.

‘Take this, for your migraine.’

‘A painkiller? I didn’t expect you to carry one of those on your. Call me surprised.’

‘I’ll paint you in red if you don’t shut your mouth.’

Someone was approaching. On a single sheet of paper, they could see him legs. They were clearly set down, painted with egg-yolk, mostly the whites, being barely distinguishable from everything else. Though if there was something which had been as real as it seemed, it was him. Melting after a while, dragged inside one of the opening fire-holes in which the strange plugged in worms leaped. He was a machine.

Despite his life being in jeopardy, he found it hard to think only of himself. Mostly because she was still there, stuck inside the panel. He was here, having made a promise, even though it was indirectly made, that he would somehow get the chance to save her. It was the least he could do. An opportunity he couldn’t get away from. It ate at him, that he wasn’t going to do it as easily as he had hope to do it.

Two of us left, and I suppose there’s no going back to Filler. He repented, seeing how the dripping of the ink left a familiar form which he looked back to. As far as he understood it, he concerned himself with nothing other than it. Thence the breaking. Aleksey had little regard to his own life and what was going on around him. As a matter of fact, since one of the bombs managed to land through one of the nearest roofs, close to the living quarters, he had lost whatever sense he had in him. A memory of violin songs and then he saw the invaders.

He could do nothing right or so he thought. And nothing of what he’d done could compare to the echoes of pain heard through the complex.

Voice or echo, whichever it had been, the vision was denied, he couldn’t have tied himself any further. It served as nothing other than further proof that there was no going back any longer. Speed was in his bones, confusion galore, dread coming after the midnight hour, he couldn’t sleep.

Ringer was left there talking to himself, apparently set in awe by the fact that the Foreman couldn’t help it either. He had some unresolved business of his own he had to deal with and sooner or later it would start biting his head off. This was it, the administrator started pushing out of the wall, slowly, one hand at a time. Carefully, he was enacting something which appeared to be vaguely tainted, calculated strikes and various types of inbred which only appeared to be molded out of the melted steel. It was an inefficient way of trying to control the inhabitants of the complex but for now it would have to do. No longer would he be set in awe, trying to gnaw at the first piece of scum he could chew on. But he took it from inside the body of an adjacent standing-by person who unfortunately found himself sitting at the wrong place at the wrong time when the administrator felt both hunger and wonder. IT was a replacement.

Him who dwelled inside the walls, he belonged of the same race as theirs. Long, in the Isles, where his kind hid inside the walls of an old theater. Though he had been long-gone, even to the point where he had been completely evolved unlike them or their kind. He had that blimp-fat which gave it all away. Overfed, nurtured into this place and left nothing else to fill the time with other than the complete function of the machine. Looking out for himself and only himself when needed, trying to feed the young machines. No one suspected or appeared to suspect its wild existence. It raised too much suspicion, trying to gnaw on him or checking what he was doing before long. Through various ways that could've been avoided, but it was too late to hope it could happen. One glance, missed it.

He hissed like a python hit yb a dumb-bell as soon as his spine made contact with the strange passer through the walls. There were no actual walls any longer, only thin curtains. It explained too much. No one phased through them at all, it was only a matter of feeling around. Soft parts court be stretchable, they created the illusion of static, of blunt-metal, of being impenetrable or such. Not a single voice appeared to give it in. Then there was silence and afterwards.

Back to his senses.

'Are you done with it already?'

There was not a single note to justify what was waiting for him out there or why he should continue going along. Not a speech-part, not a word, in, nothing which could get him going. He could remember something vaguely heard on a radio. It was missed. Ringer thought of it, about the need he felt, all of the sudden. The need of hearing the recreation, the reenactment of some historical kind of voice, like one of MLK's repertoires, or anything in its vein.

So far, there was no consolation any longer, trying to get a single word in resulted into nothing and nothing more would set him free. I can think of him at least, if it's possible. I could still get away with it. One thought in the matter and it would do just well. If there was a single consolidating factor going, it was the survival. He would survive long enough to catch Filler from behind. Neither of them could return back home until the work was done for.

Ass long as no one moved too quickly now, everything would be well enough. No more distractions. He was smiling, a similitude of emotions passing through.

'Jealousy?'

'It's the only act I know of, if you don't mind me creeping along, I think I was supposed to leave.'

'Can't leave the panel, can't get away, you know that. I'm still working on the terminal. I'm still out there, searching for your brother.'

I can't be bothered to look after you as well.'

'Then leave, I can take care of myself if I have to. I only hid here for some time because I had the vague impression he was approaching.'

'He could still be on your tracks, I think. You wouldn't happen to know what's coming after, would you?'

'What do you mean?'

'After either of us dies, what do you think might come after? I for one cannot leave this place and I have the vague impression that you're just as stuck here as I am.'

Not for long, not after, couldn't bother looking into it. There was some hardness of truth to it but I knew this as much as she had. We were stuck here, whether or not either of us liked it. Only one way remained out, and she wouldn't like it. I wouldn't either. We both considered it. But that could wait. There was something even more important waiting here and it was nothing else but her name.

'You're supposed to be my wife, right? Strange how I couldn't even remember your name now.'

'It happens, you never had a good memory you know?'

'And you also just happen to look different every time I see you.'

Even now, though it was, perhaps way too rude to admit it just yet. 'Opportunistic creature that you are, there was no way to suspect it any longer. It only went as far as a second try or another attempt.'

'That so?'

'He tried fighting you know? Ruminating on what he could do about, despite being locked with no way of breaking out. I thought about doing something to annoy him, so every now and then I would simply pull out as much mass as I could, break a way out, then immediately fill him with one of the hard-men.'

'And who are those now?'

'Not who, but what. And to that, I'd say they're strange metal-men. I don't think they have any insides, or at least I couldn't feel it around the breaking spot. I tried getting through them several times but I had actually failed.'

Multiple attempts as well, despite being ripped in part, the whole, split in as many slices as he could, there was nothing inside but the pure metallic alloy which made their whole beings. It was a plan they couldn't have gotten away from. In some turn it almost came to destroy them, thinking of a way through. Getting away from the strange man who was breaking them without any possible explanation. And it gave the Foreman a charm of his own, talking about he got away with torturing both his victim and these creatures who had done nothing to anger him. An appeal came, but it wouldn't do.

'I think we both know the reason for it.'

'You're joking about it, but I actually know what you mean. I suppose you could indeed get to the point where you could justify just about anything.'

'I would, wouldn't I?'

He hadn't said a thing. It was harmless, it was hardening, seeing the pumps which were his muscles work at it again. From here, now out, one could even come to think or to believe. Nah, he wouldn't kill me in cold blood, not any longer. There was a time when that would've been a certainty, my life would've been forfeit, but it was pointless now. No one was to bother with the strange pumping man. While he was around, I felt it, or at least I felt it just well enough. Plenty of men had been caught and trapped inside their own prison cells and not a single one of them had a chance to make a case or yell. Shouting was pointless and there were just so many directions you could take before being caught in action.

'I had come here with a purpose. I don't think there's any point going back any longer but at the same time I don't think I could succeed in getting through with it.'

‘Would you mind sharing it with us?’

‘Since you asked, sure, I came here thinking I could somehow purify this place, somehow. But I’m in doubt.’

‘Losing your faith should be the least of your worries. I seriously don’t think there’s a point trying to fight through.’

It was difficult but he was right about something. This was the land of a no man’s will and he had run out of it a long time ago. That could be seen just about everywhere.

Especially in there, in the peculiar spot he was set it, being a scout outside the rims of the open door, the wreckage of a room that he was in, the cells looking calmer and calmer by simply passing the time. It was somewhat strange, bizarre, trying to long for something or someone that wasn’t there. It was pointless, carying on a blunted, torn shoulder.

But no dark man would be formed from one of the cells, regardless of how hard they attempted to escape out of it. Even from the distance, it was all too clear, what they were trying to do. He had never seen such a wild attempt as their, in that one moment when a power surge had come out of the long distanced generators. He had no way of knowing or looking around. It was all too tained, but he could see their sad attempt to rebuild themselves. In the air, trasparent, ghastly, fully made, long haired, to a veil which interconnected their skin, hairs, limbs and essence. That was it, their essence leaked out and without a reason, he approached. Leaving his post wasn’t difficult at all. Well thought even, as he bent his knees and loomed in it. Peer to peer, he couldn’t fear not even the slightest touch, or what might happen if he decided to cause a slight shimmer or the leakage of what was carrying through it.

‘It’s pointless, you should know. I don’t think you could make it out without some organic material.’

Or so, at least he thought. He remembered something from an old speculative fiction book he had read in the past. It was a short story about a man who had been reanimated, though he could never get a grasp on that concept alone. Something about it ringed some truth, yet. He never understood it.

‘I could try getting you some skin and bone. You know, this place appeared to be filled with them, no one should be bothered by a few bodies missing if it can be helped.’

Despite the doubt, he saw nothing in those glass-diamond cherubed eyes. For fear of bringing back to life some mindless creature that would harm him, he decided on this. I will bring him only the weakest parts I could grab a hold of, no bones, no limbs, only a mass of rubbing meat, which should be soft enough for him to be nothing but a moving blob. No brain and no matter, nothing which would have him stand a chance. That man would be no man and he would become none on my watch. As that was the first thing he feared. A fair chance would be an invitation to him being hurt, killed or he could risk angering them. Whoever they were, even in this time of distress he felt like praying. But the terminal, it clicked.

Sharp noise, one which was quickly followed by a set of bells, or the closest thing to them, he would not be harmed by waiting for too long. It bothered him no more than he should do it. Any more than he would creep and shake at the sound, a virulent virus entered the facility. It’s what it said on the screen. Just a a measure of respect, he took one short step being and kicked the panel his wife hid in.

‘Think you’re up to this? I have some bad news for you. I feel bad that I have to tell you this. Under normal circumstances, I would’ve spared you.’

But not this time, this was something hiding wouldn’t spare her.

‘I need to get you out.’

‘Has my brother found me then? Is he?’

‘That’s not it. You wouldn’t get it.

There’s this virus.’

‘Then I’ll take my chances. I’ll live through it.’

‘You can’t live through a virus.’

‘I haven’t had the chance to try my luck now, have I?’

‘I suppose not, but you need to let me help you.’

‘You’ve done enough dear, even though we both know.’

‘Wait, there’s no need for you to tell me, I know.’

But every now and then, she looked like her. With everything being said and done, she looked like an exact copy of her. A crystalline reflection which was threatened by a fever, she could melt in no time. Or she could be shattered by her sibling. Either way, there was little he could do to save her.

‘What’s your name?’

‘I’m Christine.’

Not the name he expected. It should’ve been plain, but not that plain. The voice didn’t fit, the body didn’t fit, nor had the voice. It was less than expected of her to move, but she did it anyway. She could not travel far, but she joined him, nonetheless.

‘It will be dangerous.’

‘I know, but I that’s what marriage is about, isn’t it?’

Enter the next stage. Christine and Keyringer were engaged. Second attempt at his rescue; it came as soon as he realised that a single pump against this chest wouldn’t do any good. His lungs were exposed, as was his chest. He was no surgeon but this came out as if it was all natural, never learned, machine-placed, a memory which only added to itself, until then. A single shot would do, but he couldn’t tell where he got that painkiller from. Nor could he explain how he managed not to lose it after diving after the man. It was raining, that would explain the raincoated men. They were there during the scene. All of them shared a similar appearance. Their raincoats looked like uniforms, some of them even had some had outrageous marks. Shot in bulks of slugs, all of which managed to leave no trace whatsoever. Not a single shot managed to reach their wild-faces, which were obscured.

Obvious thing, they waited for this execution, whether or not it was done here in the open or back there, it didn't matter as much. Looking back onto the bridge, too many people were starting to gather around. Too many witnesses, but not even Ringer had a clue whether or not he'd live. It was pointless after a while. Pinpointing everything, each side being made look in a certain way, we were both either the criminals or the witnesses that refused to interfere. Both directions could be drawn that way. It didn't matter which side of the reality was true.

A good chunk of the people on the bridge saw a different image being painted to them. Weird scene that it was, they looked out of their way. It was clear enough who the actors were and who was worked upon. Filler was still on the ground, but this time, it was the judge who appeared to be the one operating on him. So far so good, no pain and nothing too obscure, the raincoats were the assistants. They were the agents. And I was the the one looking over them, as a supervisor would.

The other chunk saw the image how it was in reality, or how it was supposed to be, if that made any sense. It was way too dangerous, this was something that couldn't be called on. Dreadful or not, some changes would have to take place. It couldn't be happening for way too long. Deathless stares on both sides. Everyone was mixed there, two men on left and right saw a thing, but the one in the middle kept his sight true. And they were indistinguishable, physically there was hegemony. It couldn't be denied, nor hidden. Cheering stopped, back to what he was doing in the back.

It was bothersome, not having someone to speak with. She would have to do. Christine, was it? Two more shots being taken away, and that was being taken for granted. A harmful gaze, outside it came pouting. He would forget all about trying to remake the people hiding in the power cells, but this room looked as if it would stand the test of time.

'We're supposed to act like it.'

'Married? I haven't accept yet, have I?'

'That's a given, but.'

'But what?'

'You wouldn't understand it, as a woman.'

'Why won't you try me?'

Certainly he did, by the strange way he looked at her. She was almost too quick to respond, that part of her brain was working too fast. Already she was on her feet again. It was the worst idea they came up with and neither of them acknowledged it yet. Out there, he would meet a single actor. He would end either of them, then himself. There was no plan any longer. But she doubted the fact that she couldn't lie. Why had the thought even occurred to him? Her brother might as well end him if he had the chance. But she didn't say that, or she had. No, he remembered exactly how the tie would happen. Kill him, he dies. Kill her, they'd both live. Why stall then? She didn't appear to have much life left in her eyes. It would be way too easy to take a single life at the cost of two.

'I don't trust you enough to do it, you haven't earned that right yet.'

‘Then why am I here with you?’

‘Because there’s a virus and there’s a man trying to kill you.’

‘And another one who hates me.’

He couldn’t bother trying to respond to that. Whether or not he thought about it, no difference would be made. It dawned on him that he couldn’t call the shots, no matter how hard he tried. Something held him back. There would be no greetings party for long. It was something that couldn’t be thought of. Brushed past the first, taken by the. Listen to it, there was no point in staying.

It was starting to get familiar, too close to comfort. Without a way of saying, without spending too much time around, on the spot, they reenacted everything which was lost in the endless ether, space was dry, for in each one of the sand fragments there was at least one tiny globe, the eye of the snakes, the ones that lay, even the closest to being somewhat erected upon of the place.

‘Is there an end to this maze?’

‘There cannot be one.’

‘But what if I were to catch another break?’

‘You won’t be able to, can you see me?’

And thence, the second and the fourth head erupted from the back. A moss-like body which carried them around masked the device and the machine, which lay just as automated as anything of the kin would carry on with. Quietly they started working on their own body, trying to replicate any kind of innate function, madly pushing through. It could not be conceived in quiet that they were trying to pry in the gates, the morose advert being a reflection of the past.

‘What does it say?’

‘The opening of the Antiquarium is bound to happen now.’

In the bile of the making they came back and only now had they observed, the place long deserted, yet set around each verse and term. It couldn’t have been clearer that their minds were escaping and none may know what happened a while. He, the body gave the order.

His, the body only one and he could only fathom listening to one order at a time. On a rotation every single hand was granted access to the bodily functions needed to see the scene that enfolded over there. Some men had been killed and they couldn’t be held responsible for what went through them as soon as they came upon their smoldered bodies. Encased in the filament of iron, the stars, the moon came back, alas.

‘We ought to forgive ourselves for coming through.’

‘But what had happened?’

‘Missing you.’

Another voice had been added to the pile and it couldn't even be held any longer, nor contained, not after what was going on. Far too many attempts had been gone through and couldn't even last for longer. In the midst of this sculpted structure, there came the architect, a failure of a man. He erected himself with a single small pick which couldn't even work as intended any longer, out of the while, in the pile. He stacked them on a bunch of taken bodies until he came back, until he returned to the refurbished anvil. Thrice the heads no longer could the dead be given a chime in. He asked.

'What have you come here for? Can't you see I'm busy?'

'Nay, of course you're not. You were supposed to receive me, weren't you?'

'I think, so.'

He took a great look at the strange moss-covered lid he hid. He was one of the least believable fiends, the culprit passing through him, yet he couldn't be believed in any longer. Stronger by the minutes, heavier, or yonder, wherever he went to, that wouldn't come to pass. It came to him that this could be just about anyone, and none might call him out today.

Lost machine? Never cather to him.

Plaster in the head, he went mad and immediately crushed all four of the heads in an instant, yet the third one was nowhere to be seen.

'Oh, now, I get it.'

The architect burst into a mad dance, realising then that he was in a dire need to continue working just as hard. Another terminal would do, even if the place was abandoned, he could communicate through space and time. Yet alone and alone might they be.

'Listen to me.'

A voice called to none other than him.

Chivalry stared, he started on his feet, unable to feel the despair which the forest had managed to create. All that gas took a form of its own, sharpened as its heeds expanded. Bodies founded out of stone, all around the gas torn. Soon enough it split around, shared between them, never founded in the quiet, waiting, for somebody to the taking. It was the only thing that made them walk, the strongest of them being thrown around in chunks. Then, all of the sudden, no longer in waiting, born out of life, in a matter of seconds, they sprinted through the fire prints, large horns coming out of their stone bits, grins a many, strength a sunder.

'I shall challenge you, or thine lord if that's what I ought to come after.'

In the silence of his lance, his flanking started, never to return from the darkening of the fumes, never again, past the mourning, past it through, never would it, least of of the shouting, pass through, emerge out of the falling branches. Tormented by the fall, the quake would also turn everything into a pile of broken mileage, long converted by the ostrich he was on. It died. As soon as a single egg-shell fell, of yolk made out of a special alloy which had been hardening of old, the bird fell. A single strike to the head and it was dead before its master could realise what was going on. Lost to it, he came to his toes, wondering how to return back home. He had no meaning, there were no songs left. To rise against the first place, the blow of a falchion took him down. Soon after, it came after him, no wonder, messing through. He searched for knowledge and ever-after, messed with the winds, lepper's trough. Thence the gas emerged at last, no longer in the mood for mocking.

It spoke in winds, carried by the strange winds of fires, as the arson soon emerged.

'You'd better run, oh knight o'er the land might swallow your remains. No forest might grow again upon the lands, as these are no trees, no oaks, but see it for what they are as it comes forth.'

Thence he looked, as dire-waking, how each started revealing their so-called roots. And their bodies were of skin and bone, with breathing systems of their own, exposed in the waking, bare in the waking and never to be touched by those who were unworthy, less. He couldn't confess of what was in the making or from whence it might come after.

Each of them were living and in their advent, striking at each end, trying to end up in farther to their fatherlands, in the quiet, darkly plump and in the air the ground had stood as no one else would, up in the lost keep, which appeared as it was destined to be taken in by them. From one of their meaty-ends, the vortex comings, never sending the leppers into each passing and into the sender's abyss, peace and quiet, least of all be yearned for, it tainted everything it touched.

'Hence I shall come forth and listen to the songs of peril.'

All of whom, never ending came out of his mouth. He was determined to come forth and loom around, waiting for something to happen in the midst of the fleeing men. None would remain along the way, nor could they fathom getting through, hence the pain of the loss. Another ostrich was lost, towards the floating trees.

'What's happening?'

A frog-disease had taken care, that Squire's ostrich would soon be dead. It choked on a neurotoxin that ought to have killed a vile thing eight times the size, never mind a creature so small, shafted during the darkening of clouds emerging. Never ending, always fending off the days, never pushing through as to convey, pain never ending.

'Come, come, I shall carry you with my many arms.'

Ogoth said, upon the seething demise. He couldn't fathom risking his life there, yet there was nothing beyond him anyway. He chose to look and swoon, the sight. And the peculiar creature, Prude only battered the ground with its many legs. Its peculiar sun-like god mask only shone right off the ground, right off the bat when I needed to search for some kind of defence, against the falling dead-like meat-ends. Hence it came forth, it spoke nothing of worth and chose to follow.

'We shall risk our lives for this boy. Do you find anything wrong with the claim?'

The calamity couldn't be dealt with, not wonder why he had approached as such an inopportune moment. A shism of thought, he considered going out of his way and getting as far as to abandon them. Nay, he chose to aid the child, in the search of his master, gone. In it there was nought so far as to care. He fell to despair, as soon as he saw the weird ends that erupted from below them. None would be the matter, saying. An advent, paid for in the likes of tribulations. Many strong bonds erupted, shot through their bodies, a web-like prison enacted to the sight. For this kind of domination only came to avoid the knight, yet no villager was alive by the time it was done. Such a wild display of power, wild as it were, couldn't have been met again. Prowess to each end, admitting, fealty to him, omitting, the fact that as soon as they entered the other side of the land, they might as well have died together. It was an act of desperation, and ace of spades which almost came to conquer them for no other reason than them having chosen to be dead.

‘Child, you need to know something. Squire, if we enter their field, we might as well be done for and die within the hour of their full awakening, there, the sky!’

He pointed at the symbol which designated the way through which they'll all die. It was subtle yet erected in the peculiar shape of a moving sphere, whereas their leaves had stopped being shaped that way, giving in their fully formed gaze a wild-like nature, sharpened to cut through skin. Embodiements of sharp fangs, and bitter long chains on which they had put themselves through before the days of the bitter cries, though if one thing could be taken it was this. No one spoke and no one cried on their barely formed graves as the peculiar villagers, who died like soldiers defending their homeland, from the vile landowner, who had died as well with them on fronts, had never stood a chance today. Nor had they had the chance to retreat, whatever would the chronicles say.

It was the blood in the gut-vein, splatters on the stone-front around them. Somewhat incontestable, how the innards of the entry inside the floating forest had been converted to come weird yet peculiar battlefield. Dark though it was, the night was coming yonder, the flames of the wild dark fires never became to a dark fruition. Thence they came inside the first standing house during their flight. It was somewhat undeniable that they couldn't fathom looming for too long, without risking being seen by those malicious finds and how rabid they had come to be. With each tender part of their bar-like ropes, their slithering grasps only pushing through the throngs of their very filthy, mad embraces; dances in the air uncanny, writhing corpses being hanged like tiny beads placed around a necklace, wrung. And wrought against stones, smashes inside their homes but one, one of them remained pure. This couldn't be misunderstood by any means, they couldn't get away from what was happening and thence, they stopped asking, turning on a single light. Ogoth rested beneath the window frame, looking at the projection which fell beneath the rims of the uncanny well-like light. He had been just as frightened of finding out if he was indeed immortal as a demi-god would have to be. Compressed fingers had been laid around. It was clearly that everyone inside the room had been stricken by the smell and everything around. Prude had been the easiest of them to hide, out of everyone, he had only stood there as a lamp would, rounded but uncannily forlorn. Watching where the light went.

Never ending the wild ascent, the house would rise with them in it, whether or not they could help it, that was another problem, as long as it were to last, they cast their weapons down and waited. A battery of the mind could only go so far. A jester emerged from one of the broken stones. He didn't look like anything remotely alike to the being, the Carrion, the fealty of disease. He prized himself nonetheless until one dire moment, during the pull towards the many spheres that emerged out of the grand wire-like channel which formed above the outer rims of the world. Many leashes started embracing, covering everything, until the point where everything had been wrapped, the maddening happened whereas nothing came closer to the blasted mindless, word-embroidery that caught him off guard.

Like a spectral like kindness, seeing how it would only suffer if he had managed to get stranded on one of the pulled stones, the energy entered him from every possible direction. He could not scream in the moment it came, a surge had entered his body then came out of every possible direction, blowing the grims and the pus, the fluttering guts which became tainted tiny blocks of moldering skinned-out butterfly beings. All of them obscures by their division and the body they ahd tried keeping as they refused to spread. From them emerged the cradling of a lost world, a lonely alcove of pus-like trove. Quietly entranced, deterred to nought and none.

It was hard felt, never met, instead of crying through. A bitter fate had messed with the sinew that emerged out of them as soon as they started passing.

‘Where might I find him?’

A voice unlike the the scum-plough, the wonder of the now to be, the never ending agony, it came soon after, as a call, from the depths of the earth where the dastardly incapacitated vision of the world had managed to push through, and cover everything past the girth of the being. A godly painted bastardly expression, the fiery burnt taint made out of smoldering remains, a body that writhed in its shapeless goo, since its many heads had managed to get through and lose themselves in the agony of lost deathless stars. All of whom signaled for the call to come back and return to a time beyond time. Listless in the wine of blood, a malefic heart moving along, coming out of the strange portal they had made. And whence the heart had crawled out of its hole, from that pioneer of space-organs, the celestial body exposed at last, it was revealed that from atom to atom, the god-space remained closely endowed with vision of the other worlds. Yet no man could see them, as this sight was only for them to be. They would be driven to extinction by the agony and the infection of sight, the might of the face being brought down upon him, in the distance, melting. Crying to himself, aloud. Battling with the many face and the wildness of the world inhabited by other unlike him, the mound in which Agamemnon waited. Couldn’t be touched by none, as it would happen for it to be seated, in a world unlike our very ground.

And thence, an altar, made for himself, by the creatures in the names of which they had been given life. A maddening wreathing mass, his face, alas, but to contrast what it had become, none could push through and handle the scum which came to piece itself, the man would know.

But that was the least of his concerns. It was hard, trying to make it through after a while. With each passing day, he could be sure he wasn’t going to make it.

‘Had enough of it, do you think you could help me with something? I’ve been holding onto it for a long while now.’

‘A bottle of ink, what’s that for? I hope you’re not planning on muddying my clothes now, are you?’

‘I wouldn’t dream of it.’

He couldn't help it either. There was a surprisingly sharp pain in his chest. Only now, in the passing could he strangely count on it. And that only went here and there, with some thing to be stricken down. He did as he pleased and carried on writing on the walls.

'Here's your brush. Do as I do, we need a few similar runes jotted down.'

Let there be light in the dark, he thought. It was hard to reciprocate, the lust being spread through the tunic that was being made. Out of their own, there came the master. None could foresee it happen, not a single, twice or thrice, it did not bode too well, waiting for something to happen, to happen, to happen, to happen and make noise, enough to alarm anyone, or everyone, the closest ones. Not a single being could lay in calm out of the fact that they were incapable of turning themselves inside out.

There, in the distance, the terminal was dead. Shimmers of power ending, no admission, not a map, yet somewhere around the complex, a single man took a tiny blade and appeared to have beganb the process of peeling off his forehead.

'I see there's the sign.'

'Is there?'

'There is, which means I was right about everything and everything checks out. And if I'm right about it as well, that means it can't be helped. We're all marked for the butcher, who shall come and cut us into tiny slithery, smiley slices.'

Not a single one to feel the pain of the mad orgy of machines which could in turn make them worth less. And they could be heated unless someone could impress the fish that appeared. He who had an eye and a crown around his body, called Feis, the god of lustful sirens. He who defeated the gorgons and turned them into a breeding stock for his children to be brought forth, it was in his image and only in his image that they would somehow be allow to swerve.

But as soon as one of the foreheads had been revealed, it was way too clear what was about to happen. It came to him, but never look, that one of the pints of metal would show some signs of the recluse. 'Name and assignment.'

A quick break could say a lot about what was being expected out of him. There was only on entry which seemed to even resemble it and it would go away in a matter of a few seconds.

The booth was open. It was May.

'Astor, historian, I don't need to present myself any longer, I think I'm well known.'

For what was worth, that was it, only one way to go after clicking in his neck.

Another mark, missremembering past events, just like they happened. Or at least that seemed to be evenly spread amongst them, all three Astors. They went in.

Forming a squad inside the circle, it was all even. It wasn't like them, not there, to make a call on it; no shots were taken in the room despite there being the strange discoloration which haunted every mannequin-bottle. They were too docile then. Bottles spread, all of them making the floor, moving slightly small arms without being able to breed the cannines, some of which followed, trying to force them to hang themselves. So far so good, not a single man managed to get a word in.

There was a single window which appeared to make it seem like there was a canyon-like distance, just like in a peculiarly unclear warehouse. Fewer mad tricksters appeared to inhabit the place. They were wrong, spaced away from one another, growing and shrinking as they began the transition into hard inanimate objects. Mostly it came out with their limbs.

The historians started recording. It was dangerous to do it for too long, it couldn't be pointed at and spoken out loud, they could be observed. Soon enough, they had been blunted around the heads, long while, spared in the fire reds pantry that appeared to have been dragged through the wall. The mere force was somewhat unfathomable, unconquered, too hard to be taken. A strike, a blunt prowess had destroyed everything around it. Then they started touching their long arms, which started expanding in the after-effect of a footage in which a weird boomerang had been thrown and waited. Below their waists, the platform-like floor started going down, roughly a few meters, in whichever wild direction they could stand. They burned in quiet, but only below, where the other bodies waited for them.

From inside the blood-pantry, this old century relic, a weird light appeared, which manifested in the form of many arms and barely deformed lookers who couldn't help it any longer but flap their peculiarly long arms, in order to stretch and reach for anything they could grasp with. A flattering shot of many peeling scents came from inside of them. Neither of the limbs were human and appeared to have revealed their strangely gigantic size.

From where the historians stood, they could see what went wrong. And they went strongly in the growth of their long limbs, trying to fiercely fight through the access of the solid disease which granted them the other life. Inside of them long tunnels emerged, almost breaking the arms completely, trying to feed their smaller scents, which themselves gave life to other unimaginable ends which appeared to store enough meat for others to leap in and store their lives inside of. Dreadful as they looked, they gave in nothing, no sparing meat mass and they couldn't breed themselves past over the noon.

One of the arms extended through the weird canyon and appeared to make a simple invitation. One of the historians leaped in and went ahead. The insides were a weird blueish-green which appeared to be completely drowned by a magents, in the innards of which there were yellowish dots that hard red dots inside of them. But those red dots sometimes appeared to draw in more colors, purple in red circles, large strips of teal which were contoured with black rims. Creeping through them, there rose the highly elastic, long and torn, tumbling cones, all of which were purplish-red and orange, with the exceptions of their largely enigmatic peculiar tips that were in reality colored like clots of blood.

Inside of them, the little men made up their homes, they were exposed now. No head, but strangely long rimmed limbs that extended in the back and added to a supremely convulted sea of mass which combined the entirety of what would have to be billions of them. All in red circles which appeared to expand and form smaller rooms, which was where the Historian went, out of his desire to go ahead and search for something he could possibly do. It was a haze of colors he wanted to deal with. He missed those shades, all of which added to themselves, never to remain in part. Dreadful, dreadful, never caught inside the clocks that pointed at each eye, there were no hours, only blinks when they stopped.

‘I see where you want me to be.’

It was a simple living, at least one which only lasted for as long as he could help it. And floating demigods appeared from the sky. All of them were taintedly stricken as they powered themselves. Each of them came in pairs, otherwise they couldn’t remain alive, nor could they live for long. Because at their backs, there were hardened disease-like tiny humanoids which had encircled one another like weird towers which reflected one another, bred inside of each other, pushed in and grew. And they exchanged a weirdly strange life, which could only creep in one every three years, as strange as it were. A good reason for him to wait and witness it happening again, as he couldn’t help it any longer, out of the whole excitement, he had chosen to look.

Inadvertently, he had sought this entry and wanted to leap in. He had desired it so much that he couldn’t help it any longer. Eventually the bodies finally began lighting and spreading a surreal reverted light, a UV maker that marked everything in the dark even though the walls weren’t real. They appeared out of nowhere and asked for nothing akin to no distress. They themselves made the walls appear, leaving the imprints of the gods on them. Some looked human, or humanoid, though their shapes differed, yet they floated and appeared to sing, out of the gut fates, which were represented by eight distinctly shaped faces which couldn’t help themselves but sing as they came near.

Soon they spat the guts out, it couldn’t be believed.

But the Historian approached, even though he was still, somehow below them, and appeared to taint himself in this strange-rain, pained that he had given up his legs, since the heaviness of the guts was unfathomably unpenetrable. He wanted to be there, he wanted to be one of them but it was impossible. Everything moved so far and soon enough a chamber had been brought, vaporising in the air, but everything else remained. In that room, whatever it had been, out of the shards that came out, there was some steel which melted into a small plant that started pushing out pulp-like large gagrenous rabbits, all of which started puking out perfect recreations of Renaissance paintings. But they were wrong, done in a peculiarly surreal style. Strange as it were, this was too hard to conceive. No fun but all the quiet allowed him to consider ending his life just then and there, anywhere would do as long as he saw it fit, thence the rocking and the cradling in the spot.

He wondered what could come for him and who wanted to make him happy. The Historian acted like a child who saw flashing images that appeared to cross his eyes and never move from one spot to another, his brother of emotions talking through his head.

‘What do you want to do now?’

‘I want to be one of them.’

‘But you know that cannot happen, you know it to be true. Would I lie to you, dear brother?’

‘Lower one of the bars and enter it now, you shall see the entry into one of the lower regions where we shall placate the lower gods and the lower exterminities which shall become their guts. As you shall see, they are separated in two distinct regions that shall live around and swallow one another into wretched disgusting body-trenches.’

A pair of stairs was made out of the swollen body of a man-square, from which the innards appeared to be razor-sharp thin and thinning as they pointed in the right direction. As soon as it appeared, he made for a gate, leaving some entry to be taken as soon as they could direct themselves, properly in no direction.

There was no way to fight through it. Harder as it had gotten for him to walk, he could see the cause. The Historian started pinning down as many detail as he could, not matter how far he went, there were things he shouldn't have looked for, seen for what they were. Dreadfully in staring, mazes, all of which were under-way, inside the creatures carrying them, flat and fat around the edges. Colored in howlites and hematites, pushing out their stone-digust, neither of them could shatter each other, as they would reveal much, inside of them they strung the many despots who came after that. It was way too difficult to fight it yonder.

He emerged and pushed out, readying himself to ask. The square-like flatness took in the surrounding, at least a quarter of the ground, through which fell the maze-stoned creatures as they broke each other ever after in the den blow their chamber. Thence he was offered the chance to become an inverted tower, least of all, could he become some more, into the strange horizon, blasting himself in the darkness above.

Call-back, to a navigational era, that was what drove him to document it solidly. A few meters off the chart, it all went around into all the wild surroundings that had lain between the floating point inside one of the large hands, through the cones, inside them and below, where they lay in quiet.

That's the main spot where the creation of the gods had taken place. Guts were being torn and appeared to be entirely recreated out of nothing in a matter of seconds. And they floated, adamantly set in weirdly sharpened trumpet-like cutters which had razor-sharp grates in every side, crossed with the only reason for them being there being that of the meal which was being served. Most of the weird guts came out of the servants and the hill-like intrusions that came after, which was never the intention to begin with. It was damaging trying to make a point out of the matter. It spilled out like a river, out of the strange machine which was completely made out of some electrical set cartilage or some unnatural kind of bone-fed eater that was present there. During the longest hour, he had witnessed and noticed them be created, from below, the point where he stood, he could see it all be created, like a beacon that began, never stopping and prodding through.

Nothing could explain the peculiarness which was shared between these makers, who, they themselves appeared to be invisible demigods, which held more power than the twin gods themselves, given by some kind of weird hybridisation which occurred unnaturally so. Because of their fierceness, some bold blood-body, stricken down around the heads could be seen. This deformation of humanity was a defect. It appeared as a simple result of the failure which had been set to bond the peculiar forms that floated in it before the time was done. The process being incomplete, the weird towers which would be inserted in the back of the gods, these peculiar access points which would make them immortal to begin with were destined for some kind of failure, out of the very fact that they attempted to do too much. The long piles desired to become deities of their own, but they couldn't govern over themselves because they were made out of some unnatural home for all the viruses, infections and parasites to lay in, which was the secret of their mad immortality, this immortality was granted out of a degeneracy of the supreme kind. And they themselves couldn't help it but stay there, floating forever, doing nothing.

A period of decadance granted them nothing more than the respite in which they stood. And it was more tainted than it had been before. For what appeared to creep in was the false air which made them even more decadent, as they spread their lungs out of their chests, which floated like weird kites for the longest period of time known to any age until the very point where they began glowing. Electrons and atoms were being drawn in. It simply couldn't be helped any longer out of the very fact that they ate. And ate they had, now that was being pointed out by the Historian in his notes.

For the first time in eons, he had observed these gods finally employ their divine power which had been set towards creating lesser beings that were needed in order to feed even the most notoriously encased creatures, but plain as it was, they saw it fit to no reason to share it with any other creature, keeping the meat and what they created only for themselves, during a time of which they had started making the weird, flat in appearance, but actually fattened bodies upon which they projected their rage and quietness. Because sound was somewhat flat in those parts.

Various stones had been carved out of it, in the long spine-needle like shouts that started forming the wild surroundings, rabid as they were, upon them stood marionette-like demonical figures who resembled mad fetuses who, they themselves bore large horn-like mechanical protrusion in large 'L' shapes that could only curve so far as to become large tri-dimensional question marks which dripped constantly with some wild other-worldly being which had been their slaves.

It was almost automated, even the peculiar function through which he began trying to document everything, as the Historian realised that his own problem. He was stricken down and appeared to worship all of them, despite the peculiar conundrum he was in, this couldn't be helped any longer, the damage had already been done to his mind. He was worshipping the wrong gods. And they whirled in without giving him a chance to explain his point or why he was there.

What had happened then? It was clear that he was in too much pain out of the fact that he had no paper to write on, nor pens of ink, but he had used his nails and the soles of his own skin in order to write and pin everything down. It was hardening, an approach towards the point where he couldn't take it. Seeing the sky colored in the colors of the Moon, he erupted as soon as he had been blown apart. It was already decided now.

Half of the Historian would become a god, while the other half would become one of the line-guts which granted them the immortality and the immortality they were famed for. It was disgusting, disturbing and neither of them could look back on it. Those other Historians, the two of them were present as well. They had been brought in despite their apparent protests and it couldn't be believed any longer that they'd be tortured for it. Neither of them had been granted immortality, but instead, appeared to be completely set on trying to speak to the pantry, in which the proto-organs had been stored, ships that were meant to be used in order to facilitate the movement through the spaces in a much easier manner. Though it would be much harder to dwell upon now, after the fact that they had been beaten, turned into head-mutts as they had been infested by sub-human dark-DNA components which in turn made their bodies start convulsing as they started eating and feeding the prime-bulbs, which appeared out of the weird sewage-like plants, from which all of the heat was coming out of. It was plain and obvious, they were taken as fools. Sooner or later they would've figured it out, but now they came and never went to the strange servants as they passed inside, through the mask that formed out of the blurring sight.

As a mist that enfolded the place, the two Historians which hadn't been granted god-hood moved through the mouth of the mask like weirdly encased cockroach-bullet bodies, which had their weirdly spindly legs before large antennas which were picking up the signals of other worlds, tainting their minds until they had become completely incapable of speaking normally or out of place. And once it happened, one of the blood-machines appeared on the left, floating in the air.

It was shaped like a strangely elongated cubical prism which was curved and set, inside of it, this large coffin, there was one hand which could be seen as if hanging outside. Bloody corpses, that's what they kept inside. An opposite function to that of a fridge started heating them even more, as the moving furnaces pushed out blood, which had not only flown out but it couldn't resist feeding the small pointers, the other-infants.

All of whom were mostly inflated and kept in quiet. Drinking from musky broken bottles, through which their faces contorted, moving, shooting out of as the shards cut their skulls out, driving them to spread like roots, from each slice of an angle coming, large eye-like buffoon small plump lumped watchers, who spoke their own languages, and ate the little organ-atoms in the air. Each of them was talking gibberish.

Most importantly, the neo-cortex and the prefrontal part of the brain had been completely spread between them, as the wool-like look distracted from the vein-like wiring which granted them sentience. And most of the bottles kept the bodies in place. Long trunks had been planeted in this weird garden, which surrounded the main tunnel in which the Historian cockroach bullet had been sent through. They took a single moment to speak to them. It was hardening, the mad, they spoke in tongues which had to be pinned down, even if it was weird and painful. And even if the cockroach limbs were unfit to write with, they had dawned on themselves, unable to do anything else and obeyed. It went through their heads like shocks of quiet filth.

They wrote down and pinned madly the words of songs.

Now each of the lumps came closer as the bullet-bodies stopped. A familiar language could be heard.

'Why did you come here?'

'I for one wanted to learn and to document the passing of the world. Is there no better thing for a man to hope to accomplish?'

'Nay, for that is an affront to man.

You were not made for it and you shall only suffer if you come forth.'

Farther away, they could both see and seal the deal, as to reveal that there was no way out. At least not through the same way, back through the furnace, living flames would spread the skin and soon enough even the garden would be covered by a type of scum-flowers that would grow inside every possible spot. Who could deal with the disease and the parasites then? None might be able to do it, as a matter of fact they would be plain in the head, uncannily defeated.

'Mourning for something?'

‘Only our dead brother, though I fear that he might live. And we can only assume that living here is a fate that’s much worse than any kind of living on earth.’

But what had happened there? There was no saying and there was no way he could remember. He, the Second Historian had been born out of a lost moon in a day and age which largely predated humanity in the time through which they lived in fear, with primitive tools, the advent which would tear the world, humanity foretold. Of a time when everyone would try to recreate them, out of labs, mad they called them, but it could be done.

One moment was taken out.

‘Aspect of deformed history.’

They were in largely deformed long halls of broken mirrors which had been crystallized in shape. No sizable records could be taken from him. Shorter tunnel in, surprising through the glass, it would be even harder to notice once you realized that everything was wrongfully placed.

It was dug in, but at the end of it there was a ladder which came to the upper level. Bomb shells could’ve dropped at any moment, if it weren’t for it.

‘Then came the red, and everything was taken away.’

‘Yes, but when did it happen and how?’

Another one of the Historians came to the same conclusion, coincidence. What a sad turn of events he found himself staring at. Weirdly pronounced as well, a few flat fake-suns appeared everywhere around. By now the engagement had been set.

Keyringer couldn’t see himself with anyone else but Christine. She was his one and only, taken for granted, just any man would. The virulent visuals did not add up. But he concluded he would walk on peg legs all the way back.

They were torn in-between his skin and that distant part which carried through him. In the midst of the making, plain bottom floor being lowered by approximately twenty centimeters in the same way the cartilage of a bone would when momentarily reattached, in the right moment before it hit the spot. That’s how the tunnel aligned in front of them.

He spoke so matter of factly during the issue. It was no wonder that he lost his wits. Better to be twisted in the central nervous system like he was, tainted, elated by something not even he could explain.

There was a need to disembowel the reeds. It reeked, the place had nothing to do with its wild surroundings. The deactivation continued as planned. While some of them had failed to realise it just then, a certain side of one of the panels flew off, like a tiny piece of cloth eaten by a moth. No flame lay around him.

Ringer got used to this kind of quiet.

Regardless of who was around him, he only seemed to wonder or want for more, but that never came by itself. Strange, no matter how many times he found himself surrounded by someone, it only seemed like he felt lonelier. For no other reason either. It was a hard time to be in his skin, especially since no one wanted to approach him.

This time around, no more emotion, he thought. I will be crueler than usual, second thought. It appeared like it could almost come naturally to him, even though everything else pointed in a different dimension. He would be frustrated from all that waiting and staring at dead corners. But there was no way to count the tiles off the door. One that would be open as well, with him all alone, this time he wasn't accompanied by the Foreman, nor by Christine, he was all alone. It was a dreadful time no man could count on. It was pitiful waiting, less so to wait for no one, none might come around. He wouldn't be forced them otherwise, but he had to see for himself. Just what were the degenerates trying to do in his absence? What were they trying to achieve there?

It felt like he had been a two-time lousy inspector, with nothing else crossing his mind. He looked much stronger than usual. But nothing could make him even get close to it, for obvious reasons. This was something he couldn't have been prepared for. And no amount of coping would help his head stay still. Thence the coming and the stray, he checked his arm. No sign of any alteration having happened on the ink, he would still be there. It was a memory after all, which only went so far.

But he had looked for a way out, though there wasn't any door no longer, only an enclosure from which not even he could carry the mission he had come with.

Two twin gods, same amount of things in their backs, with one perceived distinction between the two of them. Or to say the least, between all of them, the difference being that they were connected by some weird amount of wire, which could only come so far between them. It was what powered them and what made them work. It kept both of them alive and going, walking, trying to strike at empty stalks. Nothing could've prepared him for them talking. But they had no mouths, no eyes, features being buried there, he had been wrong about them. Whatever kind of humanity they had, if they ever were human was in there. Twisted, erected, set to go against the skies that weren't there either. Nothing could be drawn from it, only the fact that he was in danger.

'You won't make it if you keep walking this way.'

'I think I will. What are you waiting for?'

'We weren't planning on killing you. If that were the case, we wouldn't have given you the time.'

'Then torture?'

There was no key point when they could've done it. He didn't think. It was the fight or flight reaction which set him there, meeting the dead end. Before he turned, it was too late, he was being touched around his hairline, caressed, tried for, until he had managed to impress both of them.

'You will do, return there and kill the Foreman.'

'Why must I do it?'

'Because we told you to do so, unless you haven't realised it, you don't have much of a choice in the matter. We're your better and you shall do as we say.'

It was clear enough that he would have to do it. Since he hadn't any choice, he relented.

First he was forced to talk to her. For obvious reasons he couldn't tell her of the encounter. It was plain, it was a secret, though he doubted that he'd die, if he were to meet her brother. Somehow he knew it, that would be done with, dealt along the way, never to be met face to face around the quick embraces. Something happened. Everything looked wrong.

From the normal objects which appeared, the desks, the lamps, the sofa and the beds, all of which extended the tunnels into something of a long dormitory, this would be it. Large grated caps which appeared to cover something in the wall. Colors appeared everywhere, from a putrid green, to a French yellow, or some opaque-looking wall through which some muddy water flowed. A rain could be seen but it was too human like in nature, as each drop held the reflection of a giant face, or a giant man, or the look-a-like of some flattened heart which moved on its own, in the coming of the boiling.

Some acrid gas started the post-breaking, breaking it in part, water became solid, the remark would come to be completely muffled. Each piece, in part or what it tried imitating looked like some wild attempt to grow, like plants out of dirt. They were human, in every manifestation, dreadfully staring out.

Various walls were patterned in the forms of wild-dancing paintings and ghastly creatures which were slowly being driven out. Some of them dipped, but their teeth grimaced as their boreal horns shot along the way. Both Christine and Ringer stopped once the bars appeared and blocked their way. It was a hard pass. There was a grand emission on the grand.

'You realise that on the only schedule, today we would celebrate the day of Saturn, right?'

'I guess they don't tell you that anymore, do they?'

Whom?

It was almost automatic as this point. Both the conversation and the other thing, but they came in bits. She was way too joyful for this world. It came to him only now that he had no direction any longer, too many were watching. Flat, off the wall, elated like any reflection would be during a time like that, when the dirt would turn to some kind of illness, but that couldn't be said or revealed too quickly now. End of the road.

'I see that there's something I should've told you.'

'You should've told me about this sooner.'

There was nothing which would even come close to it. A hardening of the closest star, a visor being broken as they raced between the tracks. It was even. Uneventful, but at least it was a fair-match, placed between the two cars, both of them being stricken by the fact that their insides were altered as to become something closer to the one that was watching, which only said more about him, the referee than anyone else who was slandering the bets.

It came not too soon, not too cruel, not even there. But it cut like a tiny saw, which spread in eight parts, neither of them being stretched, or pushed out of their heads. Some of the vehicles were in the back, forged out of auster, some kind of Gulf-like device being strapped in the back.

‘This is the second victim.’

‘But he was never alive to begin with, it was only one of the frozen specimens.’

That was only part of it. They couldn’t detect with what went on through the dent. It was something they couldn’t prepare for.

‘Spoken exactly like one of the supervisors would.’

‘Perhaps that’s what we’ve been missing.’

It was another day through they would face it. An end to no emotion, the prowess of trying it out, but they couldn’t believe how many fine specimens were around them, all of which were too frozen, part of the mind, lying awake.

‘I see we need another take.’

‘Take a bite out of the specimen, tell me what he looks like.’

‘A bunch of humanaoid heads stuck together, yet I know their bodies are all time in the underworld.’

‘That’s why they call them specimens you know, they’re the ones who are mostly heavenly touched, and we can count on them to try it again.’

Pas the scripture, then the taking, another one would melt away. Soon they moved and crawled away, only to open twenty feet into the right direction, next to the heater as they revealed quickly they could simply evolve. It was only a matter of time, wantly pushed through and protruding, out of the mind, loathing to be there. Without a way to kill the plain, the reins of the quiet beasts would only pushed out of it.

One of the wilder ones appeared. It was a Chiruek, from the looks of which, it looked like the reverse bodies of four cradles kangaroos, all of whom kept all the fat in the front, leading to a single ball, which only started growing in fat. From the spehre it was, a plain funnel could be seen eruptting. Through it, all the unfrozen specimens would be submerged, as anyone could plainly see the digesting liquid being revealed out of it, then eaten. As quickly as they came back to life, their lives would end, they’d never see the light coming out the tunnel.

Another ship emerged in the back. The general of defense and the twenty other officers followed him. Such was it that the site was already soemwhat tainted and left to rot. Brought to some kind of stop as they couldn’t help it any longer, too many words were not spoken, left to go. Fright couldn’t be seen as long as the superiors were taken for granted.

Officer It. Agrror appeared then. He was twenty-eight feet tall, an elephant tumor of a man if he were to be shaped, erected like a cavalier, drawn for battle, almost in a suit. He came out of nowhere and never close to anyone. They knew how to smell themselves.

‘Is this going to be another one of your lectures? Because I don’t want to stand here, listening to it again. I’ve got other better things to do.’

‘And you shall attend them in time. Until then, sit down like the lapdog you are.’

It was done.

‘This’ all but flashes and smoke that’s all. Nothing of value here.’

‘Drive you mad doesn’t it?’

It’s a dream after all, a vision that shouldn’t amount or count for and to nothin’.

He had to pick his rightful time and see to it he wouldn’t miss. A cold in his hand, the Foreman would be dead. He was still missing.

The joy was over and hence was the break. Spilling outside their needs, they were dead, walking backwardly, but never touching the tips of their heads, cradling over themselves, falling over, bodies burnt. A peculiar smell emerged, the scent of long-gone burnt candles. It was hard felt, the fall had to come sooner or later.

He considered just how he could deal with him in the easiest manner, without breaking too strange a sweat. How carefully would he lower the cold, where to aim and there to bring it to a stop. The ace of spades was his eyes. From the angle he pulled that blackened mark which spanned across his eyebrow, cheek and a part of his nose, pulling it out and throwing it away.

‘The man with an empty gap on his face.’

It should go smoothly from this point on.

Large grin on his face, the man was so soft-spoken. He walked in the flashlight repertoire, large bandana over his forehead and knuckles, spread across before tying it.

Tying the knot, it should go as well as sitting.

Of course this was a small detail which shouldn’t matter, but he pulled out a chain from inside the gap left instead of his eye. Another eye came out, but without the preceding skin. A small humanoid ace of spades came out, growing slowly as he pulled out the long eye-tunneling bow, still holding onto it after pulling everyone else with him. They were trying to cover up for the fact that it was only a play of mirrors and he was no man with an open gashing piece of face.

He was a tall reflection, which couldn’t have boded well because of his similarities to the bonfire creature which lain the back. It crackled with laughter as they revealed just how peculiar their jest was and how they tricked the stranger in part. Ringer looked out of the corner of his eye, watching how they resolved their dispute. It was a pleasure he hadn’t met before, not in this state, never again taken by the soles of his feet or elated.

There was nothing purer in the world than solving your problems with as much violence as you could put in. Before the trick of mirror could reveal itself, they stopped pounding the floor and the instigators which belonged to a fraction of a wild group cathered to them no longer. One of the men in the blinds came closer with a sharp knife and started cutting the face of one of the agitators. Keyringer would definitely remember his face. An ugly man, long face, then snapped completely above the nose upward s he couldn't help it any longer. It pushed through him as he was unable to breathe, the bow key that was launched out of the fake eye ripped off more than half of his face.

Another one of the things he managed to notice was a quick suicide. It was passed like a small bullet through his mouth. Twenty feet away. Ringer lowered his colt. It was pure joy, his eyes were moist and colored. Pink-red, melting out. A scent of a grin. His teeth were almost completely encased in iron. He walked a few steps, while he kept bleeding like a kleptomaniac. Then the mania kicked in and he picked up the bad habit. Hard stuff, pumped in his chest. It would get him a few more seconds alive.

'Hey you, I saw you there.'

During the punch-like bunch trick of bags, they almost came to their senses and looked out for the man who was hanging around the corner. So close, ever so close to being caught.

He smiled, then. Just like he forgot it.

He turned around the corner, only to be met by everyone else who stopped fighting. Even by the dying suicidal man. He smiled, of course.

Shrugged his shoulders, opened his colt, shook it around. No bullet fell.

'Of course I did. I forgot to load it.'

They smiled as well, understanding. Elated, joyful and the bunch. It was as sweet of a scene as they all pointed their small knives, their open bows and their lushful long barrels. He pointed down, almost forgotten. Out of focus, but somehow still smiling. It didn't matter much, since he had almost done it himself.

'Bam.'

Bam, bam, he pointed his finger, his arm, like a gun. Put Filler out of his misery there, out of water, drowned but breathing blood. Everyone in their raincoats moving away from the sight, that still didn't change a thing, definitely not what happened here, it couldn't have gotten him out of the hot water. Nor could he reach her in time.

Christine running around, out of reach; Ivanoe somewhere close. Which left only one man who wasn't there, the man of honor, he of all, never speaking, it was too pure to go untrusted and untouched. He took an aim at his temple and then shot an air bullet which went through his head. In the span of a few seconds, the man was dead. Loftly stranded, like broken statue which had been erected then kicked at the base. A concussion followed but the bullet was still there despite there being a hole through it and the bullet having gone through the other side. As an after effect, the bullet remained, never to be stricken through the twenty-five centimeters which got released into the ground and kept going through it.

Both of them were now dead, gone, with no chance of getting through. Mostly it was their fate which remained vaguely unknown, it couldn't be showed around. Darkly put, in the moisture of the air, tiny petals of metal flakes started appearing, eyelids, giant meridian-like leave-formed, large centurion-like stopped, concave and logn stricken, as peculiar static field which served for nothing other than stoppers. None would pass through, everyone had a fate to share and they couldn't do it in the least, especially in a state they hadn't been dragged and repaired out of. They were then thrown into some underground chasm which had lain beneath him.

But the mid-way through which lead to the chasm looked too deformed, like pipe-syndroms which were no longer cylindrical but flatonoid, like strange air-shafts which had clearly been modified by the strong gusts of smoke which threw it all out of place. A faceless wonder collected those who were too weak to make the journey down. Whether or not they were alive or already gone didn't make any difference whatsoever. It was only granted that some would return, but not for long. For, the deeper one went, the easier it had become to understand the sight.

As the first batch arrived, they noticed the most peculiar thing someone could glance upon. A volley of string, a well made ring in which they fought. A man was made out of star constellation, a transparent void, a universe or something similar to it. But at his back, there was the device which created that illusion. Animal-like brains had been placed in it, but they had completely evolved after years of intense power. A might had towered their barely formed bodies, as they started pushing out. Smelling prudish towers shot everywhere but made no sound whatsoever as the hole which allowed them to think drew in too many of the negro-skins which had been made into carpets.

'Dirty, dirty carpets, I sometimes wish they started skinning them alive, then burn them into the great devouring fires that come from the sky.'

It was a flat outdoor above them. Of course there was no reason nor any explanation for this happening, but the weird creature which spoke appeared to be the only one. And another contender joined the ring. Jointed all around his body, first segment had two heads. Only three long mandible-enchanted limbs, out of which no legs. From the second segment, a higher one, an upper-trunk which seemed welded on top. Crude rounded rain-catchers, strange funnels came out of it, all of which carried intricate designs, prideful as they started glancing, dancing around the bloated mass that started creeping in through the siren dance.

Another match started, first fists emerged at last. Breaking through the glass was easily pinned out of the fact that he could do nothing to stop this unfairly matched beast.

Crowd cheered immediately as they didn't care as much about the stakes, but more so to see someone suffer and they would get what has been paid for. Neither one was quickly determined, nor would they lay up front.

'We cannot measure the size of the strike, if we were able, there would be.'

'Something's someone.'

A great rhinoceros ganglion, shape like four of them from every front angle, spread like the wings of a beetle as the many body form came from behind. Out of his head, two horned dead men came out of stalks. They were carried forth to attend the match. Everyone else got out of the way, unable to make out what the smoke-machine softneed inside of it. A pair of locust people with long heads, through which there opened a few holes to reveal that exactly twenty limbs which had been shaped like eight-hundred or fifty million tiny locust swarming, wing extending, spiked drones got shaped together into those long grapplers. It wouldn't do to look after them since the giant locust-heads were fakes. Inside of them there lay some peculiarly shaped domes that started evolving into prism-beetle extended spiral-eaters all equipped with many toothed crowns which had been incompletely and appeared to continue like lines one very possible surface that appeared on the strangely formed head.

A pair of eight great eyes emerged from inside of it, but they could not be seen. Their main central cortex was indestructible, as was the strange head, hidden inside of the body dye they had stolen and despite the fact that they were slowly melted, those floating strange main units of their minds would still survive. Not only so, but they slowly calculated their escape in order to avoid having to pay for the lost matches.

Some of them had been worked on and that couldn't be believed. A pay here, a paint there, but the strange thing was that a painted knee almost always broke down under stress. It felt as if the dye itself had rotten the dead into an even more deadlier state than it could've been driven in. A mad man sang, he lost about a gallon of his prison-like mind.

Then the crowd cheered again. Another blunt strike coming from the giant contender with its three jointed arms, instead, there would be no fighting, as this was nothing more but an one-sided fight which carried on despite some rules of conduct being beaten in, rightfully, yet dully noted, through his skull and into that position which made him mourn himself as the illusion of that grand universe spilled itself out.

'Bad form, torn around the sides.'

Barely kicking, he wasn't going to make it. At a certain cretaceous period of time, where the primordial forms of the ancestral creatures upon which the creature itself seemed to have been. They were destined to thin the herds. Dully well. They paved the walls instead with colors. It wasn't dark after a while out of the very fact that a wild essence of light-covered large string-like spiked patterns came and managed to leave nothing but the entrance into their light realm. Mostly it was the pocket which poured in, prying through the gates, and the brats and the cats of pure divine light which came out running. Poached around their skinless legs, they came out to reveal that damning evidence of their mad lacerations, they were destined to eat each other when they stopped moving, though that's what kept them moving time after time again. News came out of their wild light realm, it couldn't be denied that they were of a different breed which kept of spreading through the roof tiles.

But they attended the match in quiet respiration. Damned they be if it wasn't that way. With every beat of a second they wondered, wandering about the placed, coloring the walls into various shades of morose colors which weren't meant to live that way, most of the colored strips being very much alive and damning, touched by hands that couldn't be helped. In the gust of the taking, there were vapors that started creeping out. From stone, about the place the holes revealed the drums of warring cherubs that crept out of the walls. Most of them had been disgusted, by the peculiarness of the light. With their slumber having ended, they couldn't fathom holding out.

'What is the meaning of this insolence? And who may shatter bells of bronze?'

For, in the back they kept on holding, never finding who came home. Stricken by the fact, pushed around in their disturbing casts, it couldn't be handled any longer, their bronze prisons being shattered momentarily by a string of pain. It could be seen in the air, as hate itself manifested in some insolently colored red. Like a red disease, a gas which spread and pushed out of the peace and quiet that came out, they laughed. About eighteen hours, dreadfully they pushed out, wreathing in pain, a distress of disease. They came out to laugh and wonder. Never sinking who came after. A prism of disease, it couldn't be primed for the coming of an ending writhing worm of bronze that came out of the cherub who lain in front. He had managed to pull a gut-blade, a sharp sword-like device which, at its end had a pair of curved ruby-shaped holes from which power-bolts could be thrown about. As rudy as this creature was, pale at the face, but crying blood, from its guts came all the bolts that would be needed.

A pair of wings appeared to infect it as they spread. But they were not shaped like wings of birds, not to prey on them, but to call it as it were, those largely enigmatic shapes were unfit for flight, crafted in a delightful block of barrel-like shots, which only came about to form the symbol of a jolly roger-like skull and bones when put together. Never touched. Lesser faces fell inside of it, but that couldn't be seen.

Another blow to the head inside the ring, which stretched at the back of the device until it couldn't wreath any longer and it passed by. Then they started flying through, the blows coming after the sinew started spilling out, crying over in flight of pus-roses and morbid cretins who cheered on. No one appeared to be bothered by what was going on.

Then, after taking a few steps back, the competitor, segmented in two pushed itself on a single arm, then wailed both of his leg-arms as hard as he could, completely shattering the device in the back, letting the priemeval animals wreath in pain and disturbing disgust as they fell from place. Never to face and kind of lesser embrace of painful ambience, falling from the spot, that kind of thing would ruin someone in their heads.

'Blasted thing, I seem to be at a loss for a clock.'

A disaster in the making, or so it seemed, rather than being brought back into action, they started laughing and lauding the creature for having exterminated such an inferior specimen, the lowest of denominators, the dreadful being brought instead. Aid was being brought from the diving sight, it couldn't be brought into the blinds. Whichever fell, then came the time after.

'I shall cut him if I have to.'

The conteder cried to the crowd.

As soon as he'd done it, everyone started running out of their way to place their orders, dead he'd be along the way. There could be no other deal, making.

'Cut and make him suffer as he dies.'

'Make sure you carve your name into the metal surrounding case that's behind the wirery foam he started drawing out.'

'And who are you?'

A strange man as the two segmented bodies, with all the three heads realign in unison:

'Baskon, that's what we're named. No place your deals and make sure there's enough to pay us in full.'

It couldn't be dealt with, the strange distillation, crevice of the broken. Unready, unworthy, worthless scum-towns moving through, but only their rooftops could be seen as they phased through the floor, getting access into the outdoors where they placed their never-dances, trances out of flint.

Blank state in his mind. There wasn't any explanation any longer, nor was there a chance to come back to home if he had wanted to.

It was the solid static, blocking the right way out. And the man known as Key had already lost Christine. He was present at the scene, unable to understand what happened, or how he missed it. He failed to protect her.

A whistle came out with each step along the way, a barbarity of a kind that's never been touched on before, soon to go; walking around the plain-stretches, in the taking, in the making, her head no longer waned on top of her shoulders. Caught of guard, she was entranced by the solid images she could see. A light-like camera projected nothing but the stop. Long distanced, underground tramp, from the looks of which, filled to the brims with hundreds of people everywhere around.

A large man was seen, he looked like a hick, with his brimmed black coats which were placed on top of one another. He should've been any damned bum in the lot, if it weren't for the two springing things in his back which protruded out of him like a pair of wings. They were two peccary mandibles, which looked vaguely deformed but made of metal. It gave the man a feeling of angst which could be seen in everyone who dared look at him. A reflection of himself in every watcher, he couldn't recognise their face. Strangely he only saw his, which only made him even more nervous and even more paranoid than he should've been.

But he was alone and no one did a thing to stop him.

Next station, too quick a stop.

Someone came in, out of a completely covered army uniform, or something taken out from the previous century there was this.

'Finally found you.'

He said as he turned his flame-thrower towards the man. But there were not flames coming out, only some peculiars puerile bullet which appeared to have shot from every possible direction. Behind him, from inside the giant barrels, perhaps thousands or even billions of them inside.

Abel barely got out of the way. The nearest men that remained in their seats bursted out of in a fine splatter which painted the windows. One hand leaped out. He caught it in time before his legs almost gave in.

The arm was still attached, bloodied. The man allowed some time for Abel to get back on his feet and figure out what was going on. Something was written on the palm. General direction before it ended up leading to a small line which told him to run.

He did, but not by his choice. It was that thing on his back, constantly pumping until it couldn't help itself. Those things on his back acted on their own, dragging him as far away as they could as soon as they sensed the danger coming his way. One started shaking, then the other, drawing back, farther against this back until they had been leveled there, then they almost snapped shut like a bear trap, before finally inserting themselves in the upper side of the tramp, the teeth-like cones eating what they could before pushing out.

‘Run boy, run as fast as you can and don’t you ever look back if you want to live!’

It barked as it reloaded. This was a death trap everyone was caught in; doors closed, no clear escape. Failures in movement pushed out. An automatic voice appeared as soon as they could get it in. Dreadful though be if he couldn’t keep up with him regardless of the issues that appeared out of nowhere, like thought devices, but solid, all of which turned and twisted just about everything around the place, until they could be irradiated no longer. Madly the voice sprang and made everyone inside the tram reach beneath the seat caskets in order to pull and drag their gas-masks on. Vapors started pushing in, never ending and imploding their blood-letting as they started degenerating again. Degraded he looked around.

Abel saw no end to the tram, it wasn’t straight, like some flat tube, it was pointed in eighteen directions, all of which started splitting him apart despite him trying his best to avoid it. After clearly looking in front of him, he realised he had looked in every possible direction he ever could’ve looked into. He was here and there and everywhere, distracted. But most of them died because of that, without having to come to it, that came too quickly. Live a wave of hunters who couldn’t help themselves but eradicate as many men as they could. As many Abels as they might.

He was all alone after. They weren’t there to kill him, the last one, though most people survived; him being nothing else but a quick witted elation, safe on his own feet, walking, walking.

Took him a while to get from one point to another, that came so close, so far as to go in whichever direction, he simply lay on his back. The solid adaptation almost converted itself into a small bed before it put itself back into place, spreading into whichever was closer or much plainer to see. Lost to touch, looming around, unsure. Another man started following him. It was hard on the kness, but he had made it. Both of them, if not everyone survived the vapors of gas that had come in. Perhaps it ought to have been all to clear that there was almost no chance he might’ve survived if it weren’t for the slight chance he took and used those black canines to pierce his lungs. They managed to filter the bad air out, then he stopped the bleeding just in time to make it through.

It went over him, now seated in an empty spot he made by simply twisting his back backwardly, allowing it to puncture it.

There was only so much to do in that short a time. Destined around the crowd-corners, he pettied the ground by being there. He was blinded, all of them were, despite being ready to turn the entirety of the tram in a blood-water bottle.

A few lines, long, extremely long, spanning a few lines, as thick as cords appeared to be stored inside Abel’s large metallic jaws, though he never revealed them outrightly.

It was a quick sign of dependency which never went away. He came out open handed but avoided Abel despite him having shown himself the way he was.

It bilbed the tool. Moved on from each corner of the eye, unable to establish any kind of wild contact, then the rosy cheeks started talking about the most mundane interactions with the mudd-people, those who had been completely beaten and made to look after the false children of the forest. Gaunty-looking they were steel, the lust of mind ended. As his libdo dropped, he finally saw something others could not.

Of course he'd been just as wrong as he had been at any time, trying to falsify his thoughts, wondering what others couldn't, not speaking when asked for, trembling as he came to his senses, at the sight of the uncanny. A valley-like open space, with small enclosures, from which most of the windows having become doors were presented to him; that alone couldn't be believed at all. For this sight depended on one and only one detail. All the sides of the tram being welded together, despite the fact that they were all set in motion, going into infinite directions, then having dropped a few meters out of sight, in the distance where the valley dropped. They acted like stairs, or walked on strange encasings. Dreadfully stopping sometimes but that couldn't be seen out of the fact that within each man, those who were present, some of them forgot to hide. Tall and plastic hands from which only the bloated features, tailed-like smaller pointer extended until they looked like carpets of ants which were carrying large umbilical soft cylinders which opened every fifty centimeters only in part. From the globe-like not so globular shaped anchors, some of the weight was taken off by the half-heads, those who were caught in-between the dead surroundings. Less to them than what could seethe, it couldn't be trapped or laying to breed.

One deformed man asked, he looked too much out of the gate to be taken aback by him, the man hunting.

He knows my name, that was the first distinction, taken by the first rabid mistake.

'Where is Abel?'

'Who?'

Too late, it went too quickly for him to do a thing or even satiate his curiosity and ask. With the sudden turn of the fire-barrel, the poor deformed features popped out as a barrel-full of bullets blew his head. Perhaps close to seven inches in diameter, such bullet would allow none to flee. Not to mention that for some reason they couldn't stop bouncing out of the way as their free-hold gave something to the touch of golden dust which flew out of him. No blood poking out. He had been deceived and tricked into thinking that something was going to happen if he spoke and asked.

Too many of them were around as well, again, moving in too quickly for him to acknowledge or really take in what was happening there. His information was somewhat erroneous, a mistake of the highest caliber. Then one of the doors had been slammed shut. It was impossible to watch or realize what went on, especially since no one could predict the movements of this strange-ship. Going over for reach sight, it couldn't be anything but an unaccountable, for, delight. It rose from each tap on the wall, but it couldn't be observed by anyone unless it showed itself, thrice the size, in boots that appeared to be open mouthed and perplex.

Twenty more men appeared, but they were quickly placed on their spots. If there was one theory he could even come to think of, it was the fact that, so far he had no idea what was going on. No matter what entered his head, it went on to pass around with no replacement. Not a single sight for many, uncannily weary, they seethed in reprise.

But one thing mattered now, they couldn't see who he was, nor could they care about him now. Everyone looked the same as he, even for them, Able was free. As long as he didn't move, even the strange material which had been that immovable object on his back looked like nothing other than the plastic which the others were on. Don't speak, he tried making it seem like he was still in control. As long as he didn't make too much a bother, he could simply stay there for much longer. Less than he would be expected to.

There was a dead lady, a phatom which walked by. No one appeared to make too much of a fuss about her, and yet they couldn't wonder what went wrong.

Lust distracted, it contracted the walls like the cords of the insides of a female, where they all were inside of. For that reason, killing every life inside of it was nothing but the slaughter of the innocents in search for the one who made it through and managed to leave his marks, the canines still going through. Beneath the tram's floor.

The apex of cretins himself, leading in the wrong place, going through one of the wrong rooms as he landed in a lonely station, he couldn't have been at a worst place and time than he was now. Tall, at least seven feet, well built, long haired, but almost crested if it weren't for that terrible blade-like formation of dead hair which had bothered him for too long, leading to a metal case which had been implanted ever since a bomb had dropped on his head.

Railer in hand, aiming at the bottom, forcing himself against one of the Bullet throwers, in his largely darkened jacket, the pythom and the hyena dancing on it, as those drawn pictures only grimaced and made their specific noise. Rock-us almost smiled, revealing a putrified eye-shaped tooth which was completely made out of some unnatural material which shot him in the gums. Something in it made him look aghastly at the defiler, that mad pointer which shaped itself like a curved, almost robust-looking arrow made him feel benign.

He would've beaten his head in if that were the case, but he never bothered to ask what went here and there. Now he was surrounded.

It looked less of a stand-off and more of an execution.

'Mine is sharper.'

'Ours are many, bigger and you might not get to breathe before taking one of your famed shots. I think you're short on it.'

'Try me, old man, just try me.'

They were masked but he could see their damaged eyes for a while, they were almost crossed. And that had been the case for all of the, with none and neither, no direction and no vile connotation to it. It had to go in one or both directions, otherwise, it wouldn't do. So far, as long as they kept silent, none would bother to check them through. First the calming sight, then the mist carried. It was painful, trying to get a word in. But he waited and wouldn't dare come through. One step too many and he would fancy himself being shot. His slurp of agony concealed no pain. He took an indirect shot which only grazed the lower side of his foot, which prompted the immediate bleeding, that giving it away without the friction and the unfathomable urging which came after him as well.

A slight formation of scum-tatter came out of what he managed to bleed on the floor. It was hardening, a he could see it, trying to give birth to itself during the war which happened in his guts, during a time this tram had been a world. Twenty eons ago, when time was flat and undirected, where his mind had been concave, where his lifeless body and mind started to take passes at each act across the livid blue passes, there was the stationary urged, made out of bloated-skin. And they sipped out of one another's simian looking skull, being unable to look at a sight between too many watchers. Primate-like defiers wouldn't know, nor would they be alerted by what was going on. Yet they should've known of the cooling blood, which flooded their nostrils before giving birth to the moulders that came not for them, bores of the camps, in which they tenderly enacted, reticent to the infreaction the bloody-pupiled sub-human premphophiles, all of whom were cut around their heads, in an attempt to reach their empty gods. They couldn't fathom breathing for too long, it couldn't happen, at least not until they were beheaded in their terrestrial forms. For empty hazes, mazes did appear in their hearing devices, where they hid the sappers, way too close to their empty horned brains. Like braizers of the mad. Saddened by the likeness of a forest that became only a new passing god, they looked at their rooted wonders, realising that they would only come to be disgusted by the never ending nature of a decapitator who seemed to dance.

He was there, as a n ancient human who had no neck and instead of the lower side of his body, there was an acrage upon which he spread in all his might and upon which his wickedly vile children appeared to grow wrong. Infested by the slurping disease, they prised themselves with the fashioning of vehicles, upon which they enacted vision of encased demonical figures who grimaced at the coming of a quick end. No one could fend off against them. Not now that they knew that there was a future possibility for their kind to become extinct. No their servants who were made out of some made material which was made out of some unknown melted piece of clam-iron, dissected in the distressed blood of a mouldering scum-throglodyte of the highest kind. There was a flood of thoughts that didn't work properly. Everyone was bleeding in disgust, for no apparent reason.

Most of them, thought it couldn't have been guessed just by looking at them, had been infuriated by something for some reason.

It would be damned if they waited for too long, loitering around as if it didn't matter. Prodding in, then came the loss of a light, it was all planned in their magnificent insolence of dreams, the realm of putrid coithers being placed aside. They would be less than blind, the lesser of the mentally cripple if they were to allow what was going on to get further through.

Their assembly was nothing more but a weird abstraction which fell upon itself when weight was added afterwards. And the reason for it had been just as widely exploited as well out of the fact that there was no way of seeing where this was going or what the reason for so many of them being there might be. Most of humanity had been born in the wrong way at the wrong time, with no connection and no way of knowing what was going on. There was a delightful blister that passed through them, like a disk which sang at the time. Two large edges appeared to be protruding vetrically despire their horizontal direction, which signaled the rising and the fall of the meat-wagon foundry which started spilling out of these saw-like portals which were twisting and turning around. From them, many dumb-founded insuferable creatures started being formed in the most atrocious manner. Despite their trajectory being somewhat less pronounced, there was no way out, no way to return to the old days when they might've been spared out of the trouble of prying through. A sinew-gate appeared as well, out the destined destroyer who suffocated during the formation of the tram. Much of the sight had been completely ripped off out of the mad-socket of the bodies the ancient scepter holders of green hues and the orange dotted flipped ribs that passed through the new sun came to see what happened and what the reason behind this strange adoration which loomed around was. There was no attrition, yet there were a few signs of malnourishment as the gods emerged, no longer bored, unable to procreate, their time's worth. And they had died before the tram could finally be seen as if to finally start on travelling through the access of the one single bowl-crusher. Through the spiked field, where those conical sharpeners started pushing out of them the bodies of the unnatural destroying mush-pieces, all of which had formed the land.

In time most of the surroundings, which looked vaguely humanoid-build had taken form. A farce of sights, the gut was worn. Then came Abel out of the dark. He had waited for too long. He was not ancient, he was not old, he was only a bum with the device of a god. In his back, the many clicking noises made of steel waited. Then he leaped out of his chair, no longer in hiding any more, as well as he had been annoyed, no longer paranoid about what might happen, whatever crossed his mind, to tamper, he crossed his sign and made the due. As he leaped, the incisors flew, inverted, then shoved the rotated piece in the back, with the two pieces of the jaw inside the floor. Stuck there while walking, he saw himself fit to run as see the device stretch. It couldn't even be believed just how far it went, or the bleeding oil which came out of it. Soon enough the demonical figures which had once been hiding in it came out with the faces of lambs. One of them was member of the secret pact, deliverer of the message, which might get one to the liver-kettle in time. Though he was blasted with evil thoughts and the vileness of torture.

He was melodiously enclined, dancing as it to avenge the crossing of the Rhyne, in a moment of fear when none might look ahead, he was the cretin, they were the dead. Still stretching it, they screeched. Some of them began fleeing from sight, as if for some good reason they had come to recognise that there would be pain, if they remained for too long, despair would make them fade away. In the quiet of the watch, during their flight, in disgust; many of them ran through tunnels and those who were made out of the window panels lead to parts of the tram which were made out of glass as well. Even the people who were waiting for their station, on the seats were made of glass as well as they shattered of sight, and made their peace. For they couldn't move and were mere sculptures, their thoughts belonged to the living beings that they were made in the shape of.

Some of those who had been shaped had been out of an infuriating piece of red glass which could do anything but satiate any wonder, lest of all the blessing of a dire disease. Caught by the reeking scent of someone who might end themselves into the dissection, a maddening in no direction; fealty would reel in. They understood as the song passed through the entirety of the tram like a mad echo which couldn't be faulted. No longer caught, there in the distance brought, Rock-us took the chance to move away. Failure had followed their way, as they missed with every shot. More blood sprouted about as everyone in their seats leaped and dangled, out of such a celestial pain that this might as well been a chamber of torture for the breaker of a star.

In this sight, the many blood pieces, those who hardened might've been lost. They swam around empty road and reeded in as water poured out.

'We're about to pass through the underwater passage. Know that it is flooded still.'

As the voice announced, they had been directed, for a good reason as well as it could be felt and dealt with despite their time being dealt with, underneath their seats. From the various knocked-up spots, squared targets came out, revealing the water-breathing devices, those who pumped iron-like boxes of oxygen and those of filthy resin-air. But they would do well to get through it before it kicked through, the adrenaline pushing in, without them giving too much thought.

‘I shall get away.’

‘But I shall not.’

It seemed likely to be continued another man out of the few which had been completely shocked, as they were breathing under the guise of some strange devices which shoved their strange, long reeling rings inside their lungs.

By the time he reached the middle point of the track, he took a break and released his back. Abel could feel the device wreath like some unnatural sharp-scalpel which curved and dangled as it began cutting through everything in sight. It twisted and killed as many by-standers as he would allow it, without any remorse being shared. He looked around, unfairly caked.

Most cases end up with there being nothing to claim. Or to push around until they pushed the tram out of its way and into the side of the complex, breaking through the underwater passage, through its dome, into the water and then. Break-in.

Abel leaped in. He was indisposed, unable to cope with the coming of the time or with what was going on. He had been unmasked out there, finally freed. But they already started grinding the walls, trying to take them down.

Another entry, then came the piano, this time only a few keys at a time, not entirely in unison but with some kind of wild exception which seemed to stay with him. Minutes passed, only a few of them would make it through. He wasn’t the same courageous type his father had been. As a matter of time, he was unable to make up where he was going and for what reason. No one was staying in, nothing was taken from granted. First victims came as it was expected. Someone noticed the surpage which had been broken through by the tram, the water which constantly dripped in. And then they attempted to fix the leakage, only to find out that there was no way of doing it. Whatever happened in here happened for a reason, but he had met the first one in sight.

Keyringer came out of nowhere, this time he seemed out of it. Backwater lagoon-type, looking as the pristine surfaces and all that destruction that occurred in the span of a few seconds, a simionite-crack through which the vapors poured out, this was a dangerous stay.

‘I cannot explain it precisely now, but those leaks are poisonous.’

‘Follow me.’

He was definitely out of it. He didn’t look like the same Ringer for starters, he was Filler, but they switched suits. Long before this, a man named Keyringer had worked at the base as one of the engineers. Out of the many mechanical bodies which appeared out of nowhere, one in particular was the reason for all the wrong in the world having happened. Out of living, an infiltrator which hadn’t been found; who later became the warden. Though the process was much longer and everyone involved in it had been completely deformed, out of apathy, no sympathy for the various cumbering spine-like eruptions which almost replicated the human shapes it wanted to torture and rotate during the flattening roars.

Various sounds were recorded. Some of the recordings were still used up to this specific time. In the fifth of the making, they began playing it from time to time only to test the peculiar effect through which they were doing what had to be done. It was perilous, too pretentious for a bloody upscale, a fealthy which was nothing but a disease. Many of them were distressed, the machines themselves being leftovers from the world above. It diluded reality, their presence there being nothing more but a disease that had infected both of them, but that didn't matter any longer.

The crack had already been made and again, Abel felt the shaking in his back as the peril of it starting over would trample over every thought. No amount of pain would do. The making of destruction came.

‘What’s wrong with you?’

‘I don’t know.’

Abel shouted as his arms took on a life of their own. He desperately tried fighting through it as the two devices in his back started pulverizing everything, hitting and jabbing, trying to bring the entire complex down. A mutation had occurred just then, between the sand and the complex, the bodies being fragmented as they fell. Through such a state of disquiet, the presence had been alerted. It came with all the bodies. Charging through the walls as they would push through.’

‘I am the honey-slurper.’

Bees of filthy came out, embrodiered in simple handles, pushing through out of their uncannily strange relapsed bodies, in drones of eighteen, having been formed into the shapes of giant hive-like tondrons. And with each flight of their long wings, they spanned about the pleasing sight, eating out of the bodies that were spilled about the place, out of the tram, the disgrace of bullets spraying over everyone. Though neither came as close to touch, either of them or the presences that pushed around. Letter-cutters around the dead, the presence-bodies came instead. And leaped around and cut the shroud, around him, without the least of a doubt, they failed to touch the man, as their fists connected, blades shattered at command.

Against the jaw-bones repelled as they stretched around from the back to his front, like steely curbed wings they protected him from every touch. Cooling after his boudy writhed in the broken pearls that cursed his mind.

Dragged away as they were, they couldn't fathom getting through and pushing out. Lost a gamble.

One man of the presence came in. He stepped morosely without a common sight or thought about what the repercussion might be. His simple attempt directed him to push the soles of his hand beneath the cruiser-like creature which fell about and holstered his tiny braided fingers whichw were crushed. A physical blow came out of nowhere, propelled by one of the openly exposed cones which came out of the jaw. With every push of air the other men had been driven away as they took the needed distance in order to observe what carried on. One of their own had been abandoned and sacrificed, left to see as he had suffered in the last moments of his pitiful life.

A cloaked figure, long clothed leaped out of the dark and covered his hands with the shades of the fallen trees he carried on his back. Its leaves spiraled through his shoulders as they made their way through his arms, opening all ten of his fingers in cube-like formations from which a blinding light came forth, banishing the presence as it calmed Abel down. With its long hand falling over, he lifted his arm, then, with a slicing motion he completely dragged the world away within his hand, with the two of them following after. Hampered through and sickened of waiting.

Ivanoe's sight remained still.

He rolled in hay inside one of the many houses which wasted around. He stirred the waters, seeing the first battle ships emerge out of the water. Many of them were uncouth and didn't make any sense to be there. He conveyed little emotion.

Lack of feeling in the legs; somewhere in the distance, upon the plains of a lost concave hole, there stood a single tear around the earth.

It pushed out and couldn't be hurt, as whatever happened inside of it only now seemed to come to life. Hardly touched around the first platform, that much was clear. In whichever direction one looked, he could see this much, the aftermath of a single large rider who had lost his horse. A falchion of steel had been abandoned somewhere in the back, which left a single man barely standing, let alone close to anything that might be called alive.

He was the last one to make a call on it. He was trashed around his wild bodies, all of them struck by the process of reenacting everything his race had tried to guard themselves against. It was a hard-strike to his head, trying not to float out of the wild legs he now bore. For the same reason they had all attempted, if not completely ruined themselves over, he had survived. Though most of them had lain at the back of the concave structure, with their legs hanging loose around their throats, in a desperate attempt to project their own mad looming hopeless wings, they started creeping out of their eternal sleep, awakened by a mighty strike against a surface which defiled the noise of bitter-lies being propagated outside the land.

Neither of them could figure out what happened. Dead ears heard no songs. Living was morose.

'I see that we have lost something on our way there.'

It was an absurd expectation none answered. A call home left the hero Mondkhe there, walking on his own, unable to see, for the likes of him a way back to lost survivors. It never came to pass.

Another loss came to his mind, a thing he regreted most, if there was anything he came to detest, it was the fact that he had abandoned the art. Some time in the past, the Man inside the universe, a no one, abandoned the one thing which he loved. It was the one and only thing he seemed to care about, to draw him to it against all odds. A place where he could only push against the tide and feel at home, in the only place, now it lay abandoned. Rotting in some obscure manner, where he laid.

The pencil, that was it. Out of all the evils in the world, it was the only thing which gave him a heart or a soul; the source of all empathy. It would have to be dealt with sooner or later. Switched around their neck, he started shouting for some reason without allowing himself to comprehend what had caused the fall. His mind was gone; there was no reason to stumble or to return. In a small cottage-floor, inside a place he was no more able to make out what was going on than the person next to him, he watched as a peculiar man came through one of his doors. Completely aghast, he couldn't throw in no finger-painter canvass over the way before Alkesey took the man next to him, flung him over and saw him. They were only trying to make it stop.

But the villain came in and bursted through his spine, as the old man provided no fight against the brute.

‘You killed that man.’

‘Of course I have, what did you expect me to do?’

Fighting back was pointless, there were no provisions there.

The house was barely stretched out, in some way and appeared to be in some swoon as well. It went through his head and faded. They didn’t speak about it there, since the body had been thrown through the roof and appeared to be completely out of it the picture. Dormant in a spot, it wasn’t going as planned. No one made a fuss about it.

Light fading once in then out until it couldn’t go at it again; which in turn made the wall strangling the first necks; hay pounding them around in during the strange looking red glowing hexagon which turned the room in a peculiar standing lesser gloomy rum-filled glot. Few dead pointers lay around.

Some of them had been pushed around.

‘It leads to nowhere?’

‘And what do you propose then?’

‘I do not know. ‘

‘Why can’t you at least try making a point then?’

There’s nothing out here, nothing’s working. It’s plain to see there’s something going off the charts.’

‘Where, in which direction and how do you know what to do.’

Time was blunt, it couldn’t go for long, not in his withful chair, the wreckage of mourning, where he danced in an enclosed eternity on top of a single pumpkin patch. Most of the lightbulbs attempted to simulate some kind of space, distantly aware that it could not hold a single flare against the real, hiding before the light could return to its origin. Two more started powering up.

Leaves of light flew away from them, until now, there was no reason to way for someone.

‘Might I join you, young, for dinner?’

A slithering cut managed to make all the light pour in, humbling the sight, as he entered as fast as he could. It was important that he knew where he was and what his place in the world seemed to be. There was no pain nor agony to be felt here, only him waiting to be seen and noticed, least of all would he encounter stress. It bothered no man to admit he was wrong.

But the creature which came in, if he could be called this way, this nightmare of low-structures and unfathomable desaturated colors appeared to push only one leg at a time, out of the millions he bore, and the stretched, yet wretched arms which bore their malignant orange, blue and other, other-worldly colored eyes. From the top of a great dome which writhed atop the great body he bore, there was nothing more colorful than the fealthy which poured in. A filthy damaging thing which only crept along the propulsion which threw mushroom-like top from the back of his body, where all the tiny bodies slaves, though they had been completely caught in and held in place by some back growths which pushed in, could not fathom staying in for too long.

They had nothing to stare at, least alone, would there be a time of respite or rest.

‘Might I find solace under one of your many shades?’

‘Nay, there’s naught for you to seek yonder, you must flee as you may please yourself not being surrounded. I seem to have lost my wit during a time when I had seen the light emerge from the strongest moving depths, ther spheres yet emerge still.’

And one of them had pointed, through their constantly murky, swarming arms, from which little globule-insects poured out, unable to control themselves as they looked for a way out to be. They had pointed out at some transparent, almost patented simian-bubbles which started gathering around. Under their guise, no one could see a thing, let alone be able to understand what wen through them as they concealed either the bulbs or the lights coming from them.

The the one who ate the pumpkin of the world united with the strange beast, lay down a dark table, though both of them were clerly not as well defined, not the same height, but appaeared to be facing each other nontheless. It was hard to pin down a look on that one who rested below. He who had been eaten looked way too crusted, crested with spindles and many other unnatural rock formation which had melded with the organic material which had crept ever since inside. It bred him, made him, gave him the pair of partitioned wing-like menace which could only fathom being out for long. Until long he had suffered of a melting spot which had left a permanent hole in his chest, which went through him head, as well his mind.

When the time approached, that he might pour in the tea and even come to push on, he had done a terrible thing many other people might’ve found uncannily destructive. For too long had he wondered what went wrong with him or why he acted that way, with the scope and likes, he destroyed the thing which had took over his mind, crushing everything beneath him in a gust of rage. From it, and the holes, a vile gas had emerged and left him. It couldn’t be identified, but he had feared that something was released out there into the world.

Something he had no control over and he could never have hope to take back, no matter what went through him as well. He was contrived to this place, chained, though it couldn’t be necessarily seen. A distant memory to him and even less to fewer people, let alone could he learn of what went on inside his head. He had directed day and plays in his mind as well, all until this one crude interaction.

‘You know why I have come here, Bollur.’

‘And what would that be, dark creature, made out of writhin skin?’

He could see it now, against every single one of its many legs. He couldn’t hide this form any longer, nor was he mourning or trying to scrape the walls and plaster off the bodily fuction that were being taken away for him as he waited there. IT was clear he had done something which could not be forgivable any longer. Despite the fact he was calm.

The creature took a step back, not looking at the drink he pouring out of the body of the broken land, lightly but darkly shaded orange, as the blood of the ground poured trough. And throught he steam which came out of it, one could see nothing else but the flying and the floating wonder, the sinister-creeping taste. It could be felt, around the emptiness which had prevailed. This was the taste of the dying sand. This was the remanant of a dying land.

But what he showed was something worse, the creature had done it and he couldn't focus on anything else but it. He who had been the enactor of all the evil acts he had carried on another version of humanity. Not that it should matter, yet he claimed it so.

'I have found a way though it might be destined to fade and cry along the way, to span, over the last agonies I have inflicted on them during the day they had been gone. That I might pull away a body of theirs, that of the very ground itself which hoisters all of them before time could come.'

And he had shown in, amongst the ranks, one in particular managed to show him the respite he had harbored in his very immutable body. He feared nought of the presence, nor could he look away. There was as much vileness in his mind as someone could show before fading away. Though even now, the battery hole inside his chest, though it was bloody and very much, nigh-digested, that showed no sign of stopping, another one appeared, right below his organs-chests, those who were pumping now outside his trunk, in each direction largely erected. Nothing could compare to it, what he felt and what he dealt with. Through some unnatural way, he understood what made him get through that unimmaginable route.

Crowded inside his cranial mass, he spoke to himself and asked.

'But who is that dark creature and why is its desire pure?'

Bollur couldn't fathom waiting, ripping through the bodies with blotches of eyes hiding it without trying to give away the fact that they couldn't fathom waiting for long. So many changes, but one of them deranged as well; it managed to hid himself all too well amongst such strange contenders, those of which might never pass. He wanted that one in particular, the body of the Duke in all his might. Though he seemed indifferent to any remorseful touch, from the other bodies which were connected to the grant one, this strangely primsmatic body-wager, this spherical conondrum of many spike-headed, large dead-men which crowded the marks, it was his and only his the only one which stood out.

He wanted, if anything could be gotten then, to steal it from his den and then wait for it, trapped forever, never to look in disturbing delight.

Bollur thought and wondered for the longest of times. What could I give in return?

As soon as he hid it, he had become desperate. There was nothing here, only the things he had created out of the pumpkin resin, yet that body, that precious artifact made out of some immaterial pure light had done nothing else but gnaw a his mind. He needed it despite the rage, the mass which shot through his head being impossible to control as well. As he could wonder at what he might accept, he came to ask himself as well.

‘What if I lay claim to his life as well? What if I were to slay him in agony and disturb his wreathing people as they die in the command?’

During the time he lay in thought, it came too clear that he neared something close to a consensus. He missed seeing the images of other beings, their presence they enfolded. Though he doubted or had come to doubt, he couldn’t tell whether or not this creature was alive or not. That had been perhaps the first mistake, reassuring himself time after time that there was nothing to die for as long as he could keep his mind sharp yet darkly tainted.

It had to go his way, otherwise, he would not be able to hold it any longer, all that overencompassing glory which awaited him outside. At the price of the body of a brave Duke, taken from the creature that wasted its life there, he could simply have it if he willed it so. This was only a matter of seconds, plain to see what was around and what might gnaw at him when the sound fell out, the sutures enclosing, folding the two open slits which lead to his pumpkin bit. He rested on the oustretch, clearly observing how this strange creature started sipping on the pumpkin tea. It was clear that he enjoyed, to some very clear point, taunting him, as he went as far as to aim at throwing a tantrum. Less than expected was the common denominator, the reaction which pushed through his mind. He contorted a plan, just as anyone might do before pushing through the sinew-clock, bone exposed hands pointing at the right hour. He had been towering him for way too long and now the time had come to trim his legs and take what was rightfully his.

‘Wait, not to fast, I think we still have some unfinished bussiness we ought to attend to.’

‘And what would those be? Unless I’m wrong, I think I’ve got nothing to explain to you.’

As a matter of fact, there was nothing coming even closer to it, not in a million strikes, his ears being jolted in time with him being unable to breath right. There were uneven strokes along the rims of his lungs, the giant creature had been jolted by the constant sensations he had been forced into. He was staring now, unable to go on. Something in his chest faded, then appeared, then disspeared like a blunt brass trap, like a poison that could not handle itself for too long. It appeared, faded, then came back wider. Simply, as expected in some way, he enjoy what was going on here, without fear of being crushed by the supreme magnitude of weight he would impose onto him. Too much was enough and for a single moment he considered this, before wasting not a single more esoteric secont to throw it out of the way.

‘I see that you haven’t taken too much of a liking to my tea. Unfortunate for you, because I feel as if we are out of touch in some way, we fell through during our conversation and to that, I think I’ll settle with nothing more but some pain coming in your direction.’

‘Traitorous wretch, is that how your treat your guests? I ought to!’

But he fell, and the body of the eart he had collected fell away into its hellish realm. He failed in a second attempt to grab. They fell through him and off the pumpking patch rose, like a carnivorous plant, it started gnawing and trenching through it.

Meanwhile, as he surpassed this creature, Bollur bore a crown around his neck, made out of a few of his legs. He carried them with him as he formed the pumpkin stairs which led to another forming slit he had the gut and the nerve to ask for, thence he carried in. Through the stairs of the stars, through which he found the path, the long bridge that cut through everything as far as it could be seen and peeled out for the agony space was in.

Thence he simply walked, and met the vile mask which floated along the way. In days and eons of despair they graced one another in their presence as they felt no need to convey even the luster of song, creator, if all, of Suppressors, as one of the most inconsiderate pests, he thought of it, nonetheless.

‘Have you enjoyed my gift?’

‘Have you enjoyed ours?’

There was a snicker on both sides. Something appeared to be shared during a time of unrest and the agony which impressed none other than the melting of putrid clocks. Some bodies carried them as they had clearly been infested by the prowess of the mad. And in their stay, their walk was simple, they couldn’t understand, what, after all the while they spent together, what had happened to time? In its wake and in the way, in the putrid state through which it couldn’t convey the pass, they had been struck by the fact that they had spent too much time bearing this conversation over and over again.

It was made out of nothing, an orange sky with an ultramarine sun which shone, around the world of dark; plain and simple, doming like a bunch of curved walls which made it so there was always something to look at no matter what time had said of them. No desire to push it through, the blasted access into sinew. They moved like cattle from one direction to the other, never settling for another. Worst of all, the time was set, deserted among their kin, as they refused to connect with them.

‘Others are far more sterile in their rage. Know that there are those, and there are some who’d stop at nothing until you were to be taken for the tormenter you are and punished.’

‘Hah.’

There was no better response than the echo the new-walls created. He satiated no wonder and appeared to scrape not a sun. Bollur had no intention to push him away any longer, as he only saw it fit to mess around and churn the coming of wild ends. He wondered at it, who might make the first move and most importantly, where might he find the body in the prism of the dead. Uncounted for hours, he searched for something that might happen there.

Any explosion or forming of the universe, any making or taking or flying through the roofs of sunken planets that might never rise, their demise was expected as they would only give birth to giant clusters of infants who were waiting to be given birth before the coming of the wild ends showed any signs of pushing forth.

‘Alas, I shall bestow upon you a simple gift, that you may know and be aware of, so you might make something of it Agamemnon. I shall offer you the chance to find it. That of which you’re looking for.’

As all the while, listened as he might, through all that terror and unfortunate deaths which went through whoever wanted to seek it past the pass of the advent of man. In lack of better words and plains that might creep around the brightest corners of a lightless space, there was the path, the road, the one who might know about it despite not being on the hunt. Despite their best attempts, they knew how they would be unable, let alone get through it then. In the past, the making after couldn’t alter what went through. It was clear, as fear advanced, the dance of stars went past them, in the glance of the years and the making. Only one of their own got closest to finding a liver of their own.

‘Who is he?’

Bollur was amused by the possibilities. He could lie as he had originally intended and sent the creatures to a hunt from which they might not even be able to recover from. As of some fact, he delighted in things he could break and recover, things he could bring to some destruction then bring back, after a rover. But that had not been it. Nor was the fact.

It would be subtle this way, nor would he desire to push it back.

‘I shall offer you a single chance to set your backs onto it again. You are fiends of destruction and could carry it only that way.’

‘Say it, who is it?’

Thence he pointed, that Agamemnon who had been ripped away from their commonly connected consciousness. He who had been joined by the Colossus, he who ended the; a break, it seemed like Agamemnon disappeared. Despite no navigational approach being given and there being no certain common information towards the spot where he hid, there was nothing to point back to. Nowhere near had he seemed likely to return. Thence he retorted with himself. What shall I look after?

‘Who shall feel my wrath?’

He willed the road gone, despite it being a branch made out of the body of Agamemnon, thence it disappeared. He neared a time when he couldn’t help himself but look after the most disgusting and untrustworthy of beings, the juvenile and the creeps, those who couldn’t help themselves but get beaten past the pulp of their broken feet.

Thence the quiet, in a mule of a box, darkness inside of it, with the exception of a single light bulb. He was there and they were there.

Bollur looked at Keyringer and at Abel. Both of them were unable to figure out what the reason for this apparition was.

‘I have a deal for both of you. Neither of you will be able to escape from it.’

Neither could he, and there was the case of Christine.

Twenty days ago, when Filler was still alive; when Filler wasn’t Keyringer. When Christine was still alive, pain was still alleviated. Faced around each corner of the block, they had some prodding devices which hid the bowels of the earth every now and then, especially during the night. It made it so some of the psychical giants had a way in, and a place to hide. The who complex degenerated into another level, which poured into the bowels of the ship. Most human which had been preserved died of a quickly-spreading infection.

Most of the advanced apparatuses, complex machinations and tools died out, if not they had been completely got welded into the skin of pair of giant humans who bashed themselves against the walls, killing everyone in sight, including the suited caretakers. Though there was one of them who managed to survive, being struck by the fact that his body became somewhat, strangely struck in the form of a reigned hive or a line of cockroaches which survived the destruction coming from the world above. There was another clear distinction, taking from the light reflection which appeared in the after shots, on the pictures.

He could record the rooms for what they were, damned, red, bloody, puerile-architecturally designed. Undignified as a living place, this was the inner-asylum. Comprised of eighteen rooms, a large chamber in the middle and the main set-shaft which made it look like a prison. Multiple lights emerged from every spot, dignified by the deterrance of a long bodied glancer, he who had taken the guard of the omen stone. Spread around every spot, they looked like stone-carved knives, and kettle-drums. Some of them being made out of beating skin which spread from around the corners then floated from one direction to another.

He had a long neck despite his wormish body which moved like a hyena. And despite the boiled skin which was stuck in an endless process of dripping itself, a single eye could be fragmented, big, spanning from across the forehead to the lower side of the skin. It lay inverted, colored in blue, yellowish-tinted irises, three of four of them appearing at times and another globe which almost came out of it, despite there being no extra socket for it to dwell inside. He walked on other smaller bodies, all of whom had been perfectly fit for the holes made in their chests and bodies.

It was missed then, a shot of the creature was enough to gather in the fact that it existed. Two sets of dates, then, both Christine and him were locked behind one of the bars. This strange place was filled, entirely to the brim with as many inmates as it could hold. But what about them? For now they would only be here for fewer days and longer stays, clearly caught.

Talking beyond this point was stalking, and nothing could be worse than it. Although it was unclear what was allowed in the confines of the trap, they guessed as much.

It had to add to something. Their time spent there was nothing showing itself out. Two main pitcher-locks barred the cell gate. A small shock would be administered through it on a timed interval.

‘Take cover.’

A piece of sharp-sand, brittle, caught in between the metal bars, bursted out.

And then he rose again from the casket of immorality before he winced.

But this insolence would not last long. It was difficult to quantify and put in its place without losing anything on the draw.

‘It will stand the test of time, I hope. As long as nothing out of the while happens, there should be no problem. ‘

Second time that lamp moved, it was the one and only thing that appeared to move from one spot to another without there being anything shaken inside their cage. Both Ringer and Christine tried. They would make ends meet today. Without any little or puerile lamb in the making, they received a strange pork soup half-a-barrel and some crumbs of bread. Those would serve them over a few days, in exchange for what they mined in the back.

Still, they couldn't focus on anything else other than the lamp, it moved.

'Think it will do it again?'

'I don't know that yet, we'll have to wait and see.'

There was no precedent to doing it. Sitting there for more than a few hours would erode their very bodies out of the very fact that this was a highly unorthodox place in itself. Locked like a cattle-prower, without a way to strike for air.

'It moved again.'

He alerted Christine who went in whichever direction she could in order to get a better view at what went on behind the table. Marking on the wall, some of them ripped off manually, by a big pair of hands. Their imprint betrayed huge fingers, animal in nature, close to being too close to an ingrate creature than anything else. Something has been seen before. Its very nature showed itself there. Out of a small point where the crack in the wall had denigrated the very material through which the concrete pushed out of the metal tomb that was hidden between the leopard carpet there was a single hand that was sculpting the other side of his cell. He almost made a hole through it. They could neither confirm nor deny the fact that they were frightened by the sight of the small pick which burst through, despite their inattention, entering the vase without breaking it.

'Pick it up, will you?'

Christine reaffirmed before she went over the motions again. He could swear she heard something inside of it again. Long tins, where cigar but-stones would leap against the walls, then stop to wonder what went through her wronged side of the head, where she was hit before being dragged in.

She was scratching while Ringer was double-checking the vase.

'There's something in it. I think it's moving.'

'Don't do anything you might come to regret, or you might find yourself unable to.'

She missed it again, the hand was out of their cell block. A man could be broken that way. The table was missplaced, in the wrong spot, a reminder could only go as far as to appear ever so slightly when they couldn't stop looking or crackling at it. Under the tenderness beneath the table, no one moved an inch, being very likely to be unable to figure it out yet.

'It did move.'

'What did?'

'You know what I mean, the table moved a few inches away. There's something beneath it. '

'But where is it?'

Dreadful being they were, hiding in the place where not even their unworthy god could be aware of what was going on. He shivered at the song of the vileness, always going out of the way to count upon the dreadful towering malformation, all of whom were hiding inside the walls between the two cells. Spared out of nothing, for some uncouthed upon reason, they settled on something less than waiting to be killed. They spilled an unnatural appeal which pushed deeper through stone. As it became fleshy, as the bloody meat had shared an uncouthed upon feeler, the cryansanthen-like pattern finally emerged out of it, trying to devour their small, yet tightly knitted scalps. It was uneven, how they both stood there. Unable to get away, they felt for the surroundings, never knowing what might show up in their way.

After the first touch, they couldn't, for the likes of them make out what was going out, in the sky, the patterns of an engulfing plethora of skin tormented leech-fat opened boweled priests had come. They made it through the aerial-zone, through the buildings, into the ground as well as they could appear out of their unnatural feeling-tocuhes, wrapping each other around the cords. Holding both Ringer and Christine in their places as they were told not to move.

‘One single touch and you shall both suffer the epitome of a lost-mankind.’

Both of them appeared to have shown that they meant it. For some reason, they had spread each other, in part, around the split of their lips and around their hands, there were multiple scores of lumps which wouldn't do. It would be largely unforgivable, trying to make it through, without begging for release. And thence the coming of a quick success, it had to be done, otherwise, the stress would kill them both before they had the chance to confess to the dreadful happenings. Ink drops signalled away.

‘You had once been pure, to no arrival of thoughts, you’ve come to think of no one else but yourself.’

‘I’ve done nothing of the kind. As a matter of fact, I seem to have found myself wandering around after a friend.’

‘One of whom had been taken away from you and killed, is that not so?’

‘Of course it is but that’s neither because of me nor of her. His death was a matter of his own hand and his own doing.’

‘Then answer me this, if you would be so inclined. Where is Christine, the woman who was around you?’

To that he couldn't, for the likes of him say; he was out of it, unable to make the difference between this zone, that and the time through which they both lost their shots. The hole in the wall had long been slumbered and appeared to be completely locked. There was nothing in it, from what he could tell and then. The warden was dead as well. He had rotted during a time when he couldn't have looked out for anyone.

He chimed in. Then he appeared. Out of some unnatual cowl, he appeared to have stricken his entire neck before ripping it off only to pull eighteen great worm-tunnels, offering him an escape. Soon enough, after their release, they had been allowed the peace and respite to shallowly run around and never touch a thing like theirs. It was dreadful having to wait or needing something to do before the time of the day. But the clock was thickening and he was sure that Christine had made it through.

The growling meat foundations that the man of cloth-like figure brought in finally rearranged itself as it pushed out, taking the grates and the prison bars with it as well as it had managed to gather in the shock.

‘I can see it happen, even now that I can help it.’

‘What, what is it? What can you see?’

‘Somewhere in the distance, they have driven them towards the cells. The masses of bodies, brought from within by the men with their strangling tools, their fiery bullet chains, now I can truly know what’s happening there.’

‘And what would that be, dear master? Since I have long resigned to my fate, I see no reason to satiate this hunger and look for more than I need to get away with.’

‘You needn’t make the case for starvation, for I shall not allow you as much. But you need to be weary of what’s going on here unless you count the passing of time.’

He could only mark some days, or some hours at best, out of the many pictures he had taken, not to be mistaken with what was passing through, he stole one single bid, and he pushed it out and came to realise how much of it was trying to crepe through his mind. He almost came to be part of the meat-tunnel through which he walked for no other reason than the obscurity of Mars. He looked out of one of the meat tunnel’s revealed domed holes, only to see the planet in its glory. Such a sight was infected nonetheless, out of the bottom of his heart, he saw it as being unfit. Unneeded, and unable to continue past no birth and no disease, he was distressed by what was coming. He couldn’t suffer what went through his mind. All the while he suffered something of the conviction, the admiration of the lightbulbs caught in space. Those were his stars and inside of them the twin-gods emerged.

‘Time to leave unless you want to be elevated to the status of a dead-man, never to come to the point of escaping with your dame after this hold.’

Although he cherrished the help, and he considered going away, he also thought of this as well. What might happen if he fell? What would he do with her if they both decided it was time to return to his home? There was no saying, there was no staying and they could do no less than it was expected. He deferred to looking around, sounding one of the many alarms which started pointing through; no wonder to the making, not less than expected as well.

Thence he made it through but not as a man as he had been before, rather, he was something close to being an immutable creature basked in the skin of that flabbering thing that was his fur.

‘Now, Ringer, you might go forth, but be weary, for the warden might come close.’

Even closer than he had been before, time was trying to pry through. He complied and lost his mind only to no less than the dying of the days, the better plays being still pushed on. Creeping through the alabaster, he mastered nothing less than what was needed in the process of dying.

